ST. JOHN.
THE PREFACE TO THE FOUR EVANGELISTS, AND THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

THE one half of our undertaking upon the New Testament is now, by the assistance of Divine grace, finished, and presented to the reader, who, it is hoped, the Lord working with it, may hereby be somewhat helped in understanding and improving the sacred history of Christ and his apostles, and in making it, as it certainly is, the best exposition of our creed, in which these inspired writers are summed up; which is intimated by that Evangelist, who calls his gospel, A Declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, Luke 1. 1.

And as there is no part of scripture which it concerns us more to be well established in the belief of, so there is none which the generality of christians are more conversant with, or speak of more frequently. It is therefore our duty, by constant pains in meditation and prayer, to come to an intimate acquaintance with the true intent and meaning of these narratives, what our concern is in them, and what we are to build upon them, and draw from them; that we may rest in such a knowledge of them as that which we had, when in our childhood we were taught to read English out of the translation, and Greek out of the originals, of these books. We ought to know them as the physician does his dispensatory, the lawyer his books of reports, and the sailor his chart and compass; that is, to know how to make use of them in that we apply ourselves to as our business in this world, which is, to serve God here, and enjoy him hereafter, and both in Christ the Mediator.

The great designs of the christian institutes, (which these books are the fountains and foundations of,) were, to reduce the children of men to the fear and love of God, as the commanding, active principle of their observance of him, and obedience to him; to show them the way of their reconciliation to him, and acceptance with him; and to bring them under obligations to Jesus Christ as Mediator; and thereby to engage them to all instances of devotion toward God, and justice and charity towards all men, in conformity to the example of Christ, in obedience to his law, and in pursuance of his great intentions. What therefore I have endeavoured here, has been with this view, to make these writings serviceable to the faith, holiness, and comfort of good christians.

Now that these writings, thus made use of to serve these great and noble designs, may have their due influence upon us, it concerns us to be well established in our belief of their divine original. And here we have to do with two sorts of people. Some embrace the Old Testament, but set that up in opposition to the New, pleading that if that be right this is wrong; and these are the Jews. Others, though they live in a christian nation, and by baptism wear the christian name, yet, under pretence of freedom of thought, despise christianity, and, consequently, reject the New Testament, and therefore the Old, of course.

I confess it is strange, that any now who receive the Old Testament should reject the New; since, beside all the particular proofs of the divine authority of the New Testament, there is such an admirable harmony between it and the Old. It agrees with the Old, in all the main intentions of it, refers to it, builds upon it, shows the accomplishment of its types and prophecies, and thereby is the perfection and crown of it. Nay, if it be not true, the Old Testament must be false; and all the glorious promises which shine so brightly in it, and the performance of which was limited within certain periods of time, must be a great delusion; which we are sure they are not; and therefore must embrace the New Testament to support the reputation of the Old.

That in the Old Testament which the New Testament lays aside, is, the peculiarity of the Jewish nation, and the observances of the ceremonial law; both which certainly were of divine appointment; and yet the New Testament does not at all clash with the Old; for,

1. They were always designed to be laid aside in the fulness of time. No other is to be expected than that the morning-star should disappear when the sun rises; and the latter parts of the Old Testament often speak of the laying aside of these things, and of the coming in of the Gentiles.

2. They were very honourably laid aside, and rather exchanged for that which was more noble and excellent, more divine and heavenly. The Jewish church was swallowed up in the christian, the Mosaic ritual in evangelical institutions. So that the New Testament is no more the undoing of the Old, than the sending of a youth to the university is the undoing of his education in the grammar-school.
PREFACE.

3. Providence soon determined this controversy, (which is the only thing that seemed a controversy between the Old Testament and the New,) by the destruction of Jerusalem, the desolations of the temple, the dissolution of the temple-service, and the total dispersion of all the remains of the Jewish nation; with a judicial defeat of all the attempts to incorporate it again, now for above 1600 years; and this, according to the express predictions of Christ, a little before his death. And, as Christ would not have the doctrine of his being the Messiah much insisted on, till the great conclusive proof of it was given by his resurrection from the dead; so the repeal of the ceremonial law, as to the Jews, was not much insisted on, but their keeping up the observation of it was connived at, till the great conclusive proof of its repeal was given, by the destruction of Jerusalem, which made the observation of it for ever impracticable. And the manner in which the Jews, considered as a people, even notwithstanding the prosperity of particular persons among them, continue under to this day, is a proof, not only of the truth of Christ's predictions concerning them, but that they lie under a greater guilt than that of idolatry, (for which they lay under a desolation of 70 years,) and that can be no other than crucifying Christ, and rejecting his gospel.

Thus evident it is, that in our expounding of the New Testament, we are not undoing what we did in expounding the Old; so far from it, that we may appeal to the law and the prophets for the confirmation of the great truth which the gospels are written to prove—That our Lord Jesus is the Messiah promised to the fathers, who should come, and we are to look for no other. For though his appearing did not answer the expectation of the carnal Jews, who looked for a Messiah in external pomp and power, yet it exactly answered all the types, prophecies, and promises of the Old Testament, which all had their accomplishment in him; and even his ignominious sufferings, which are the greatest stumbling-block to the Jews, were foretold concerning the Messiah; so that if he had not submitted to them, we had failed in our proof; so far it is from being weakened by them. Bishop Kidder's Demonstration of the Christian's Messiah, has abundantly made out this truth, and answered the cavils (for such they are, rather than arguments) of the Jews against it, above any in our language.

But when Christianity and the New Testament are more virulently and daringly attacked by some within their own bowels, than by those upon their borders. Never were Moses and his writings so arraigned and ridiculed by any Jews, or Mahomet and his Alcoran by any Mussulmen, as Christ and his gospel by men that are baptized and called Christians; and this, not under colour of any other divine revelation, but in contempt and defiance of all divine revelation; and not by way of complaint, that they meet with that which shocks their faith, and which, through their own weakness, they cannot get over, and therefore desire to be instructed in, and helped in the understanding of, and the reconciling of them to the truth which they have received; but by way of resolute opposition, as if they looked upon it as their enemy, and were resolved by all means possible to be the ruin of it; though they cannot say what evil it has done to the world, or to them. If the pretence of it has transported many in the church of Rome into such corruptions of worship and cruelties of government as are indeed the scandal of human nature, yet, instead of being thereby prejudiced against pure Christianity, they should the rather appear more vigorously in defence of it, when they see so excellent an institution as that is in itself, so basely abused and misrepresented.

They pretend to a liberty of thought in their opposition to Christianity, and would be distinguished by the name of Freethinkers. I will not here go about to produce the arguments which, to all that are not wilfully ignorant and prejudiced against the truth, are sufficient to prove the divine original and authority of the doctrine of Christ. The learned find much satisfaction in reading the apologies of the ancients for the christian religion, when it was struggling with the polytheism and idolatry of the Gentiles. Justin Martyr and Tertullian, Lactantius and Minuinius Felix, wrote admirably in defence of Christianity, when it was further sealed by the blood of the Martyrs.

But its patron's and advocates in the present day have another sort of enemies to deal with. The antiquity of the pagan theology, its universal prevalence, the edicts of princes, and the traditions and usages of the country, are not now objected to Christianity; but I know not what imaginary freedom of thought, and an uncleaught privative of human nature, are assumed, not to be bound by any divine revelation whatsoever.

Now it is easy to make out

1. That those who would be thought thus to maintain a liberty of thinking, as one of the privileges of human nature, and in defence of which they will take up arms against God himself, do not themselves think freely, nor give others leave to do so. In some of them, a resolute indulgence of themselves in vicious courses which they know the gospel, if they admit it, will make very uneasy to them, and a secret enmity to a holy, heavenly mind and life, forbid them all free thought; for so strong a prejudice have their lusts and passions laid them under against the laws of Christ, that they find themselves under a necessity of opposing the truths of Christ, upon which these laws are founded. Perit judicium, quando res transit in affectum—The judgment is overthrown, when opinion is referred to the affections. Right or wrong, Christ's bonds must be broken, and his cords cast from them; and therefore, how evident soever the perverseness be, the conclusion must be denied, if it tend to fasten these bands and cords upon them; and where is the freedom of thought then? While they promise themselves liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption; for of whom a man is overmade, of the same is he brought in bondage.

In others of them, a reigning pride and affectation of singularity, and a spirit of contradiction, those lusts of the mind, which are as insidious and imperious as any of the lusts of the flesh and of the world, forbid a freedom of thinking, and enslave the soul in all its inquiries after religion. These can no more think freely, who resolve they will think by themselves, than those can, who resolve to think with their neighbours.

Nor will they give others liberty to think freely; for it is not by reason and argument that they go about to convince us, but by jest and banter, and exposing Christianity and its serious professors to contempt. Now, considering how natural it is to most men to be jealous for their reputation, this is as great an imposition as can possibly be; and the unthinking are as much kept from freethinking by the fear of being ridiculed in the club of those who set up for oracles in reason, as by the fear of being cursed, excommunicated, and anathematized, by the counsel of those who set up for oracles in religion. And where is the freethinking then?

2. That those who will allow themselves a true liberty of thinking, and will think seriously, cannot but embrace all Christ's sayings as faithful, and well worthy of all acceptance. Let the corrupt bias of the carnal heart toward the world, and the flesh, and self (the most presumptuous idol of the three) be taken away, and let the doctrine of Christ be proposed first in its true colours; as Christ and his apostles have given it us, and in its true light, with all its proper evidence, intrinsic and extrinsic; and then let the capable see for themselves the rational powers and faculties, and by the operation of the Spirit of grace, who always works faith in all that believe, even the high thought, when once it becomes a free thought, freed from the bondage of sin and corruption, will, by a pleasing and happy power, be capitivated, and brought into obedience to Christ; and when he thus makes it free, it will be free indeed.

Let any one who will give himself leave to think impartially, and be at the pains to think closely, read Mr. Baxter's Reasons for the Christian Religion; and he will find, both that it goes to the bottom, and lays the foundation deep and firm, and also that it brings forth the top-stone in a believer's consent to God in Christ, to the satisfaction of any that are truly concerned about their souls and another world. The proofs of the truths of the gospel have been excellently well methodized, and enforced likewise, by Bishop Simpson in his Discourses on the New Testament; by Dr. Whitby, in his General Preface to his Commentary on the New Testament; and of late by Mr. Ditton, very argumentatively, in his discourse concerning the Resurrection of Jesus Christ; and many others have herein done worthily. And I will not believe any man who rejects the New Testament and the christian Religion, to have thought freely upon the subject, unless he has, with humility, seriousness, and prayer to God for direction, deliberately read these or the like books, which, it is certain, were written both with liberty and clearness of thought.

For my own part, if my thoughts were worth any one's notice, I do declare, I have thought of this great concern, with all the liberty that a reasonable soul can pretend to, or desire; and that the result is, that the more I think, and the more freely I think, the more fully I am satisfied that the christian Religion is the true religion, and that which, if I submit my soul sincerely to it, I may venture my soul confidently upon.

For when I think freely,

First, I cannot but think that the God who made man a reasonable creature by his power, has a right to rule him by his law, and to oblige him to keep his inferior faculties of appetite and passion, together with the capacities of thought and speech, in due subjection to the superior powers of reason and conscience. And when I look into my own heart, I cannot but think that this was it which my Maker designd, seeing that he could, for the sake of a holy, and that herein he intended to support his own dominion in me.

Secondly, I cannot but think that my happiness is bound up in the favour of God, and that his favour will, or will not, be toward me, according as I do, or do not, comply with the laws and ends of my creation. I am accountable to this God; and that from him my judgment proceeds, not only for this world, but for my everlasting state.

Thirdly, I cannot but think that my nature is very unlike what the nature of man was, as it came out of the Creator's hands; that it is degenerated from its primitive purity and rectitude. I find in myself a natural aversion to my duty, and to spiritual and divine exercises, and a propensity to that which is evil; such an inclination toward the world and the flesh, as amounts to a propensity to backslide from the living God.

Fourthly, I cannot but think that I am therefore, by nature, thrown out of the favour of God; for though I think he is a gracious and merciful God, yet I think he is also a just and holy God, and that I am become, by sin, both odious to his holiness, and obnoxious to his justice. I should not think freely, but very partially, if I should think otherwise. I think I am guilty before God, have sinned, and come short of glorifying him, and of being glorified with him.

Fifthly, I cannot but think that, without some special discovery of God's will concerning me, and good will to me, I cannot possibly recover his favour, be reconciled to him, or be so far restored to my primitive rectitude, as to be capable of serving my Creator, and answering the ends of my creation, and becoming meet, for every thing that is holy. And therefore there is need to me, that God, of his infinite love, would not only, by his grace, cleanse me to be new creatures, but by the same grace, give me a heart to serve him, and to draw me thereto. Not only, that I may be obedient, but more particularly, that I may love, and so be willing and able to obey.

Sixthly, I cannot but think that the way of salvation, both from the guilt and from the power of sin, by Jesus Christ, and his mediation between God and man, as it is revealed by the New Testament, is admirably well fitted to all the exigencies of my case, to restore me both to the favour of God and to the government and enjoyment of myself. Here I see a proper method for the removing of the guilt of sin, (that I may not die by the sentence of the law,) by the all-sufficient merit and righteousness of the Son of God in our nature; and, for the breaking of the power of sin, (that I may not die by my own disease,) by the all-sufficient influence and operation of the Spirit of God upon our nature. Every malady has herein its remedy, every defect in grace is hereby redressed, and in such a way as advances the honour of all the divine attributes, and is suited and adapted to human nature.

Seventhly, I cannot but think that what I find in myself of natural religion, does evidently bear testimony to the christian religion; for all that truth which is discovered to me by the light of nature, is confirmed, and more clearly discovered, by the gospel; the very same thing which the light of nature gives me a confused sight of, (like the sight of men as trees walking,) the New Testament gives me a clear and distinct sight of. All that good which is pressed upon me by the law of nature, is more fully discovered to me, and I find myself much more strongly bound to it, by the gospel of Christ, the engagements it lays upon me to my duty, and the encouragements and assistance it gives me in my duty. And this is further confirmed to me, that there, just there, where natural light leaves me at a loss, and unsatisfied—tells me that hitherto it can carry me only; but no further—the gospel takes me up, helps me out, and gives me all the satisfaction I can desire; and that is especially in the great business of the satisfying of God's justice for the sin of man. My own conscience asks, Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the most high God? Will he be pleased with thousands of rams? But I am still at a loss: I cannot frame a righteousness from any thing I am, or have, in myself, or from any thing I can do for God or present to God, wherein I dare appear before him; but the gospel comes and tells me, that Jesus Christ has made my soul an offering for sin, and God has declared himself well pleased with all believers in him; and this makes me easy.

God! Eightly, I cannot but think that the proofs by which God has attested the truth of the gospel, are the most proper that could be given in a case of this nature—That the power and authority of the Redeemer the kingdom of grace should be exemplified to the world, not by the highest degree of the pomp and authority of the kings of the earth, as the Jews expected, but by the evidences of his deification in the kingdom of nature; which is a much greater dignity and authority than any of the kings of the earth ever pretended to, and is no less than divine. And his miracles, being generally wrought upon men, not only upon their bodies, as they were mostly when Christ was here upon earth, but, which is more, upon their minds, as they were mostly after the pouring out of the Spirit in the gift of tongues and other supernatural endowments, were the most proper confirmations possible of the truth of the gospel, which was designed for the making of men holy and happy.

Nay, I cannot but think that the methods taken for the propagation of this gospel, and the wonderful success of those means, which are purely spiritual and heavenly, and destitute of all secular advantages and supports, plainly show that it was of God, for God was with it, and it; could never have spread as it did, in the face of so much opposition, if it had not been accompanied with a power from on high.
And the preservation of christianity in the world to this day, notwithstanding the difficulties it has struggled with, is to me a standing miracle for the proof of it.

Lastly, I cannot but think that the gospel of Christ has had some influence upon my soul, has had such a command over me, and been such a comfort to me, as is a demonstration to myself, though it cannot be so to another, that it is of God. I have tasted in it, that the Lord is gracious; and the most sublime disputants cannot convince one who has tasted honey, that it is not sweet.

And now I appeal to Him who knows the thoughts and intents of the heart, that in all this I think freely, (if it be possible for a man to know that he does so,) and not under the power of any bias. Whether we have reason to think that those who without any colour of reason, not only usurp, but monopolize, the character of Freethinkers, do so, let those judge, who easily observe that they do not speak sincerely, but industriously disseminate their notions; and one instance I cannot but notice, of their unfair dealing with their readers—that when, for the diminishing of the authority of the New Testament, they urge the variaous readings of the original, and quote an acknowledgment of Mr. Gregory of Christ Church, in his philosophical Disquisition for the New Testament, and that Mr. Eusebius of Caesarea, and Dr. Baronius of Rome, and Dr. Quiett, and other such authors, have immediately followed, as the sense of that learned man upon it, That this is an invincible reason for the scriptures' part, &c.

We then receive the books of the New Testament as our oracles; for it is evident that that excellent notion of Dr. Henry More's is true, that "they have a direct tendency to take us off from the animal life, and to bring us to the divine life."

But while we are thus maintaining the divine original and authority of the New Testament, as it has been received through all the ages of the church, we find our cause not only attacked by the enemies we speak of; but, in effect, betrayed by one who makes our New Testament almost double to what it really is, adding to it the Constitutions of the Apostles, collected by Clement, together with the Apostolical Canons, and making those to be of equal authority with the writings of the Evangelists, and preferable to the Epistles. By enlarging the lines of defence thus, without either cause or precedent, he gives great advantage to the invaders.

Those Constitutions of the Apostles have many things in them very good, and may be of use, as other human compositions. But to pretend that they were composed, as they profess themselves to be, by the twelve apostles in concert at Jerusalem, I Peter, saying this, I Andrew, saying that, &c. is the greatest imposition that can be practised upon the credulity of the simple.

1. It is certain, there were a great many spurious writings which, in the early days of the church, went under the names of the apostles and apostolical men: so that it has been always complained of as imposi-tible to find out any thing but the canon of scripture, that could with any assurance be attributed to them.
Baronius himself acknowledges it, Cam apostolorum nomine tam facta quam dicta referantur esse ete possit; nee sic quid de illis a verbo sincerissime scripturibus narratione in integrum et incorruptum remanserit, in desolationem plane quandam animum dejechit posse unquam aequi quot verum certumque substitue—Since so many of the acts and sayings ascribed to the apostles are found to be spurious, and even the narrations of faithful writers respecting them are not free from corruption, we must desist of ever being able to arrive at any absolute certainty about them. Ad. An. Christ. 44. sect. 42, &c. There were Acts of the apostles of Andrew, of the apostle, Philip, Peter, Thomas; a Gospel under the name of Thad-dee; another of Barnabas, another of Bartholomew; a book concerning the infancy of our Saviour, another concerning his nativity, and many the like, which were all rejected as forgeries.

2. These Constitutions and Canons, among the rest, were condemned in the primitive church as apocryphal, and therefore justly rejected; because, though otherwise good, they pretended to be what really they were not, dictated by the twelve apostles themselves, as received from Christ. If Jesus Christ gave them such instructions, and they gave them in such a solemn manner to the church, as is pretended, it is unaccountable that there is not the least notice taken of any such thing done or designed in the Gospels, the Acts, or any of the Epistles.

Those who have judged the most favourably of those Canons and Constitutions, have concluded that they were compiled by some officious persons under the name of Clement, toward the end of the second century, above 150 years after Christ's ascension, out of the common practice of the churches; that is, that, the compilers were most acquainted with, or had respect for; when at the same time we have reason to think that the far greater number of christian churches which by that time were planted, had Constitutions of their own, which if they had had the haphazard to be transmitted to posterity, would have recommended themselves as well as these, or better. But as the legislators of old put a reputation upon their laws, by pretending to have received them from some deity or other, so church-governors studied to beget a reputation also, by laying the apostolical name or other at the head of their catalogue of bishops. (See Bishop Stilligre's Lexicon, p. 302.) and reputation to their Canons and Constitutions, by fatherng them upon the apostles.

But how can it be imagined that the apostles should be all together at Jerusalem, to compose this book of Canons with so much solemnity, when we know that their commission was to go into all the world, and to preach the gospel to every creature. Accordingly, Eusebius tells us that Thomas went into Parthia, Andrew into Scythia, John into the lesser Asia; and we have reason to think that after their dispersion they never came together again, any more than the planters of the nations did after the Most High had separated the sons of Adam.

* Whiston.—Ed.
I think that any one who will compare these Constitutions with the writings which we are sure were given by inspiration of God, will easily discern a vast difference in the style and spirit. What is the chaff to the wheat?

* * * Where are ministers, in the style of the true apostles, called priests, high priests? Where do we find in the apostolical age, that age of suffering, of the placing of the bishop in his throne? Or of readers, "singers, and porters, in the church?"

I fear the collector and compiler of those Constitutions, under the name of Clement, was conscious to himself of dishonesty in it, that he would not have them published before all, because of the mysteries contained in them; nor were they known or published till the middle of the fourth century, when the confiscation had been well approved. I cannot see any mysteries in them, that they should be concealed, if they had been genuine; but I am sure that Christ bids his apostles publish the mysteries of the kingdom of God upon the house-tops. And St. Paul, though there are mysteries in his Epistles, much more sublune than any of these Constitutions, charges that they should be read to all the holy brethren. Nay, these Constitutions are so wholly in a manner taken up, either with moral precepts, or rules of practice in the church, that if they had been what they pretend, they had been most fit to be published before all. And though the Apocalypse is so full of mysteries, yet a blessing is pronounced upon the readers and hearers of that prophecy. We must therefore conclude that, whenever they were written, by declining the light they owned themselves to be apocryphal, that is, hidden or concealed; that they durst not mingle themselves with what was given by divine inspiration; to allude to what is said of the ministers, (Acts 5. 12.) Of the rest durst no man join himself to the apostoles, for the people magnified them.

So that even by their own confession they were not delivered to the churches with the other writings, when the New Testament Canon was solemnly sealed up with that dreadful sentence passed on those that add unto these things.

And as we have thus had attempts made of late upon the purity and sufficiency of our New Testament, by additions to it, so we have likewise had from another quarter a great contempt put upon it by the papal power. The occasion was this:

The Father Quesnel, a papist, but a Jansenist, near thirty years ago, published the New Testament in French, in several small volumes, with Moral Reflections on every verse, to render the reading of it more profitable, and meditation upon it more easy. It was much esteemed in France, for the sake of the piety and devotion which it appeared in, and it had several impressions. The Jesuits were much disgusted, and solicited the pope for the condemnation of it, though the author of it was a papist, and many things in it countenanced popish superstition.

After much struggling about it in the court of Rome, a bull was at length obtained, at the request of the French king, from the present pope, Clement XI., bearing date September 8, 1713, by which the said book, with what title or in what language soever it is printed, is prohibited and condemned; both the New Testament itself, because in many things varying from the vulgar Latin, and the Annotations, as containing divers propositions, (above a hundred are enumerated,) scandalous and pernicious, injurious to the church and its customs, impious, blasphemous, savouring of heresy. And the propositions are such as these—"That the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ is the effectual principle of all manner of good, is necessary for every good action; for without it nothing is done, nay, nothing can be done"—"That it is a sovereign grace, and is an operation of the Almighty hand of God"—"That when God accompanies his word with the internal power of his grace, it operates in the soul the obedience which it demands"—"That faith is the first grace, and the fountain of all others"—"That it is in vain for us to call God our Father, if we do not cry to him with the spirit of love"—"That there is no God, nor region of his life where he is no charity"—"That the catholic church comprehends the angels and all the elect and just men of the earth, of all ages"—"That it has the Word incarnate for its Head, and all the saints for its members"—"That it is profitable and necessary at all times, in all places, and for all sorts of persons, to know the holy Scriptures"—"That the holy obscurity of the word of God is no reason for the laity not reading it"—"That the Lord's day ought to be sanctified by reading books of piety, especially the holy Scriptures"—And "that to forbid christians from reading the Scriptures, is to prohibit the use of light to the children of light." Many such positions as these, which the spirit of every good christian cannot but rech a true and good, are condemned by the pope's bull as impious and blasphematic. And this bull, though strenuously opposed by a great number of the Bishops in France, who were well affected to the notions of Father Quesnel, was yet received and confirmed by the French king's letters patent, bearing date at Versailles, February 14, 1714, which forbid all manner of persons, upon pain of exemplary punishment, so much as to keep any of those books in their houses; and adjudge any that should hereafter write in defence of the Propositions condemned by the pope, as disturbers of the peace.

It was registered the day following, February 15, by the Parliament of Paris, but with divers provisos and limitations.

By this it appears that popery is still the same thing that ever it was, an enemy to the knowledge of the Scriptures, and to the honour of divine grace. What reason have we to bless God, that we have liberty to read the Scriptures, and have helps to understand and improve them; which we are concerned diligently to make a good use of, that we may not provoke God to give us up into the hands of those powers that would use us in like manner.

I am willing to hope that those to whom the reading of the Exposition of the Old Testament was pleasant, will find this yet more pleasant; for this is that part of Scripture, which does most plainly testify of Christ, and in which gospel-grace which appears unto all men, bringing salvation, shines most clear. This is the New Testament milk for babes, the rest is strong meat for strong men. By these, therefore, let us be nourished and strengthened, that we may be pressing on toward perfection; and that, having laid the foundation in the history of our blessed Saviour's Life, Death, and Resurrection, and the first preaching of his gospel, we may build upon it by an acquaintance with the mysteries of godliness, to which we shall be further introduced in the Epistles.

I desire I may be read with a candid, and not a critical, eye. I pretend not to gratify the curious; the top of my ambition is, to assist those who are truly serious, in searching the Scriptures daily. I am sure—it is designed, and hope it is calculated, to promote piety toward God, and charity towards our brethren; and that there is not only something in it which may edify, but nothing which may justly offend, any good Christian.

If any receive spiritual benefit by my poor endeavours, it will be a comfort to me; but let God have all the glory, and that free grace of his which has employed one that is utterly unworthy of such an honour, and enabled one thus far to go on in it, who is utterly insufficient for such a service.

Having obtained help of God, I continue hitherto in it, and humbly depend upon the same good hand of my God to carry me on in that which remains, to gird my loins with needful strength, and to make my way perfect; and for this I humbly desire the prayers of my friends. One volume more, I hope, will include what is yet to be done; and I will both go about it, and go on with it, as God shall enable me with all convenient speed; but it is that part of the Scripture, which, of all others, requires the most care and pains in expounding it. But I trust, that as the day, so shall the strength be.

THAT which has been just offered to the reader, was the reverend author's first draught of a Preface to this volume. He intended to revise it, if God had allowed him a return home from his late journey. But though, by the afflicting stroke of his sudden death, it wants the advantage of his last hand, yet serious readers will be well pleased to have his first sentiments on those important heads which there come under his consideration; especially since it contains his dying testimony to the Christian Religion, the Canon of the New Testament, and the general usefulness of the sacred scriptures, on occasion of those debates which have been lately started, and made the most considerable noise in the world.

The Exposition itself, as far as the Acts of the Apostles goes, was entirely committed to the press before he left the City. The reader will perceive his intentions for the rest of the Holy Bible. But the sovereign providence of God, in whose hands our times are, has called this faithful and diligent servant to rest from his labours, and finish well himself, before he could finish this, and several other great and pious designs he had for the service of God and his church.

However, it may be acceptable to such as have often entertained themselves and their families with what is already extant, to let them know that we are not without hopes yet of seeing Mr. Henry's Exposition of the remainder; though it cannot be expected to be altogether so copious and complete as that which he himself prepared for the public. He drew up, several years ago, an Exposition of the Epistles to the Romans, which he had designed to transcribe with little alteration, for the beginning of his next volume, and was earnestly solicited to print it by itself, before he had thoughts of writing upon the whole Bible. For the rest, there are copies of his Expositions, both in public and private, taken from him by judicious writers; wherein, though they may not be of equal length, yet Mr. Henry was used to express himself with like propriety, the same pious spirit, and uncommon skill in the Scriptures. There is encouragement to hope that the revising and preparing of these for the press will be undertaken (if God give life and health) by an intimate friend of the excellent Author, whose long acquaintance with his spirit and manner renders him the most proper person for that service; and his endeared affection will incline him to take the pains necessary for ushering them into the world. This course is apprehended to be much better than either to leave such a work unfinished, when it is already advanced so far, or to attempt the continuation of the design with a quite different set of thoughts, and another sort of style and method, that it may be as much Mr. Henry's as possible. But a reasonable time must be allowed before this can be expected. I pray God long to spare the valuable life of that dear friend of the Author, and every way furnish him for this good work, and all others he may undertake for the good of God's church.

John Evans.
We have now before us,
I. The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; so this second part of the holy Bible is entitled: The new Covenant; so it might as well be rendered; the word signifies both. But when it is (as here) spoken of as Christ's act and deed, it is most properly rendered a Testament, for he is the Testator, and it becomes of force by his death; (Heb. 6. 16, 17.) nor is there, as in covenants, a previous treaty between the parties, but what is granted, though an estate upon condition, is owing to the will, the free-will, the good-will, of the Testator. Thus all the grace contained in this book is owing to Jesus Christ as our Lord and Saviour; and unless we consent to him as our Lord, we cannot expect any benefit by him as our Saviour. This is called a New Testament, to distinguish it from that which was given by Moses, and was now antiquated; and to signify that it should be always new, and should never wax old, and grow out of date. These books contain, not only a full discovery of that grace which has appeared to all men, bringing salvation, but a legal instrument by which it is conveyed to, and settled upon, all believers. How carefully do we preserve, and with what attention and pleasure do we read, the last will and testament of a friend, who has therein left us a fair estate, and, with it, high expressions of his love to us! How precious then should this Testament of our blessed Saviour be to us, which secures to us all his unsearchable riches? It is his Testament; for though, as is usual, it was written by others, (we have nothing upon record that was of Christ's own writing,) yet he dictated it; and the night before he died, in the institution of his supper, he signed, sealed, and published it, in the presence of twelve witnesses. For, though these books were not written for some years after, for the benefit of posterity, in perpetuum rei memoriam, as a perpetual memorial, yet the New Testament of our Lord Jesus was settled, confirmed, and declared, from the time of his death, as a nuncupative will, with which these records exactly agree. The things which St. Luke wrote, were things which were most surely believed, and therefore well known, before he wrote them; but when they were written, the oral tradition was superseded and set aside, and these writings were the repository of that New Testament.

This is intimated by the title which is prefixed to many Greek Copies, Τє κανον λεγεν "Αποστε—The whole of the New Testament, or All the things of. In it is declared the whole counsel of God concerning our salvation, Acts 20. 27. As the law of the Lord is perfect, so is the gospel of Christ, and nothing is to be added to it. We have it all, and are to look for no more.

II. We have before us The Four Gospels. Gospel signifies good news, or glad tidings; and this history of Christ's coming into the world to save sinners, is, without doubt, the best news that ever came from heaven to earth; the angel gave it this title, (Luke 2. 16.) Ευαγγελιζασαι— I bring you good tidings; I bring the gospel to you! And the prophet foretold it, Isa. 52. 7.—61. 1. It is there foretold, that in the days of the Messiah good tidings should be preached. Gospel is an old Saxon word; it is God's spell or word; and God is so called because he is good, Deus optimus—God most excellent, and therefore it may be a good spell, or word. If we take spell in its more proper signification for a charm (carmen,) and take that in a good sense, for what is moving and affecting, which is apt lenire dolorem—to calm the spirits, or to raise them in admiration or love, as that which is very amiable we call charming, it is applicable to the gospel; for in it the charmer charmer visibly, though to deaf adders, Ps. 58. 4, 5. Nor (one would think) can any charms be so powerful as those of the beauty and love of our Redeemer. The whole New Testament is the gospel. St. Paul calls it his gospel, because he was one of the preachers of it. Oh that we may each of us make it ours by our cordial acceptance of it, and subjection to it! But the four books which contain the history of the Redeemer, we commonly call The Four Gospels, and the inspired penmen of them Evangelists, or Gospel-writers; not, however, very properly, because that title belongs to a particular order of ministers, that were assistants to the apostles; (Eph. 4. 11.) He gave some apostles and some evangelists. It was requisite that the doctrine of Christ should be interwoven with, and founded upon, the narrative of his birth, life, miracles, death, and resurrection; for then it appears in its clearest and strongest light. As in nature, so in grace, the most happy discoveries are those which take rise from the certain representations of matters of fact. Natural history is the best philosophy; and so is the sacred history, both of the Old and New Testament, the most proper and grateful vehicle of sacred truth. These four gospels were early and constantly received by the primitive church, and read in christian assemblies, as appears by the writings of Justin Martyr and Irenæus, who lived little more than a hundred years after the ascension of Christ; they declared that neither more nor fewer than four were received by the church. A Harmony of these four evangelists was compiled by Tatian about that time, which he called, ἶα KA πατρίον — The Gospel out of the four. In the third and fourth centuries there were gospels forged by divers sects, and published, one under the name of St. Peter, another of St. Thomas, another of St. Philip, &c. But they were never owned by the church, nor was any credit given to them; as the learned Dr. Whitby shews. And he gives this good reason why he should adhere to these written records, because, whatever the pretenses of tradition may be, it is not sufficient to preserve things with any certainty, as appears by experience. For, whereas Christ said and did many memorable things, which were not written, (John 20. 30.—21. 25.) tradition has not preserved any one of them to us, but all is lost except what was written; that therefore is what we must abide by; and blessed be God that we have it to abide by; it is the sure word of history.

II. We have before us the Gospel according to St. Matthew. The penman was, by birth, a Jew, by calling a publican, till Christ commanded his attendance, and then he left the receipt of custom, to follow him, and was one of those that accompanied him all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out, beginning from the baptism of John unto the day that he was taken up, Acts 1. 21, 22. He was therefore a competent witness of what he has here recorded. He is said to have written this history about eight years after Christ’s ascension. Many of the ancients say that he wrote it in the Hebrew, or Syriac, language; but the tradition is sufficiently disproved by Dr. Whitby. Doubtless, it was written in Greek, as the other parts of the New Testament were; not in that language which was peculiar to the Jews, whose church and state were near a period, but in that which was common to the world, and in which the knowledge of Christ would be most effectually transmitted to the nations of the earth; yet it is probable that there might be an edition of it in Hebrew, published by St. Matthew himself, at the same time that he wrote it in Greek; the former for the Jews, the latter for the Gentiles, when he left Judea, to preach among the Gentiles. Let us bless God that we have it, and have it in a language which we understand.

ST. MATTHEW, I.

CHAP. I.

This evangelist begins with the account of Christ’s parentage and birth, the ancestors from whom he descended, and the manner of his entry into the world, to make it appear that he was indeed the Messiah promised; for it was foretold that he should be the son of David, and should be born of a virgin; and that he was so, is here plainly shewn; for here is, 1. His pedigree from Abraham in forty-two generations, three fourteens, v. 1. 17. II. An account of the circumstances of his birth, so far as was requisite to shew that he was born of a virgin, v. 18. 25. Thus methodically is the life of our blessed Saviour written, as lives should be written, for the clearer proposing of the example of them.

1. The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham. 2. Abraham begat Isaac; and Isaac begat Jacob; and Jacob begat Judas and his brethren; 3. And Judas begat Phares and Zara of Thamar; and Phares begat Esrom; and Esrom begat Aram; 4. And Aram begat Aminadab; and Aminadab begat Naasson; and Naasson begat Salmon; 5. And Salmon begat Booz of Rachab; and Booz begat Obed of Ruth; and Obed begat Jesse; 6. And Jesse begat David the king; and David the king begat Solomon; of her that had been the wife of Urias; 7. And Solomon begat Roboam; and Roboam begat Abi; and Abi begat Asa; 8. And Asa begat Josaphat; and Josaphat begat Joram; and Joram begat Ozias; 9. And Ozias begat Joatham; and Joatham begat Achaz; and Achaz begat Ezekias; 10. And Ezekias begat Manasses; and Manasses begat Amon; and Amon begat Josias; 11. And Josias begat Jechonias and his brethren, about the time they were carried away to Babylon: 12. And after they were brought to Babylon; Jechonias begat Salathiel; and Salathiel begat Zorobabel; 13. And Zorobabel begat Abiud; and Abiud begat Eliakim; and Eliakim begat Azor; 14. And Azor begat Sadoc; and Sadoc begat Achim; and Achim begat Eliud; 15. And Eliud begat Eleazar; and Eleazar begat Mathan; and Mathan begat Jacob: 16. And Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ. 17. So all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations; and from David until the carrying away into Babylon are fourteen generations; and from the carrying away into Babylon unto Christ are fourteen generations.

Concerning this genealogy of our Saviour, observe. I. The title of it. It is the book (or the account, in the Hebrew word aether—a book, sometimes signifies,) of the generation of Jesus Christ, of his ancestors, according to the flesh; or, It is the narrative of his birth. It is a breach review—a book of Genesis. The Old Testament begins with the book of the generation of the world, and it is its glory that it does so; but the glory of the New Testament herein excels, that it begins with the book of the generation of him that made the world. And, as this outgoings were of old, from Genesis, (Mic. 5. 2) and none can declare that generation; but, as Man, he was sent forth in the fulness of time, of a woman, and it is that generation which is here declared.

II. The principal intention of it. It is not an endless or needless genealogy; it is not a vain-glorious one, as those of great men commonly are. Scripture, good, forever, and sound, need no amending pedigrees. It is like a pedagogue given in evidence, to prove a title, and make out a claim; the design is to prove that our Lord Jesus is the Son of David, and the Son of Abraham, and therefore of that nation and family out of which the Messiah was to arise. Abraham and David were, in their day, the great trustees of the promise relating to the Messiah. The frames of the tables of the law are made to Abraham and his seed, of the dominion, to David and his seed; and they who would have an interest in Christ, as the Son of Abraham, in whom all the families of the earth are to be blessed, must be faithful, loyal subjects to him as the Son of Abraham, by whom all the families of the earth are to be ruled. It was promised to Abraham that Christ should descend from him, (Gen. 12: 3.—22. 18.) and to David, Matthew 2: 6. and about 2000 years. So long has it been generally supposed, that it is a question whether any person in the world can legally prove himself to be a son of Abraham; however, it is certain that none can prove himself to be either a son of Aaron, or a son of David, so that the priestly and kingly office must either be given up, as lost forever, or be lodged in the hands of our Lord Jesus. Christ is here first called the Son of David, because under that title he is the true and sole Messiah, and to that office the Jews. They who owned him to be the Christ, called him the Son of David, ch. 15. 22.—20. 31.—21. 13. This, therefore, the Evangelist undertakes to make out, that he is not only a Son of David, but that Son of David on whom the government was to be; not only a Son of Abraham, but that Son of Abraham, who was to be the Father of mercy.

In calling Christ the Son of David, and the Son of Abraham, he shows that God is faithful to his promise, and will make good every word that he has spoken; and this, 1. Though the performance be long deferred. When God promised Abraham a Son, who should be the great blessing of the world, perhaps he expected it should be his immediate son; but it proved to be one at the distance of forty-two generations. Therefore, if God's promise is to be believed, we must be content with a promise that is so dispersed and dispersed, from the Jews. They who owned him to be the Christ, called him the Son of David, ch. 15. 22.—20. 31.—21. 13. This, therefore, the Evangelist undertakes to make out, that he is not only a Son of David, but that Son of David on whom the government was to be; not only a Son of Abraham, but that Son of Abraham, who was to be the Father of mercy.

2. Though it begin to be despised of. 'This Son of David, and Son of Abraham, who was to be the Glory of his Father's house, was born then when the seed of Abraham was a despised people recently become tributary to the Roman yoke, and when the house of David was buried in obscurity; for Christ was to be a Root out of a dry ground.' Note, God's time for the performance of his promise, is, when it labours under the greatest improbabilities.

III. The particular series of it, drawn in a direct line from Abraham downward, according to the genealogies recorded in the beginning of the books of Chronicles, (as far as those go,) and which here we see the use of.

Some particulars we may observe in this genealogy.

1. Among the ancestors of Christ, who had brethren, generally, he descended from a younger brother; such Abraham himself was, and Jacob, and Judah, and David, and Nathan, and Rhesa; to show that though he descended from human and earthly princes, from the primogeniture of his ancestors, but from the will of God, who, according to the method of his providence, exalts them of low degree, and puts more abundant honour upon that part which lacked.

2. Among the sons of Jacob, beside Judah, from whom Shiloh came, notice is here taken of his brethren; Joseph and his brethren. The mention is made of Ishmael, the son of Abraham, and of Esau, the son of Isaac, because they were shut out of the church; whereas all the children of Jacob were taken in, and though not fathers of Christ, were yet patriarchs of the church, (Acts 7. 8.) and therefore are mentioned in this genealogy, for the encouragement of the twelve tribes that were scattered abroad, intimating to them that they have an interest in Christ, and stood in the church.

3. Phares and Zara, the twin-sons of Judah, are likewise both named, though Phares only was Christ's ancestor, for the same reason that the brethren of Judah are taken notice of; some think because the birth of Phares and Zara had something of allegory in it. Zara put out his hand first, as the first-born, but drawing it in, Phares got the birth-right. The Jewish church, like Zara, was the first-born, and was proved to be a rightful inheritor, but Phares, the Gentile church, like Phares, took possession of the inheritance, and in the name of the Gentiles, the promise which was made to Abraham were fulfilled. Moreover, the seed of Zara is mentioned, because this son of Jacob, was the progenitor of the foremen of the tribes of Israel, (Num. 1. 10.) so that Isaac was the father of Jacob, and Jacob the father of Phares and Zara, and therefore Isaac is placed before Jacob in his genealogy; as Abraham is before Isaac, and David is before Abraham, and therefore we are to read Isaac, as Abraham, and not as Jacob, the son of Isaac.

4. There are four women, and but four, named in this genealogy; two of them were originally strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, Rahab a Canaanitish harlot, besides, and Ruth the Moabitess; for in Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew; those that are strangers and foreigners are welcome, in Christ, to the citizenship of the saints. The other two were adulteresses, Tamar and Bathsheba; which was a further mark of humiliation put upon our Lord Jesus, that not only he descended from such, but that his descent from them is particularly remarked in his genealogy, as being a notice to himself, and to every succeeding age, that he was made perfect through humiliation, (Heb. 2. 9.) and that the likeness of sinful flesh, (Rom. 8. 3.) and taken even great sinners, upon their repentance, into the nearest relations to himself. Note, we ought not to upbraud people with the scandals of their ancestors; it is what they cannot help, and has been the lot of the best, even of our Master himself. David's begetting Solomon of her that had been the wife of Urias, is taken notice of. (2. Kings 11.) To shew that crime that was committed by David, being repented of, was so far from hindering the promise made to him, that it pleased God by this very woman to fulfil it.

5. Though divers kings are here named, yet none is expressly called a king, but David, (v. 6.) David the king; because with him the covenant of royalty was made, and to him the promise of the kingdom of the Messiah was given as well as to Joseph, and therefore with him thethrone of his father David, Luke 1. 32.

6. In the pedigree of the kings of Judah, between Joram and Ozias, (v. 8.) there are three left out, Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah; and therefore when it is said, Joram begat Ozias, it is meant, according to the usage of the Hebrew tongue, that Ozias was lineally descended from him, as it is said to Hezekiah, that the sons which he should beget should be carried to Babylon, whereas they writing under the Mosaic law, added several Jews, who were not through mistake or forgetfulness that these three were omitted, but, probably, they were omitted in the genealogical tables that the Evangelist consulted, which yet were admitted as authentic. Some give this reason for it.—It being Matthew's design, for the sake of memory, to reduce the number of Christ's ancestors to three fourteen, it was requisite that in this period three should be left out, and none more fit than they who were the immediate progeny of the patriarchs, who introduced the idolatry of Ahab into the house of David; for which this brand is set upon the family, and the iniquity thus visited to the third and fourth generation. Two of these three were apostates; and such God commonly sets a mark of his displeasure upon in this world; they all three had their heads brought to the grave by God. 7. Some observe what a mixture there was of good and bad, in the succession of these kings; as for instance, (v. 7, 8.) wicked Roboam begat wicked Abia; wicked Abia begat good Asa; good Asa begat good Josaphat; good Josaphat begat wicked Joram. Grace does not run in the blood, nor does reigning sin. God's grace is his own, and he gives or withholds it as he pleases. 8. The captivity in Babylon is mentioned as a remarkable period in this line, v. 11, 12. All things considered, it was a wonder that the Jews were not lost in that captivity, as other nations have been; but this intimates the reason why the streams of that people were kept to run pure through that dead sea, because from them, as concerning the flesh, Christ was to come. Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it. 9. Of such blessings, Christ himself, Isa. 65. 8, 9. It was with an eye to him they were restored, and the desolations of the sanctuary were looked upon with favour for the Lord's sake, Dan. 9. 17. 10. Josias is here said to beget Jechonias and his brethren; (v. 11.) by Jechonias is meant Jehoiakim, who was the first-born of Josias; but when it is said, (v. 12.) that Jechonias begat Salathiel, that Jechonias was the son of that Jehoiakim who was carried into Babylon, and there begat Salathiel, (as Dr. Whitby shews,) and when Jechonias is said to have been childless, (Jer. 22. 30.) it is explained thus; No man of his seed shall prosper. Salathiel is here said to beget Zorobabel, whereas Salathiel begat Pedahaz, and he begat Zorobabel (1 Chron. 3. 1.) but as before, the grandson is often called the son; Pedahaz was likely, died in his father's life-time, and so his son Zorobabel was called the son of Salathiel. 11. The line is brought down not to Mary, the mother of our Lord, but to Joseph, the husband of Mary; (v. 16.) for the Jews always reckoned their genealogies by the males; yet Mary was of the same tribe and family with Joseph, so that, both by the mother and by this supposed father, he was of the house of David; yet his interest in that dignity is derived by Joseph, to whom really, according to the flesh, he had no relation, to shew that the kingdom of the Messiah is not founded in a natural descent from David. 12. The centre in whom all these lines meet, is Jesus, who is called Christ, v. 16. This is the character which God has given him, a greatly expected, and to whom the patriarchs had an eye when they were so desirous of children, that they might have the honour of coming into the sacred line. Blessed be God, we are not now in such a dark and cloudy state of expectation as they were then in, but see clearly what these prophets and kings saw as through a glass darkly. And we may have some idea of the approach of Christ, a greater honour than that of which they were so ambitious; for they who do the will of God, are in a more honourable relation to Christ, than those who were akin to him according to the flesh, ch. 12. 50. Jesus is called Christ, that is, the Anointed, the same with the Hebrew name Messiah. He is called Messiah the Prince, (Dan. 9. 25.) and often God's Anointed, (Ps. 2. 2.) Under this character he was expected; Art thou the Christ—the Anointed one? David, the king, was anointed; (1 Sam. 16. 13.) so was Aaron, the priest, (Lev. 3. 12.) and Eliasha, the prophet, (1 Kings 19. 16.) and the succeeding kings also; but being appointed to, and qualified for, all these offices, is therefore called the Anointed—anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows; and from this name of his, which is as ointment poured forth, all his followers are called Christians, for they also have received the anointing. Lastly. The general summary of all this genealogy was placed in v. 17, where it is summed up in three fourteen, signalized by remarkable periods. In the first fourteen, we have the family of David rising, and looking forth as the morning; in the second, we have it flourishing in its meridian lustre; in the third, we have it declining and growing less and less, dwindled into the family of a poor carpenter, and then Christ shines forth out of it, the Glory of his people Israel. 18. Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost. 19. Then Joseph her husband, being an only, not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost. 21. And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins. 22. Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, 23. Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted, is God with us. 24. Then Joseph, being raised from sleep, did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him, and took unto his wife: 25. And knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born son: and he called his name Jesus. The mystery of Christ's incarnation is to be adored, not prayed into. If we know not the way of the Spirit in the formation of common persons, nor how the bones are formed in the womb of the blessed child, (Eccles. 11. 5.) much less do we know how the blessed Jesus was formed in the womb of the blessed virgin. When David admires how he himself was made in secret, and curiously wrought, (Ps. 139. 13—16.) perhaps he speaks, in spirit, of Christ's incarnation. Some circumstances attending the birth of Christ we find here, which are not in Luke, though it is more largely recorded there. Here we have, v. 17. I. Mary's espousals to Joseph. Mary, the mother of our Lord, was espoused to Joseph, not completely married, but contracted; a purpose of marriage solemnly declared in words de futuro—that regarded the future, and a promise of it made if God per in his breast, between that jealousy which is the rage of man, and is cruel as the grave, on the one hand, and that affection which he has for Mary, on the other.

Observe. 1. The extremity which he studied to avoid. He was not willing to make her a public example. He might have done it; for, by the law, a betrothed virgin, if she play the harlot, was to be stoned to death, Deut. 22, 23, 24. But he was not willing to take the advantage of the law against her: if she be guilty, yet it is not known, nor shall it be known from him. How different was the spirit which Joseph displayed from that of Judah, who in a similar case hastily passed that severe sentence, "Bring her forth and let her be burnt!" Gen. 38, 24. How good is it to think on things, as Joseph did here! Were there more of deliberation in our censures and judgments, there would be more of mercy and moderation in them. Bringing her to punishment, is here called making her a public example; which shews what is the end to be aimed at in punishments—giving warning to others: it is in terrorem—that calamities may befall, and the simple will beware.

Some persons of a rigorous temper would blame Joseph for his clemency, but it is here spoken of to his praise; because he was a just man, therefore he was not willing to expose her. He was a religious, good man; and therefore inclined to be merciful as God is, and to forgive as one that was forgiven. In the case of a betrothed damsel, if she were found in the field, the law charitably supposed that she cried out, (Deut. 22, 26,) and she was not to be punished. Some charitable construction or other Joseph will put upon this matter; herein he is a just man, tender of the good name of one who never before had done any thing to blemish it. Note, It becomes us, in many cases, to be gentle toward those that come under suspicion of having offended, to hope the best concerning them, and make the best of them and what at first appears bad, in hopes it may prove better. Summum jus summa injuria—The rigour of the law is (sometimes) the height of injustice. That court of conscience which moderates the rigour of the law, we call a court of equity. Those who are found faulty were perhaps overtaken in the fault, and are therefore to be restored with the spirit of meekness.

2. The petition he found out for avoiding this calamity. He was minded to put her away privily, that is, to give a bill of divorce into her hand before two witnesses, and so to hush up the matter among themselves. Being a just man, a strict observer of the law, he would not proceed to marry her, but resolved to put her away; and yet, in tenderness for her, determined to do it as privately as possible. Note, the necessary censures of those who have offended, ought to be managed without noise. The court of equity is the spirit. Christ himself shall not strive nor cry. Christian love and christian prudence will hide a multitude of sins, and great ones, as far as may be done without having fellowship with them.

IV. Joseph's discharge from this perplexity by an express sent from heaven; (v. 20, 21.) While he thought on these things, and knew not what to determine, God graciously directed him, and made him a clear way out of the difficulty. Note, Those who would have direction from God, must think on things themselves, and consult with themselves. It is the thoughtful, not the unthinking, whom God will guide. When he was at a loss, and had carried the matter as far as he could in his own thoughts, then God came in with advice. Note, God's time to come in with instruction to his people, is when they are nonplussed, and at a loss; God's comforts most delight the soul, in the multitude of its perplexed thoughts.
The message was sent to Joseph by an angel of the Lord; probably, the same angel that brought to Mary the tidings of the conception—the angel Gabriel. Now that the intercourse with heaven, by angels, with which the patriarchs had been dignified, but which had been long disused, begins to be revived; for when the First-Begotten is to be brought into the world, the angels are ordered to attend his motions. How far God may now, in an invisible way, make use of the ministration of angels, for extricating his people out of their straits, we cannot say; but this we know, that this is the manner of his dispensation: by spirits for their good. This angel appeared to Joseph in a dream, when he was aslepp, as God sometimes spake unto the fathers. When we are most quiet and composed, we are in the best frame to receive the notices of the divine will. The Spirit moves on the calm waters. This dream, no doubt, carried its own evidence along with it, that it was of God, and not the production of a vain fancy.

Now, 1. Joseph is here directed to proceed in his intended marriage. The angel calls him, Joseph, thou son of David: he puts him in mind of his relation to David, that he might be prepared to receive this surprising intelligence of his relation to the Messiah, who, every one knew, was to be a descendant from David. Sometimes, when great honor is to be conceived of these who have small estate, they care not for accepting them; but are willing to drop them; it was therefore requisite to put this poor carpenter in mind of his high birth;

1. Value thyself. Joseph, thou art that son of David, through whom the line of the Messiah is to be drawn. We may thus say to every true believer;

2. Fear not, thou son of Abraham, thou child of God; forget not the dignity of thy birth, thy new birth.

But fear not to take Mary thy wife; so it may be read. Joseph, suspecting she was with child by whoredom, was afraid of taking her, lest he should bring upon himself either guilt or reproach. No, saith God, Fear not; the matter is not so. Perhaps Mary had told him that she was with child by the Holy Ghost, and he might have heard what Elisabeth said to Zechariah, (Luke 1. 42.) when she called her the mother of her Lord for thy wife; so it may be read. But from whatever cause his fears arose, they were all silenced with this word, Fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife. Note, It is a great mercy to be delivered from our fears, and to have our doubts resolved, so as to proceed in our affairs with satisfaction.

2. He is here informed concerning that Holy Thing, with which his espoused wife was now pregnant. That which is conceived in her, is of a divine original. He is so far from being in danger of sharing in an impurity by marrying her, that he will thereby share in the highest dignity he is capable of. Two things he is told,

1. That she had conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost; that is, of the power of heaven, the Holy Spirit, who produced the world, now produced the Saviour of the world, and prepared him a body, as was promised him, when he said, Lo, I come, Heb. 10. 5. Hence he is said to be made of a woman, (Gal. 4. 4.) and yet to be that second Adam, that is, the Lord from heaven, 1 Cor. 15. 47. He is the Son of God, and yet so far partakes of the substance of his father, as they who are called his brothers, Luke 1. 3. This is requisite that his conception should be otherwise than by ordinary generation, that so, though he partook of the human nature, yet he might escape the corruption and pollution of it, and not be conceived and shapen in iniquity. History tells us of some who vainly pretended to have conceived by a divine power, as the mother of Alexander; but none ever really did so, except the mother of our Lord. His name in this, as in other things, is, Wonderful. We do not read that the Virgin Mary did herself proclaim the honour done her; but she hid in her heart, and therefore God sent an angel to attest it. Those who seek not their own glory shall have the honour that comes from God; it is reserved for the humble.

(2.) That she should bring forth the Saviour of the world; (v. 21.) She shall bring forth a Son; what he shall be, is, he is,

1. In the name that shall be given to her Son; This shall be called Jesus, a Saviour. Jesus is the same name with Joshua, the termination only being changed, for the sake of conforming it to the Greek. Joseph is called Jesus, (Acts 7. 45. Heb. 4. 8.) from the Seventy. There were two of that name under the Old Testament, who were both illustrious types of Christ; Joshua, who was Israel's Captain at their first settlement in Canaan; and Jesus, who was their High-Priest at their second settlement after the captivity, Zech. 6. 11, 12.

Christ is our Joshua; both the Captain of our salvation, and the High-Priest of our profession, and, in both, our Saviour;—a Joshua who comes in the stead of Moses, and does that for us, which the law could not do, in that it was weak. Joshua had been called Hoshea, but Moses prefixed the first syllable of the name to Joshua, and so made it Jehovshua, (Num. 14. 8.) when he was told that the Messiah, who was to bear that name, should be Jehovshua; he is therefore able to save to the uttermost, neither is there salvation in any other.

2. In the reason of that name; For he shall save his people from their sins; not the nation of the Jews only, (he came to his own, and they received him not;) but all who were given him by the Father's grace, and all who have given themselves to him, are his own. He is a King who protects his subjects, and, as the Judges of Israel of old, works salvation for them. Note, Those whom Christ saves, he saves from their sins; from the guilt of sin by the merit of his death, from the dominion of sin by the Spirit of his grace. In saving them from sin, he saves them from wrath and the curse, and all misery here and hereafter; he does this, not from sin and misery, but from their sins; but from their sins; to purchase for them, not a liberty to sin, but a liberty from sins, to redeem them from all iniquity; (Tit. 2. 14.) and so to redeem them from among men, (Rev. 14. 4.) to himself, who is separate from sinners. So that those who leave their sins, and give up themselves to Christ as his people, are interested in the Saviour, and the great salvation which he hath wrought out, Rom. 11. 26.

V. The fulfilling of the scripture, in all this. This evangelist, writing among the Jews, more frequently observes this than any other of the evangelists. Here, the Old-Testament prophecies had their accomplishment in our Lord Jesus; by which it appears, that this was He that should come, and we are to look for no other; for this was He to whom all the posterity of the people of God were promised, (v. 15. 16.) and this promise was fulfilled in the birth of Christ, was that promise of a sign which God gave to king Ahaz, (Isa. 7. 14.) Behold, a virgin shall conceive; where the prophet, encouraging the people of God to hope for the promised deliverance from Semmacherib's invasion, directs them to look forward to the Messiah, who was to come of the people of the Jews, and the house of David; whence it is easy to see how the people and that house were afflicted, yet neither the one nor the other could be abandoned to ruin, so long as God had such an honour, such a blessing, in reserve for them. The deliverances which God wrought for the Old-Testament church, were types and figures of the great salvation by Christ; and if God will do the greater, he will not fail to do the less.
The prophecy here quoted is justly ushered in with a Behold, which commands both attention and admirations; for we have here the mystery of god-liness, which was hid in ages past, but is now manifested in the flesh. The word Alam signifies a virgin, in the strictest sense, such as Mary professes herself to be, Luke 1. 34. I know not a man; nor had it been any such wonderful thing as it was intended for, if it had been otherwise. It is said, that the beginning of the Messiah should be born of a virgin, when it was said that he should be the Seed of the woman; so the Seed of the woman, as not to be the seed of any man. Christ was born of a virgin, not only because his birth was to be supernatural, and altogether extraordinary, but because it was to be spotless, and pure, and without any stain of sin. Christ would be born, not of an Empress or Queen, for he appeared not in outward pomp or splendor, but of a virgin, to teach us spiritual purity, to die to all the delights of sense, and so to keep ourselves unspotted from the world and the flesh, that we may be presented chaste virgins to Christ.

2. The truth proved by this sign, is, that he is the Son of God, and the Mediator between God and man; for they shall call his name Immanuel; that is, he shall be Immanuel; when it is said He shall be called, it is meant, he shall be, the Lord our Righteousness.
Immanuel signifies God with us; a mysterious name, but very precious; God incarnate among us, and so God reconcilable to us, at peace with us, and taking us into covenant and communion with himself. The people of the Jews had God with them, in types and shadows, dwelling between the cherubim; but never so as when the Word was made flesh—that was the blessed Shechinah. What a happy step is hereby taken toward the settling of a peace and correspondence between God and man, that the two natures are thus brought together in the person of the Mediator; by this he became an unexceptionable Reference, a Days-Man, fit to lay his hand upon them both, since he partakes of the nature of both. Behold, in this, the deepest mystery, and the richest eracy, that ever was. By the light of nature, we see God as a God above us; by the light of the law, we see him as a God against us; but by the light of prophecy, we see him, and that as God with us; in our own nature, and (which is more) in our interest. Herein the Redeemer commended his love.
With Christ's name Immanuel we may compare the name given to the gospel church. (Ezek. 48. 35.)
Jehovah Shammah—The Lord is there; the Lord of hosts is with us.

Nor is it improper to say that the prophecy which foreshadowed what he should be called Immanuel, was fulfilled in this sense, as well as in that, in which he was called Jesus; for if he had not been Immanuel—God with us, he could not have been Jesus—A Saviour; and herein consists the salvation he brought out, in the bringing of God and man together. This was what he designed, to bring God to be with us, which is our great happiness, and to bring us to be with God, which is our great duty.

1. Joseph's obedience to the divine precept; (v.
24.) brought him forth in accordance with the dream made upon him, he did as the Lord had bidden him, thinking it was contrary to his former sentiments and intentions; he took unto his wife; he did it speedily, without delay, and cheerfully, without dispute; he was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. Extraordinary direction like this we are not now to expect; but God has still ways of making known his mind in doubtful cases, by hints of providence, debates of conscience, and advice of faithful friends; by each of these, applying the general rules of the written word, we should, therefore, in all the steps of our life, particularly the great turns of it, such as this of Joseph's, who direction from God, and we shall find it safe and comfortable to do as he bids us.

VII. The accomplishment of the divine promise;
(v. 25.) She brought forth her first-born son. The circumstances of it are more largely related, Luke
2. 1, &c. Note, That which is conformed of the Holy Ghost never proves abortive, but will certainly be brought forth in its season. What is of the will of the flesh, and of the will of man, often miscarries;
but if Christ be formed in the soul, God himself has begun the good work which he will perform; what is conceived in grace, will, no doubt, be brought forth in glory.

It is here further observed, 1. That Joseph, though he solemnized the marriage with Mary, his espoused wife, kept at a distance from her while she was with child of this holy thing; he knew her not till she had brought him forth. Much has been said concerning the perpetual virginity of the mother of our Lord; Jerome was very angry with Helvidius for denying it. It is certain that it cannot be proved from scripture. Dr. Whitby inclines to think, that when it is said, Joseph knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born, it is intended that, afterward, the reason ceasing, he lived with her, according to the law, Exod. 21. 10. 2. That Christ was the First-Born; and so he might be called, though his mother had not any other children after him, according to the language of scripture. Nor was it without a mystery that Christ is called her First-Born, for he is the First-born of every creature, that is, the Heir of all things; and he is the First-Born among many brethren, that in all things he may have the pre-eminence. 3. That Joseph called his name Jesus, according to the direction given him by God; he was called Jesus Saviour, which was intended in his giving him the name Jesus, we must accept of him to be our Savior, and, in concurrence with that appointment, we must call him Jesus, our Saviour.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter, we have the history of our Saviour's infancy, where we find how early he began to suffer, and that in him the word of righteousness was fulfilled, before him began he was called God's Favourer. His birth brought forth many wise men's solicitor inquiry after Christ, v. 1. 2. 8. 11. Their devout attendance on him, when they found out where he was, v. 9. 12. III. Christ's flight into Egypt, to avoid the cruelty of Herod, v. 13. 14. IV. The barbarous murder of the infants of Bethlehem, v. 16. 18. V. Christ's return out of Egypt into the land of Israel again, v. 19. 23.

1. NOW when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judaea in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, 2. Saying Where is he that is born King of the Jews?
For we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him. 3. When Herod the king had heard these things, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him.
4. And when he had gathered all the chief priests and scribes of the people together, he demanded of them where Christ should be born. 5. And they said unto him, In Bethlehem of Judaea: for thus it is written by the prophet. 6. And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel. 7. Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men, inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared. 8. And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, Go and search diligently for the young child; and when ye have found him, bring me word again, that I may come and worship him also.

It was a mark of humiliation put upon the Lord Jesus, that though he was the Desire of all nations, yet his coming into the world was little observed and taken notice of; his birth was not regarded: herein he emptied himself, and made himself of no reputation. If the son of God must be brought into the world, one might justly expect that he should be received with all the ceremony possible; that crowns and sceptres should immediately have been laid at his feet, and that the high and mighty princes of the world should have been his humble servants; such a Messiah as this the Jews expected, but was not content with the homage of the world, and the world knew him not; nay, he came to his own, and his own received him not; for having undertaken to make satisfaction to his Father for the wrong done him in his honour by the sin of man, he did it by denying himself in, and despoothing himself of, the honours undoubtedly due to an incarnate Deity; yet, as afterward, so in his birth, some rays of glory out of the darkness that shone; as the greatest instances of his abasement. Though there was the hiding of his power, yet he had beams coming out of his hand, (Hab. S. 4.) enough to condemn the world, and the Jews especially, for their stupidity.

The first who took notice of Christ after his birth, were the shepherds, (Luke 2. 15, &c.) who saw and heard glorious things concerning him, and made them known abroad, to the amazement of all that heard them, v. 17, 18. After that, Simeon and Anna spake of him, by the Spirit, to all that were disposed to heed what they said, Luke 2. 38. Now, one would think, these hints should have been taken by the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and they should with both arms have embraced the long-looked-for Messiah; but, for aught that appears, he continued nearly two years after at Bethlehem unheeded. Those who have been of these wise men came. Note, Nothing will awaken those that are resolved to be regardless. Oh the amazing stupidity of these Jews! And no less, that of many who are called Christians! Observe,

I. When this enquiry was made concerning Christ; it was in the days of Herod the King. This Herod was an Edomite, made king of Judea by Augustus and Antonius, the then chief rulers of the Roman state, a man made up of falsehood and cruelty; yet he was complimented with the title of Herod the Great. Christ was born in the 35th year of his reign, and notice is taken of this, to shew that the scripture was now departed from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet; and therefore now was the time for Shiloh to come, and to him shall the gathering of the people be, witness the wise men, Gen. 49. 10.

II. Who and what these wise men were; they are here called Melchizedek—Magicians. Some take it in a good sense; the Magi among the Persians were their philosophers, and their priests; nor would they admit any one for their king who had not first been enrolled among the Magi; others think they dealt in unlawful arts; the word is used of Simon, the sorcerer, (Acts 8. 9, 11.) and of Elymas, the sorcerer, (Acts 13. 6.) nor does the scripture use it in any other sense; and then it was an early int stance and presence of Christ’s victory over the Devil, when those who had been so much his devotees, became the early adorers even of the infant Jesus; so soon were trophies of his victory over the powers of darkness erected. Well, whatever sort of wise men they were before, now they began to be wise men indeed when they set themselves to inquire of Christ.

This we are sure of, 1. That they were Gentiles, and not belonging to the commonwealth of Israel. The Jews regarded not Christ, but these Gentiles inquired him out. Note, Many times those who are nearest to the means, are furthest from the end. See ch. 8. 11, 12. The respect paid to Christ by these Gentiles was a happy presage and specimen of what would follow, when those who were after off should be made nigh by Christ. 2. That they were scholars, they dealt in arts, curious arts; good scholars should be good Christians, and then they complete their learning when they learn Christ. 3. That they were men of the east, who were noted for their soothsaying. Isa. 2. 6. Arabia is called the land of the east, (Gen. 23. 6.) and the Arabians are called, Men of the east, Judg. 8. 3. The presents which they brought were of all sorts, of gold, frankincense, and myrrh. If the Arabians had done homage to David and Solomon as types of Christ. Jethro and Job were of that country. More than this we have not to say of them. The traditions of the Romish church are frivolous, that they were in number three, (though one of the ancients says that they were fourteen,) that they were kings, and that they lie buried in Canaan, there called the three kings of Colch; we coveted not to be wise above what is written.

III. What induced them to make this inquiry. They, in their country, which was in the east, had seen an extraordinary star, such as they had not seen before; which they took to be an indication of an extraordinary person born in the land of Judea, over which land this star was seen to hover, in the nature of a comet, or a meteor rather, in the lower regions of the air; this differed so much from any thing that was common, that they concluded it to signify something uncommon. Note, Extraordinary appearances of God in the creatures, should put us upon inquiring after his mind and will therein; Christ foretold signs in the heavens. The birth of Christ was notified to the Jewish shepherds by an angel, to the Gentile philosophers by a star; to the Jews it was by a visible sign, to the Gentiles in a mysterious way they were best acquainted with. Some think that that very light which the shepherds saw shining round about them the night after Christ was born, was the very same which, to the wise men who lived at such a distance, appeared as a star; which we cannot easily admit, because the star they had seen in the east, they saw a great while after, leading them to the house where Christ lay; it was a candle set up on purpose to guide them to Christ. The idolaters worshipped the stars as the host of heaven, especially the eastern nations, whence the planets have the names of their idol-gods; we read of a particular star they had in veneration, Amos 5. 26. Thus the stars that had been missed, came to be put to the right use, to lead men to Christ, and so serve as instruments of his salvation. Some think this star put them in mind of Balaam’s prophecy, that a star should come out of Jacob, pointing at a scripture that shall rise out of Israel; see Numb. 24. 17. Balaam came from the mountains of the east, and was one of their wise men. Others impute their inquiry to the general expectation entertained at that time, in those eastern parts, of some great prince to appear, (Titus, in his history, (Lch. v.) takes notice of it;) Plutarchus persusius inerat, antiquus sorcerorum litteris continentis, eo osido tempore forte, ut valescere Oriens,
But though Herod, an Edomite, was troubled, one would have thought Jerusalem should rejoice greatly to hear that her King comes; yet, it seems, all Jerusalem, except the few there that waited for the Conolation of Israel, were troubled with Herod, and were apprehensive of 1 know not what ill consequences of the birth of this new King; that it would involve them in war, or restrain their lusts; they, for their parts, desired no King but Herod; no, not the Messiah himself. Note, The slaying of Sin is foolishly preferred by many to the glorious liberty of the children of God, only because they apprehend some present difficulties attending that necessary revolution of the government in the soul. Herod and Jerusalem were thus troubled, from a mistaken notion that the kingdom of the Messiah would clash and interfere with the secular powers; whereas the Messiah that proclaimed him King, plainly promis ed that his kingdom should begin in the power of this lower world. Note, The reason why the kings of the earth, and the people, oppose the kingdom of Christ, is, because they do not know it, but err concerning it.

V. What assistance they met with in this inquiry from the scribes and the priests, v. 4—6. Nobody can pretend to tell where the King of the Jews is born, this, but Herod expected he should be born. The persons he consulted were, the chief priests, who were now teachers by office; and the scribes, who made it their business to study the law; their minds must keep knowledge, but then the people must inquire the law at their mouth, Mal. 2. 7. It was generally known that Christ should be born at Bethlehem; (John 7. 42.) but Herod would have counsel’s opinion upon it, and more especially where it was no secret, and, that he might be the better satisfied, he had them altogether, all the chief priests, and all the scribes; and deni als of them what was the place, according to the scriptures of the Old Testament, where Christ should be born! Many a good question is put with an ill design, so was this by Herod.

The priests and scribes need not take any long time to give this answer to this question; nor do they differ in their opinion, but agree, that the Messiah must be born in Bethlehem, the city of David, here called Bethlehem of Judah, to distinguish it from another city of the same name in the land of Zebulun, Josh. 19. 15. Bethlehem signifies the house of bread; the fittest place for him to be born in, who is the true Manna, the bread which came down from heaven, which was given for the life of the world. The proof they produce is taken from Mic. 5. 2. where it is foretold, that though Bethlehem should be but as among the thousands of Judah, (so it is in Micah,) no very populous place, yet it shall be found not the least among the princes of Judah; (so it is here;) for Bethlehem’s honour lay not, as that of other cities, in the multitude of the people, but in the magnificence of the princes it produced. Though, upon some accounts, Bethlehem was little, yet herein it was the prince of the cities of Israel, that the Lord should count, when he wrote, the people, that this Man, even the Man Jesus Christ was born there, Ps. 87. 6. Out of thee shall come a Governor, the King of the Jews. Note, Christ will be a Saviour to those only who are willing to take him for their Governor. Bethlehem was the city of David, and David the glory of Bethlehem; there, therefore, must David’s Son and Successor be born. There was a famous well at the gate of Bethlehem, by the gate, which David longed to drink of; (2. Sam. 23. 15.) in Christ we have not only bread enough and to spare, but may come and take also of the water of life freely. Observe here, how Jews and Gentiles compare notes about Jesus Christ. The Gentiles know the time of it by a star; the Jews knew the place of it by the scriptures; and so, they are capable of informing one another. Note, It would contribute much to the increase of knowledge, if we did thus mutually communicate what we know. Men grow rich by bartering and exchanging, so, if we have knowledge to communicate to others, they will be ready to communicate to us; thus many shall discourse, shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.

VII. The bloody project and design of Herod, occasioned by this inquiry, v. 7. 8. Herod was now an old man; had reigned thirty-five years; this King was but newly born, and not likely to enterprise any thing considerable for many years; yet Herod is jealous, and his courtiers frown, and Herod's head cannot endure to think of successors, much less of rivals; and therefore nothing less than the blood of this infant King will satisfy him; and he will not give himself liberty to think that, if this new-born Child should be indeed the Messiah, in opposing him, or making any attempts upon him, he would be found fighting against God, than which nothing is more vain, nothing more dangerous. Passion has got the mastery of reason and conscience.

Note, Now, 1. See how cunningly he laid the project; (v. 7, 8.) He privily called the wise men, to talk with them about this matter. He would not openly own his fears and jealousies; it would be his disgrace to let the wise men know them, and dangerous to let the people know them. Siners are often tormented with secret fears, which they keep to themselves. Herod learns of the wise men the time when the star appeared, that he might take his measures accordingly; and then employs them to inquire further, and bids them bring him an account. All this might look suspicious, if he had not covered it with a shew of religion; that I may come and worship him also. Note, The greatest wickedness often conceals itself under a mask of piety. Absalom cloaks his rebellious project with a vow.

2. See how strangely he was befuddled and infatuated in this, that he trusted it with the wise men, and did not choose some other managers, that would have been true to his interests. It was but seven miles from Jerusalem; how easily might he have sent spies to watch the wise men, who might have as soon have found out the Child as they would have. Note, God can hide his own people from the eye of the church's enemies, by those methods by which they might easily destroy the church; when he intends to lead princes away spoiled, his way is to make the judges fools.

9. When they had heard the king, they departed; and, lo, the star which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.

10. When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. 11. And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down, and worshipped him: and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh. 12. And being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.
II. We should be glad of every thing that will shew us the way to Christ. This star was sent to meet the wise men, and to conduct them into the presence-chamber of the King; by this master of the ceremonies they were introduced, to have their audience. Now God fulfils his promise of meeting those that are disposed to rejoice, and work righteousness, (Isa. 64. 5.) by sending this their precept.

Let the righteous rejoice that seek the Lord, Ps. 105. 3. Note, God is pleased sometimes to favour young converts with such tokens of his love as are very encouraging to them, in reference to the difficulties they meet with at their setting out in the ways of God.

II. See how they made their address to him when they had found him, v. 11. We may well imagine their expectations were raised to find this royal Babe, so high slighted by the nation, yet honourably attended at home; and what a disappointment it was to them, when they found a cottage was his palace, and his own poor mother all the retinue he had! Is this the Saviour of the world? Is this the King of the Jews, nay, and the Prince of the kings of the earth? Yes, this is he, who, though he was rich, yet, for our sakes, became thus poor. However, these wise men were so wise as to see through this veil, and in this despised Babe to discern the glory of the Only-begotten of the Father; they did not think themselves balked or baffled in their inquiry; but, as having found the King they sought, they presented themselves first, and then their gifts, to him.

1. They presented themselves to him; they fell down, and worshipped him. We do not read that they bowed to him, though he was in the height of his royal grandeur; but to this Babe, they gave this honour, not only as to a King, (then they would have done the same to Herod,) but as to a God. Note, All that have found Christ fall down before him; they adore him, and submit themselves to him. He is thy Lord, and worship thou him. It will be the wisdom of the wisest of men, and by this it will appear they know Christ, and understand themselves and their true interests, if they be the humble, faithful worshippers of the Lord Jesus.

2. They presented their gifts to him. In the eastern nations, when they did homage to their kings, they made them presents; thus the subject of the kings of Sheba to Christ is spoken of, (Ps. 72. 10.) They shall bring presents, and offer gifts. See Isa. 60. 6. Note, With ourselves, we must give up all that we have to Jesus Christ; and if we be sinners, who surrender ourselves to him, we shall not be unwilling to part with what is dearest to us, and most valuable, to him and for him; nor are our gifts accepted, unless we first present ourselves to him living sacrifices. God had respect to Abel, and then to his offering. The gifts they presented were, gold, frankincense, and myrrh, money, and money's-worth. See Luke 1. 34 this for a seasonable relief to Joseph and Mary in their distresses. These were the products of their own country; what God favours us with, we must honour him with. Some think there was a significance in their gifts; they offered him gold, as a King, paying him tribute; to Caesar, the things that are Caesar's; frankincense, as God, for they honoured God with the smoke of incense; and myrrh, as a Man that should die, for myrrh was used in embalming dead bodies.

III. See how they left him when they had made their address to him, v. 12. Herod appointed them to bring him word what discoveries they had made, and, it is probable, they would have done so, if they had not been countermanded, not suspecting then God thus using his tools in a wicked design. Those that mean honestly and well themselves are easily made to believe that others do so too, and cannot think the world is so bad as really it is; but the Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation. We do not find that the wise men promised to come back to Herod, and, if they had, it must have been with the usual prisoner's file. God did not take them, and prevented the mischief Herod designed to the Child Jesus, and the trouble it would have been to the wise men to have been made involuntarily accessory to it. They were warned of God, χείρισθη τοισωδίαν—ορακολόν τοις ῥυποσισκολογημένοις—an oracular intimation. Some think that it intimates that they asked counsel of God, and that this was the answer. Note, Those that act cautiously, and are sincere and serious, if they apply themselves to God for direction, may expect to be led in the right way. They were warned not to return to Herod, or to Jerusalem; these were unworthy to have reports brought them concerning Christ, that might have seen with their own eyes, and would not. They departed into their own country another way, to bring the tidings to their countrymen; but it is strange that we never hear any more of these wise men, nor that they or their did not afterwards attend him in the temple, whom they had worshipped in the cradle. However, the direction they had from God in their return would be a further confirmation of their faith in this Child, as the Lord from heaven.

13. And when they were departed, behold, the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word: for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him. 14. When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt; 15. And was there until the death of Herod: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my son.

We have here Christ's flight into Egypt, to avoid the cruelty of Herod, which was the effect of the wise men's inquiry after him; for, before that, the obscurity he lay in was his protection. It was but little respect (compared with what should have been) that was paid to Christ in his infancy; yet even that, instead of honouring him among his people, did but excite his persecutors. No now observe,

I. The command given to Joseph concerning it, v. 13. Joseph knew neither the danger the Child was in, nor how to escape it; but God, by an angel, tells him both in a dream, as before he directed him in like manner what to do, ch. 1. 20. Joseph, before his alliance to Christ, had not been wont to converse with angels. The truth here is, that spiritually related to Christ by faith, have that communion and correspondence with Heaven, which before they were strangers to.

2. Joseph is here told what their danger was; Herod will seek the young Child to destroy him. Note, God is acquainted with all the cruel projects and purposes of the enemies of his church. I know thy rage against me, saith God to Sennacherib, Isa. 37. 28. How early was the blessed Jesus involved in trouble! Usually, even those whose ripper years are attended with toils and perils have a peaceable and quiet infancy; but it was not so with the blessed Jesus: his life and sufferings were all together; he was born a Man slain with, as Jeremiah said (Jer. 15. 10), whom was sanctified from the womb, Jer. 1. 5. Both Christ the Head, and the church his body, agree in saying, Many a time have they afflicted me, from my youth up. Pharaoh's cruelty fastens upon the Hebrews' children, and the great respect they show them in sparing the man-child as soon as it should be born, Rev. 12. 1, 2.

2. He is directed what to do, to escape the danger; Take the young Child, and flee into Egypt. Thus early must Christ give an example to his own rule; (ch. 10. 23.) When they persecute you in one city, flee to another. He that came to die for us, when his hour was not yet come, fled for his own safety. Self-preservation, being a branch of the law of nature, is eminently a point of the law of God. Flee; but why into Egypt? Egypt was infantile for idolatry, tyranny, and enmity to the people of God; it had been a house of bondage to Israel, and particularly cruel to the infants of Israel; in Egypt, as much as in Ramah, Rachel had been weeping for her children; yet that is appointed to be a place of rest for the young Child Jesus. Note, God, when he pleases, can make the worst of places serve the best of purposes; for the earth he upbraideth the Lord's; he makes what use he pleases of it: sometimes the earth helps the woman, Rev. 12. 26. God, who made Moab a shelter to his outcasts, makes Egypt a refuge for his Son. This may be considered.

(1.) As a trial of the faith of Joseph and Mary. They might be tempted to think, if this Child be the Son of God, as we are told he is, has he no other way to secure himself from a danger that is a warm, than by such a mean and inglorious retreat as this? Cannot he summon legions of angels to be his life-guard, or cherubims with flaming swords to keep this tree of life? Cannot he strike Herod dead, or wither the hand that is stretched out against him, and so save us the trouble of this removal? They had been lately told that he should be the Glory of his people Israel; and is the land of Israel so soon become too hot for him? But we find not that they made any such objections; their faith, being tried, was found firm, and they believe this is the son of God, though they see no miracle wrought for his preservation; but they are put to the use of ordinary means. Joseph had great honour put upon him in being the husband of the blessed Virgin; but that honour has trouble attending it; for all his honours have in this world; Joseph must take the young Child, and carry him into Egypt; and now it appeared how well God had provided for the young Child and his mother, in appointing Joseph to stand in so near a relation to them; now the gold which the wise men brought would stand them in stead to bear their charges. God foresaw his people's distresses, and provides against them beforehand, and God intimates the continuance of his care and guidance, when he said, Be thou there until I bring thee word; so that he must expect to hear from God again, and not stir without fresh orders. Thus God will keep his people still in a dependence upon him.

(2.) As an instance of the humiliation of our Lord Jesus. God foresaw his people's distresses, and provides against them beforehand, and God intimates the continuance of his care and guidance, when he said, Be thou there until I bring thee word; so that he must expect to hear from God again, and not stir without fresh orders. Thus God will keep his people still in a dependence upon him.

(3.) As a token of God's displeasure against the Jews, who took so little notice of him; justly does he leave those who had slighted him. We see also here an earnest of his favour to the Gentiles, to whom the apostles were to bring the gospel when the Jews rejected it. If Egypt entertain Christ when he is forced out of Judea, it will not be long ere he be said, Blessed be Egypt my people, Isa. 19. 25.

II. Joseph's obedience to this command, v. 14. The journey would be inconvenient and perilous both to the young Child and to his mother; they were but poorly provided for it, and were likely to meet with cold entertainment in Egypt; yet Joseph was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, made no objection, nor was dilatory in his obedience. As soon as he had received his orders, he immediately arose, and went away by night: the same brings it to such a pass, as to seem, that he received the orders. Note, Those that would make sure work of their obedience, must make quick work of it. Now Joseph went out, as his father Abraham did, with an implicit dependence upon God, not knowing whither he went, Heb. 11. 8. Joseph and his wife, having little, had little to take care of in this remove, and abundance encumbers a necessary flight. If rich people have the advantage of the poor while they possess what they have, the poor have the advantage of the rich when they are called to part with it. Joseph took the young Child and his mother. Some observe, that the young Child is put first, as the divine Person, and Mary is called, not the wife of Joseph, but, which will be of greater dignity, the mother of the young Child. This was the first Joseph that was driven from Canaan to Egypt for a shelter from the anger of his brethren; this Joseph ought to be welcome there for the sake of that.

If we may credit tradition, at their entrance into Egypt, happening to go into a temple, all the images of their gods were overthrown by an invisible power, and fell, like Dagon before the ark, according to that prophecy, The Lord shall come into Egypt, and the idols of Egypt shall be moved at his presence, Isa. 19. 1. They continued in Egypt till the death of Herod, which, some think, was seven years, others think, not so many months. There they were at a distance from the temple and the temple was at a distance of the idolaters; but God sent them thither, and did not leave them mercy, and not sacrifice. Though they were far from priests of the Lord, they had with them the Lord of the temple. A forced absence from God's ordinances, and a forced presence with wicked people, may be the lot, are not the sin, yet cannot but be the grief, of good people.

III. The fulfilling of the scripture in all this— that scripture, (Hos. 11. 1.) Out of Egypt have I called my son. Of all the evangelists, Matthew takes most notice of the fulfilling of the scripture in what concerned Christ, because his gospel was first published among the Jews, with whom that would add much strength and lustre to it. Now this word of the prophet undoubtedly referred to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, in which God owned them for his son, his first-born; (Exod. 4. 22.) but it is here applied, by way of analogy, to Christ, the Head of the church. Note, The scripture has many accomplishments, so full and copious is it, and so well ordered in all things! God is every day fulfilling the scripture. Scripture is not of private interpretation, we must give it its full sense. When Israel was a child, then I loved him; and though I loved him, I suffered him to be a great while in Egypt; but because I loved him, in due time I called him out of Egypt. They that read this, must, in their thoughts, not only look back, but look forward; that which has been shall be again; (Ecc. 1. 9.) and the manner of expression intimates this; for it is not said, I called him, but, I called my son, out of Egypt. Note, It is no new thing for God's sons to be in Egypt, in a straitened condition, and in a house of shame, they shall be fetched out. They may be hid in Egypt, but they shall not be left there. All the elect of God, being by nature children of wrath, are born in a spiritual Egypt, and in conversion are effectually called out. It might be objected against Christ, that he had been in Egypt. Must the sun of Righteousness arise out of that land of darkness? But this shews that to be no such strange thing: Israel was brought out of Egypt, to be advanced to the highest honours; and this is but the doing the same thing again.

16 Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wroth, and sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men.

17. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying,

18. In Rama there was a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not.

Here is, 1. Herod's resentment of the departure of the wise men. He waited long for their return; he hopes though they be slow, they will be sure, and he shall crush his Rival at his first appearing; but he hears, upon enquiry, that they are gone by another way, which increases his jealousy, and makes him suspect they are in the interest of this new King, which made him exceeding wroth; and he is the more desperate and outrageous for his being disappointed. Note, Invertebrate corruption swells the higher for the obstructions it meets with in a sinful pursuit.

II. His pious contrivance, notwithstanding this, to destroy him that is born king of the Jews. If he could not reach him by a particular execution, he doubted not but to involve him in a general stroke, which, like the sword of war, should devour one as well as another. This would be sure work; and thus those that would destroy their own iniquity, must be sure to destroy all their iniquities. Herod was an Edomite, enmity to Israel was bred in the bone with him. Doeg was an Edomite, who, for David's sake, slew all the priests of the Lord. It was strange that Herod could find any so inhuman as to be employed in such a bloody and barbarous piece of work; but wicked hands never want wicked tools to work with. Little children have always been taken under the special protection, not only of human laws, but of human nature; yet these are sacrificed to the rage of this tyrant, under whom, as under Nero, innocence is the least security. Herod was, throughout his reign, a bloody man; it was not long before, that he destroyed the whole Sanhedrin, or bench of judges; but blood to the blood-thirsty is like drink to those in a dropsy. Quo plus sunt potes, plus situantur aquae. The more they drink, the more thirsty they become. Herod was now about seventy years old, so that an infant, at this time under two years old, was not likely ever to grow to any great height. Note, Herod was violent over fond of his own children, or of their preferment, having formerly slain two of his own sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, and his son Antipater after this, but five days before he himself died; so that it was purely to gratify his own brutish lusts of pride and cruelty that he did this. All is fish that comes to hook.

Observe what large measures he took. 1. As to time; He slew all from two years old and under. It is probable that the blessed Jesus was at this time not a year old; yet Herod took in all the infants under two years old, that he might be sure not to miss of his prey. He cares not how many heads fall, which he allows to be innocent, provided that one be not which he supposes to be guilty. 2. As to place; He kills all the male children, not only in Bethlehem, but in all the coasts thereof, in all the villages of that city. This was being overmuch wicked (Ecc. 7. 17.) Note, An unbridled wrath, armed with an unlawful power, often transports men to the most absurd and unreasonable instances of cruelty. It was no unrighteous thing with God to permit this; every life is forfeited to his justice as soon as he commences; that is, when one man's disobedience, introduced death with it; and we are not to suppose any thing more than that common guilt, we are not to suppose that these children were sinners above all that were in Israel, because they suffered such things. God's judgments are a great deal. The diseases and deaths of little children are proofs of original sin. But we must look upon this murder of the infants under another character. They were but the instruments of God's vengeance, and persecution commence against Christ and his kingdom! Think ye that he came to send peace on the earth? No, but a sword, such a sword as this, ch. 10. 34, 35. A passive testimony was hereby given to the Lord Jesus. As when he was in the womb, he was witnessed to by a child's leaping in the womb for joy at his approach, so now, at two years old, he had contemporary witnesses to him of the same age. The killing of children was the last of the days of the child, for him for them. These were the infantry of the noble army of martyrs. If these infants were thus baptized with blood, though it were their own, into the church triumphant, it could not be said but that, with what they got in heaven, they were abundantly recompensed for what they lost on earth. Out of the mouths of these babes and sucklings God did perfect praise; otherwise, it was not good to the Almighty that he should lie idle.

The tradition of the Greek church, and (we have it in the Ethiopic missal,) is, that the number of the children slain was 14,000; but that is very absurd. I believe, if the births of the male children in the weekly bills were computed, there would not be found so many under two years old, in one of the most populous cities in the world, much less in Bethlehem, a small town, that was not more a fourth part of it. But it is an instance of the vanity of tradition. It is strange that Josephus does not relate this story; but he wrote long after St. Matthew, and it is probable that he therefore would not relate it, because he would not so far countenance the Christian history, for he was a zealous Jew; but, to be sure, if it had not been true and well attested, he would have contested it. Macrobius, a heathen writer, tells us, that Timeomus, the son of the infant, and the natural son of Herod, among the children he ordered to be slain under two years old, slew his own son, he passed this jest upon him, That it was better to be Herod's swine than his son. The usage of the country forbade him to kill a swine, but nothing could restrain him from killing his son. Some think that he had a young child at nurse in Bethlehem; others think that, through mistake, two events are confused—the murder of the infants was the murder of his son Antipater. But for the church of Rome to put the Holy Innocents, as they call them, into their calendar, and observe a day in memory of them, while they have so often, by their barbarous massacres, justified, and even out-done Herod, is but to do as their predecessors did, who built the tombs of the prophets, while they themselves filled up the same measure.

Some observe another design of Providence in the murder of the infants. By all the prophecies of the Old Testament it appears that Bethlehehm was the place, and this the time, of the Messiah's nativity; now all the children of Bethlehehm, born at this time, being murdered, and Jesus only escaping, none but Jesus could pretend to be the Messiah. Herod now thought he had baffled all the Old-Testament prophecies, and defeated the indications of the star, and the devotions of the wise men, by ridding the country of this new King; having burst the hive, he concludes he had killed the master bee; but God in heaven laughs at him, and has him in derision. Whatever cruelty rude devices are in men's hearts, the counsel of the Lord shall stand.

1. In the place of this mourning. The noise of it was heard from Bethlehehm to Ramah; for Herod's cruelty extended itself to all the coasts of Bethlehehm, even into the lot of Benjamin, among the children of Rachel. Some think the country about Bethlehehm was called Rachel, because there she died, and was buried. Rachel's sepulchre was hard by Bethlehehm, Gen. 35. 16, 19. Compare 1 Sam. 10. 2. Rachel had her heart much set upon children; the son she died in travoul of, she called Benjamin—the son of her sorrow. These mothers were like Rachel, laid near Rachel's grave, and many of them descended from Rachel; and therefore their lamentations are elegantly represented by Rachel's weeping.

2. In the degree of this mourning. It was lamentation and weeping, and great mourning; all little enough to express the sense they had of this aggravated calamity. There was a great cry in Egypt when the first-born were slain, and so there was here when the youngest was slain; for whom we naturally have a particular tenderness. Here was a representation of this world we live in. We hear in it lamentation, and weeping, and mourning, and see the tears of the oppressed, some upon one account, and some upon another. Our way lies through a vale of tears. This sorrow was so great, that they could not bear it. They hardened themselves in it, and took a pleasure in it. They could not be god, there is no occasion of grief in this world, no, not that which is supplied by sin itself, that will justify us in refusing to be comforted! They should not be comforted, because they are not, that is, they are not in the land of the living, are not as they were, in their mothers' embraces. If, indeed, they could not, there might be some excuse for sorrowing as though we had been wholly dead, for we know they are not lost, but gone before; if we forget that they are, we lose the best ground of our comfort, 1 Thess. 4. 13. Some make this great grief of the Bethlehemites to be a judgment upon them for their contempt of Christ. That they would not rejoice for the birth of the Son of God, are justly made to weep for the death of their own sons; for they only were spared at the tidings the shepherds brought them, but did not welcome them.

The quoting of this prophecy might serve to obviate an objection which some would make against this account. 'Why, said they, does not this prophecy, xx. 16, 17. 'Then will I raise up unto them a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him,' refer to the Messiah?'' Yes, for so it was foretold, and the scripture must be accomplished. And besides, if we look further into this prophecy, we shall find that 'the bitter weeping in Ramah was but a prelude to the greatest joy, for it follows, Thy work shall be rewarded, and there is hope in the end. The worse things are, the sooner they will mend. Unto them a Child was born, sufficient to repair their losses.

19. But when Herod was dead, behold, an angel of the Lord appeared in a dream to Joseph in Egypt, 20. Saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and go into the land of Israel: for they are dead which sought the young child's life. 21. And he arose, and took the young child and his mother, and came into the land of Israel. 22. But when he heard that Archelaus did reign in Judea in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither; notwithstanding, being warned of God in a dream, he turned aside into the parts of Galilee: 23. And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene.

We have here Christ's return out of Egypt into the land of Israel again. Egypt may serve to sojourn in, or take shelter in, for a while, but not to abide in. Christ was sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and therefore to them he must return. Observe, I. What it was that made way for his return—the death of Herod, which happened not long after the murder of the infants; some think not above three months. Such quick work did divine vengeance make! Note, Herods must die; proud tyrants, that were the terror of the mighty, and the oppressors of the Godly, 'in the land of the living,' their day must come to fall, and down to this day they do. Who art thou then, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die? (Isa. 51. 12, 13.) especially considering that at death, not only their envy and hatred are perished, (Ecc. 9. 6.) and they cease from troubling, (Job 3. 17.) but they are punished. Of all sins, the guilt of innocent blood fills the measure soonest. It is a dreadful account which Josephus gives of the death of this same Herod, Ant. xix. 12, 1. He was brought up in a state of luxury and debauchery. Being afflicted with a disease which burned him inwardly with an inexpressible torture; that he was insatiably greedy of meat; had the colic, and gout, and dropsy; such an intolerable stench attended his disease, that none could come near him; and so passionate and impatient was he, that he was a torment to himself, and a terror to all that attended him: his innate cruelty, being thus exasperated, made him more barbarous than ever; having ordered his own son to be put to death, he imprisoned many of the nobility and gentry, and ordered that as soon as he was dead they should be killed; but that execution was prevented. See what kind of men have been the enemies and persecutors of Christ and his followers? Few have opposed Christianity but such
The providence of God commonly so orders it, that his people shall not want a quiet retreat from the storm and from the tempest; when one climate becomes hot and scorching, another shall be kept more cool and temperate. Galilee lay far north; Samaria lay between it and Judea; thither they were sent, to Nazareth, a city upon a hill, in the centre of the lot of Zebulun; there the mother of our Lord lived, when she conceived that holy thing; and, probably, Joseph lived there too, Luke 1. 26. 27. There they were unknown, and were among their relations; the most proper place for them to be in. There they continued, and from thence our Saviour was called Jesus of Nazareth, which was to the Jews a stumbling-block, for, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? In this is said to be fulfilled what was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarite; which may be looked upon, (1.) As a name of honour and dignity, though primarily it signifies, no more than, a man of Nazareth; there is an allusion, or mystery in it, speaking Christ to be, (1.) The Man, the Branch, spoken of, Isaiah 11. 1. The word there is Nitzar, which signifies, either a branch, or the city Nazareth: in being denominated from that city, he is declared to be that Branch. (2.) It speaks him of the great promise of his people, Deut. 23. 15. These Naze- rites were a type and figure, (especially Samson, Judg. 13. 5.) and Joseph, who is called a Nazarite among his brethren, (Gen. 49. 26.) and to whom that which was prescribed concerning the Nazarites, has reference, Num. 6. 2, &c. Not that Christ was, strictly, a Nazarite, for he drank wine, and touched dead bodies; but he was eminently so, both as he was singularly holy, and as he was known, and devotion and dedication set apart to the honour of God in the work of our redemption, as Samson was to save Israel. And it is a name we have all reason to rejoice in, and to know him by. Or, (2.) As a name of reproach and contempt. To be called a Nazarite, was to be called a deplorable man, a man from whom no good was to be expected, and to whom no respect was to be paid. The Devil first fastened upon him, and subjected him to ruin and shame, and justly people against him, and it stuck as a nick-name to him and his followers. Now this was not particularly foretold by any one prophet, but, in general, it was spoken by the prophets, that he should be despised and rejected of men, (Isa. 53. 3.) a Worm and no man, (Ps. 22. 6. 7.) that he should be an Alien to his brethren, Ps. 69. 7, 8. Let no name of reproach for religion’s sake seem hard to us, when our Master was himself called a Nazarite.

CHAP. III.

At the story of this chapter, concerning the baptism of John, begins the gospel; (Mark, 1. 1.) what went before is but Preface or Introduction; this is “the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. And Peter answers the same date, note 1. 22, beginning from the baptism of John, for then Christ began first to appear in him, and then to appear to him, and by him to the world.” Here is, 1. The glorious rising of the morning-star—John the Baptist, v. 1. 1. The doctrine he preached, v. 2. 2. The fulfilling of the scripture in him, v. 3. 4. His manner of life, v. 4. 4. The resort of multitudes to him, and their submission to his baptism, v. 5. 6. 5. His sermon that he preached to the Pharisees and Sadducees, wherein he endeavours to bring them to repentance, (v. 7—10.) and so to bring them to Christ, v. 11. 12. The more glorious shining forth of the sun of righteousness, immediately after; when John’s head is delivered to the beasts of judgment, John 19. 12—15. 2. The honour done to him by the descent of the Spirit upon him, and a voice from heaven, v. 16, 17.

N those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea,
2. And saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. 3. For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. 4. And the same John had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; and his meat was locusts and wild honey. 5. Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan. 6. And were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins.

We have here an account of the preaching and baptism of John, which were the dawning of the gospel-day. Observe,

1. The time when he appeared. In those days, (v. 1.) or, after those days, long after what was recorded in the foregoing chapter, which left the Child Jesus in his infancy. In those days, in the time appointed of the Father for the beginning of the gospel, when the fulness of time was come, which was often thus spoken of in the Old Testament, in those days. Now the last of Daniel's weeks began, or rather, the latter half of the last week, when the Messiah was to confirm the covenant with marks remarkable concerning either of them, till they were about thirty years old. Nothing is recorded in their childhood and youth, but the greatest part of their life is tempus exhor.—swopt up in darkness and obscurity: these children differ little in outward appearance from other children, as the heir, while he is under age, differs nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all. And this was to shew, 1. That even then when God was acting as the Saviour, verily he is a God that hideth himself, (Isa. 45. 13.) The Lord is in this place, and I know it not, Gen. 28. 16. Our beloved stands behind the wall long, before he looks forth at the windows, Cant. 2. 9. 2. That our faith must principally have an eye to Christ in his office and undertaking, for there is the display of his power; but in his person is the hiding of his power. All this while, Christ was God-man; yet we are not told what he said or did, till he appeared as a Prophet; and then, Hear ye him. 3. That young men, though well qualified, should not be forward to put forth themselves in public service, but be humble, and modest, and self-diffident, swift to hear, and slow to speak.

Matthew says nothing of the conception and birth of John, the Baptist. St. Luke, but finds him at full age, as if dropped from the clouds to preach in the wilderness. For above three hundred years the church had been without prophets; those lights had been long put out, that he might be the more desired, who was to be the great Prophet. After Malachi there was no prophet, nor any pretender to prophecy, till John the Baptist, to whom the Prophet Malachi referred, spoke more directly, than any of the Old-Testament prophets had done; (Mal. 3. 1.) I send my messenger. 11. The place where he appeared first. In the wilderness of Judea. It was not an uninhabited desert, but a part of the country not so thickly peopled, nor so much inclosed into fields and vineyards, as other parts were; it was such a wilderness as had six cities and their villages in it, which are named, Josh. 13. 31, 62. In these cities and villages John preached, for thereabouts he had hitherto lived, being born hard by, in Hebron; the scenes of his action began there, where he had long spent his time in contemplation: and often when he showed himself to Israel, he shewed how well he loved retribution, as far as would consist with his business. The word of the Lord found John here in a wilderness. Note, No place is so remote as to shut us out from the visits of divine grace; nay, commonly the sweetest intercourse the saints have with Heaven, is when they are withdrawn farthest from the noise of this world. John was in the desert, that David penned the 63d Psalm, which speaks so much of the sweet communion he then had with God, Hos. 2. 14. In a wilderness the law was given; and as the Old Testament, so the New Testament, Israel was first found in a desert land, and there God led him about and instructed him, Deut. 32. 10. John Baptist was a priest of the order of Aaron, yet we find him preaching in a wilderness, and never officiating in the temple; but Christ, who was not a Son of Aaron, is yet often found in the temple, and sitting there as one having authority; so it was foretold, Mal. 3. 1. The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple; not the messenger that was to prepare his way. This intimated that the preparation of Christ was to thrust out that of Aaron, and direct it to a far higher and more wonderful end. The beginning of the gospel in a wilderness, speaks comfort to the deserts of the Gentile world. Now must the prophecies be fulfilled, I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, Isa. 41. 18, 19. The wilderness shall be a fruitful field, Isa. 32. 15. And the desert shall rejoice, Isa. 33. 1, 2. The Septuagint reads, the desert of Jordan, the very wilderness in which John preached. In the Roman church, who are those who call themselves hermits, and pretend to fellow John; but when they say of Christ, Behold, he is in the desert, go not forth, ch. 24. 26. There was a seducer that led his followers into the wilderness, Acts 21. 38.

III. His preaching. This he made his business. He came, not fighting, nor disputing, but preaching; (v. 2.) Repent ye. He preached this in Judea, among those that were called Jews, and made a profession of religion; for even they need repentance. He preached it, not in Jerusalem, but in the wilderness of Judea, among the plain country people; for even those who think themselves most out of the way of temptation, and furthest from the vanities and vices of the town, cannot wash their hands in innocency, but must do it in repentance. John Baptist's business was to call men to repent of their sins; Meramoth.—Bethink yourselves; • Admit a second thought, to correct the errors of the first—an after-thought. Consider your ways, change your minds, as you have heard, and think again. Note, True penitents have other thoughts of God and Christ, and sin and holiness, and this world and the other, than they have had, and stand otherwise affected toward them. The change of the mind produces a change of the way. Those who are truly sorry for what they have done amiss, will be careful to do no more. This repentance is necessary both in the external command of God; (Acts 17. 30.) and a necessary preparative and qualification for the comforts of the gospel of Christ. If the heart of man had continued upright and unsteadied, divine consolations might have been received without this painiful operation preceding; but, being sinful, it must be first pains
The conviction the a a and, startling John this John a temporal (2.) that Kindness 8. gi-eat make to more meant It jm-on way. ” re/ient. 23.) a so John John that John the being the voice made should the kingdom, he' (Luke 2. 19.) also is Paul, and what is Ananias' loyal subjects of it. It is a kingdom of heaven, not of this world, a spiritual kingdom: its original from heaven, its tendency to heaven. John preached this at hand; then it was at the door; to us it is come, by the pouring out of the Spirit, and the full exhibition of the riches of gospel-grace. Now, (1.) This is a great inducement to us to repent. There is nothing like the consideration of divine grace to break the heart, in all, in every heart, of all, in every evangelical repentance, that flows from a sight of Christ, from a sense of his love, and the hopes of pardon and forgiveness through him. Kindness in conquering; abused kindness, humiliating and melfting. What a wretch was I to sin against such grace, against the law and love of such a kingdom! (2.) It is a great encouragement to us to repent; Re- pent, for your sins shall be pardoned upon your repentance. Run to a way of grace and kingdom, and he will, through Christ, return you to a way of mercy. The proclamation of pardon discovers, and fetches in, the malefactor who before fled and absconded. Thus are we drawn to it with the cords of a man and the bonds of love.

IV. The prophecy that was fulfilled in him, v. 3. This is he that was spoken of in the beginning of that part of the prophecy of Isaiahs, which is mostly evangelical, and which points at gospel-times and gospel-grace; see Isa. 40. 3, 4. John is here spoken of. 1. As the voice of one crying in the wilderness. John owned it himself; (John 1. 23.) I am the voice, and that is all. God is the Speaker, who makes known his mind by John, as a man does by his voice. The word of God must be received as such; (1 Thess. 2. 13.) what also is Paul, and what is Ananias' but the voice! John is called the voice, even גלוס —the voice of one crying aloud, which is startling and awakening. Christ is called the Word, which, being distinct and articulate, is more instructive. John, as the voice, outraged men, and then Christ, as the Word, taught them; as we find, Rev. 14. 2. The voice of many waters, and of a great thunder, made way for the melodious voice of harpers and the new song, v. 2. Some observe that, as Sam-son's mother must drink no strong drink, yet he was designed to be a strong man; so John Baptist's father was struck dumb, and yet he was designed to be the voice of one crying. When the crier's voice is be- gotten of a dumb father, it shews the excellency of the power to be of God, and not of man. 2. As one whose business it was to prepare the way of the Lord. John Baptist make his patha straight; so it was said of him before he was born, that he should make ready a people prepared for the Lord, (Luke 1. 17.) as Christ's harbinger and forerunner; he was such a one as intimated the nature of Christ's kingdom, for he came not in the gaudy dress of a herald at arms, but in the homely one of a hermit. Officers are sent before great men to clear the way; so John prepares the way of the Lord. (1.) He himself did so among the men of that generation. In the Jewish church and nation, at that time, all was out of course; there was a great decay of piety, the vitals of religion were corrupted and eaten out by the traditions and injunctions of the elders. The Scribes and Pharisees, that is, the greatest hypo- crites in the world, had the key of knowledge, and the key of government, at the same time, generally, extremely proud of their privileges, confident of justification by their own righteousness, insensible of sin; and though now under the most humbling providences, being lately made a province of the Roman Empire, yet they were unhumbled; they were much in the same temper as they were in Malachi's time, insolent and haughty, and ready to contradict the word of God: now John was sent to tear these things down; to shew them their own opinion of themselves, and to shew them their sins, that the doctrine of Christ might be the more ac- ceptable and effectual. (2.) His doctrine of repentance and humiliation is still as necessary as it was then to prepare the way of the Lord. Note, There is a great deal to be done, to make way for Christ into a soul, to bow the heart for the reception of the Son of David; (2 Sam. 19. 14.) as they did to this, then the discovery of sin, and a conviction of the insufficiency of our own righteousness. That which lets will, until it be taken out of the way; prejudices must be removed, high thoughts brought down, and captivated to the obedience of Christ. Gates of brass must be broken, and bars of iron cut asunder, ere the everlasting doors be opened for the King of glory to come in. The way of sin and Satan is a crooked way; to pre- pare a way for Christ, the paths must be made straight, Heb. 12. 13.

V. The garb in which he appeared, the figure he made, and the manner of his life, v. 4. They who expected the Messiah as a temporal prince, would think that his forerunner must come in great pomp and splendour, that his equipage should be very magnificent and gay; but it proves quite contrary; he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, but mean in the eye of the world; and, as Christ himself, having no form or comeliness; to intimate betimes, that the glory of Christ's kingdom was to be spiri- tual, and the subjects of it such as ordinarily were either found by it, or made by it, poor and despised, who derived their honours, pleasures, and riches, from another world.

1. His dress was in a loin. This same John had his garment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; he did not go in long clothing, as the scribes, or soft clothing, as the courtiers, but in the clothing of a country-husbandman: for he lived in a country-place, and suited his habit to his habita- tion. Note, It is good for us to accommodate our- selves to the place and condition which God, in his providence, has put us in. John appeared in this dress, (1.) To shew that, like his Forerunner, and his generation, and the delights and gaieties of it. Behold an Israelite indeed! These that are lowly in heart should shew it by a holy negligence and insufficiency in their attire; and not make the putting on of apparel their adorning, nor value others by their attire. (2.) To shew that he was a prophet, for prophets wore rough garments, as mortified men; (Zech. 13. 4.) and especially, to shew that he was the Elias, who is to be the forerunner of the day of the Lord, as Elias was the forerunner of the day of the Lord. Take notice of the character of Elias; that he was a hairy man, (which, some think, is meant of the hairy garments he wore,) and that he was girt with a gir- dle of leather about his loins, 2 Kings 1. 8. John Baptist appears no way inferior to him in mortifica- tion; this therefore is that Elias that was to come. (3.) To shew that he was a man of resolution; his girdle was not fine, such as were then commonly worn, but it was strong, it was a leathern girdle; and blessed is that servant, whom His Lord, when He comes, will find with his talents, Luke 12. 33. 1 Pet. 1. 13.

2. His diet was plain; his meat was locusts and wild honey: not as if he never ate any thing else; but these he frequently fed upon, and made many meals of them, when he retired into solitary places, and continued long there for contemplation. Locusts were a sort of flying insect, very good for food, and allowed as clean; (Lev. 11. 23.) they required little dressing, and were light, and easy of digestion, whence it is reckoned among the infirmities of old age, that the grasshopper, or locust, is then a burden to the stomach, Eccl. 12. 5. Wild honey was that which Canaan flowed with, 1 Sam. 14. 26. Either it was gathered immediately, as it fell in the dew, or rather, as it was found in the hollows of trees and rocks, where bees built, that were not like those in hives, under the care and inspection of men. This intimates that he ate sparingly, a little served his turn; a man would be long ere he filled his belly with locusts and wild honey: John Baptist came neither eating nor drinking, (ch. 11. 18.)—not with the curiosity, formality, and familiarity that other people do. He was so entirely taken up with spiritual things, that he could seldom find time to set a table. (v. 1.) This agreed with the doctrine he preached of repentance, and fruits meet for repentance. Note, Those whose business it is to call others to mourn for sin, and to mortify it, ought themselves to live a serious life, a life of self-denial, mortification, and contempt of the world. John Baptist thus shewed the deep sense he had of the badness of the time and place he lived in, which made his fruit a little fruit, and his work a few days work. It was a fast-day with him. (2.) This agreed with his office as Christ's forerunner; by this practice he shewed that he knew what the kingdom of heaven was, and had experienced the powers of it. Note, Those that are acquainted with divine and spiritual pleasures, cannot but look upon all the delights and ornaments of sense with a holy indifference; they know better things. By giving others this example he made way for Christ. Note, A conviction of the vanity of the world, and every thing in it, is the best preparative for the entertainment of the kingdom of heaven in the heart. Blessed are the poor in spirit.

VI. The people who attended upon him, and flocked after him: (v. 5.) Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea. Great multitudes came to him from the city, and from all parts of the country; some of all sorts, men and women, young and old, rich and poor, Pharisees and Publicans; they went out to him, as soon as they heard of his preaching the kingdom of heaven, that they might hear what they heard so much of. Now, 1. This was a great honour put upon John, that so many attended him, and flocked after him. Note, John had the most real honour done them, who least count the shadow of it. Those who live a mortified life, who are humble and self-denying, and dead to the world, command respect; and men have a secret value and reverence for them, more than one would imagine. 2. This gave John a great opportunity of doing good, and was an evidence that God was with him; and John himself began to rejoice in the kingdom of heaven; (Luke 16. 16.) and a blessed sight it was, to see the dew of the youth dropping from the womb of the gospel-morning, (Ps. 110. 3.) to see the net cast where there were so many fish. 3. This was an evidence, that it was now a time of great expectation; it was generally thought that the kingdom of God would presently appear; (Luke 19. 11.) and therefore, when John shewed himself to Israel, lived and preached at this rate, so very different from the Scribes and Pharisees, they were ready to say of him, that he was the Christ; (Luke 3. 15.) and perhaps at no other occasion to such a confidence of people about him. 4. Those who would have the benefit of John's ministry must go out to him in the wilderness, sharing in his reproach. Note, They who truly desire the sincere milk of the word, if it be not brought to them, will seek it out for themselves; and they who would learn the doctrine of repentance must go out from the hurry of this world, and be still. It and the benefits of it, that of the man who came to John's baptism, there were of a view that adhered to it; witness the cold reception Christ had in Judea, and about Jerusalem. Note, There may be a multitude of forward hearers, where there are but a few true believers. Curiosity, and affection of novelty and variety may bring many to attend upon good preaching, and to be affected with it for a while; but who yet are never subject to the power of it. Ezck. 33. 31. 32.

VII. The rite, or ceremony, by which he admitted disciples, v. 6. Those who received his doctrine, and submitted to his discipline, were baptized of him in Jordan, thereby professing their repentance, and their belief that the kingdom of the Messiah was at hand. 1. They testified their repentance by confession of sin, and forsaking of the cursed works of darkness; and of which it is probable, they made to John that they were sinner, that they were polluted by sin, and needed cleansing; but to God they made a confession of particular sins, for he is the party offended. The Jews had been taught to justify themselves; but John teaches them to accuse themselves, and not to rest, as they used to do, in the general confession of sin made for all Israel, once a year, upon the day of atonement. God washed them with water, which was a token of his personal cleansing, every one of the plague of his own heart. Note, A penitent confession of sin is required in order to peace and pardon; and those only are ready to receive Jesus Christ as their righteousness, who are brought; with sorrow and shame to own their guilt, 1 John 1. 8. 2. The benefits of the kingdom of heaven, now at hand, were thereupon sealed to them by baptism. He washed them with water, which was a token of this—that from all their iniquities God would cleanse them. It was usual with the Jews to baptize those whom they admitted Presbytists to their religion, especially those who were only Prophets of the gate, and were not circumcised, as the Prophets of righteousness were. Some think it was likewise a custom for persons of eminent religion, who set up for leaders, by baptism to admit pupils and disciples. Christ's expression concerning John's baptism, Was it from heaven, or of men? implied, that there were baptisms of men, who pretended not to a divine mission; with this usage John complied, but his was from heaven, and was distinguished from all others with this character, It was the baptism of repentance, Acts 19. 4. All Israel were baptized unto Moses, 1 Cor. 10. 2. and Christ being the last and greatest of men, it was proper for him to have baptisms; (Heb. 9. 10.) but John's baptism refers to the remedial law, the law of repentance and faith. He is said to baptize them in Jordan, that river which was famous for Israel's passage through it, and Naaman's cure; yet it is probable that John did not baptize in that river at first, but that afterward, when the people who came to his baptism were convinced of their necessity, and were baptized, he obliged them to live a holy life, according to the profession they took upon themselves. Note, Confession of sin must always be accompanied with holy resolutions, in the strength of divine grace, not to return to it again.

7. But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? 3. Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance: 9. And think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. 10. And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire. 11. I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire:

The doctrine John preached was that of repentance, in consideration of the kingdom of heaven being at hand; now here we have the use of that doctrine. Application is the life of preaching, so it was of John's preaching.

Observe, 1. To whom he applied it; to the Pharisees and Sadducees that came to his baptism, v. 7. 2. To others he thought it enough to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; but when he saw these Pharisees and Sadducees come about him, he proved more needfully to explain himself, and deal more closely. These were two of the three noted sects among the Jews at that time; the third was that of the Essenes, whom we never read of in the Gospels, for they affected retirement, and declined burying themselves in public affairs. The Pharisees were zealots for the ceremonies, for the power of the church, and the traditions of the elders; the Sadducees ran into the other extreme, and were little better than deists, denying the existence of spirits and a future state. It was strange that they came to John's baptism, but their curiosity brought them to be hearers; and some of them, it is probable, submitted to be baptized, but it is certain that the generality of them did not; for Christ says, (Luke 7. 29, 30.) that when the publicans justified God, and were baptized of John, the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against them selves, being not baptized of him. Note, Many come to ordinances, who come not under the power of them. Now to them John here addresses himself with all faithfulness; and what he said to them, he said to the multitude, (Luke 3. 7.) for they were all concerned in what he said. 2. What the application was. It is plain and home, and directed to their conscience, and speaks as one that came not to preach before them, but to preach to them. Though his education was private, he was not bashful when he appeared in public, nor did he fear the face of man, for he was full of the Holy Ghost, and of power.

I. Here is a word of conviction and awakening. He begins harshly, calls them not Rabbi, gives them not the titles, much less the applause, they had been used to. 1. The title he gives to them, is a generation of vipers. Christ gave them the same titles, ch. 12. 34, 35. They were as vipers; though specious, yet venomous and poisonous, and full of malice and enmity to every thing that was good; they were a vipers brood, the seed and offspring of such as had been of the same spirit; it was bred in the bone with them. They gloried in it, that they were the seed of Abraham; but John showed them that they were the serpent's seed; (compare Gen. 3. 15.) of their father the Devil, John 8. 44. They were a viperous brood, they were all alike; though enemies to one another, yet confederate in mischief. Note, A wicked generation is a generation of vipers, and they ought to be told so; it becomes the ministers of Christ to be bold in shewing sinners their true character. 2. The admonishment. What have you done that were you to flee from the wrath to come? This intimates that they were in danger of the wrath to come; and that their case was so nearly desperate, and their hearts so hardened in sin, (the Pharisees by their parade of religion, and the Sadducees by their arguments against religion,) that it was next to a miracle to effect any thing hopeful among them. What brings you to this place? What has caused you to seek, and fear that you have been put into, that you inquire after the kingdom of heaven? Note, (1.) There is a wrath to come; beside present wrath, the vials of which are poured out now, there is future wrath, the stores of which are treasured up for hereafter. (2.) It is the great concern of every one of us to flee from that wrath. (3.) It is wonderful mercy that we are fairly warned to flee from this wrath; think how we may secure it.

II. Here is a word of exhortation and direction; (v. 8.) "Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance. Therefore, because you are warned to flee from this wrath to come, let the terrors of the Lord persuade you to a holy life." Or, "Therefore, because you profess repentance, and attend upon the doctrine and baptism of repentance, evidence that you are true penitents. Repentance is seated in the heart. There it is as a root; but in vain do we pretend to have it there, if we do not bring forth the fruits of it in a universal reformation, forsaking all sin, and cleaving to that which is good; these fruits, εἰκόνες τῆς ὑπομονῆς—worthy of repentance. Note, These are not worthy the name of penitents, or their privileges, who say they are sorry for their sins, and yet persist in them. They that profess repentance, as all that are baptized do, must be and act as becomes penitents, and never do any thing unbecoming a penitent sinner. It becomes penitents to be humble and low in their own eyes, to be thankful for the least mercy, patient under the greatest afflication, to be watchful against all appearances of sin, and approaches towards it, to abound in every duty, and to be charitable in judging others.

III. Here is a word of caution, not to trust to their external privileges, so as with them to shift off these calls to repentance; (v. 9.) Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father. Note, There is a great deal which carnal hearts are prone to say within themselves, to put by the convincing, commanding power of the word of God, which ministers should labour to meet with and anticipate; vain thoughts which lodge within those who are called to wash their hearts, Jer. 4. 14. Mic 7. 17—18. "Pretend not, presume not, to say within yourselves; nor be of the opinion that this will save you; there is not such a concept. Please not yourselves with saying this;" (so some read it;) "reck not yourselves asleep with this, nor flatter yourselves into a fool's paradise." Note, God takes notice of what we say within ourselves, which we dare not speak out, and is acquainted with all the false rests of the soul, and the fallacies with which it deludes itself, but which it will not discover, lest it should be undeceived. Many hide the lie that ruins them, in their right hand, and roll it under their tongue, because they are ashamed to own it; they keep in the Devil's interest, by keeping the Devil's counsel.

Now John shews them,

1. What their pretense was: "We have Abraham to our father." Note, It is fit indeed that they should be called to repent; but we are Jews, a holy nation, a peculiar people, what is this to us? Note, The word does no good, when we will not take it as spoken to us, and belonging to us. "Think not that because you are the seed of Abraham, therefore," (1.) "You need not repent, you have nothing to repent of; your relation to Abraham, and your interest in the covenant made with him, denominate you so holy, that there is no occasion for you to change your mind or way." (2.) "That therefore you shall fare well enough, though you do not repent. Think not that this will bring you off in the judgment, and secure you from the wrath to come; that God will condescend at your importance, because you are Abraham's seed." Note, It is very easy, and very seducing, to think that good relations will save us, though we be not good ourselves. What though we be descended from pious ancestors; have been blessed with a religious education; have our lot cast in families where the fear of God is uppermost; and have good friends that advise us, and pray for us; what will all this avail us, if we do not repent, and live a life of repentance? We have Abraham to our father, and therefore are entitled to the privileges of the covenant made with him; being his seed, we are sons of the church, the temple of the Lord, Jer. 7. 4. Note, Multitudes, by resting in the honours and advantages of their visible church-membership, take up short of heaven.

2. How foolish and groundless this pretense was; they thought that being the seed of Abraham, they were the only people God had in the world, and therefore that, if they were cut off, he would be at a loss for a church; but John shews them the folly of this conceit; "I say unto you, (whenever you say within yourselves,) that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." He was now baptizing in Jordan at Bethabara, (John 1. 28.) the baptism of the children of the church was passed over; and there were the twelve stones, one for each tribe, which Joshua set up for a memorial, Josh. 4. 20. It is not unlikely that he pointed to those stones, which God should raise to be, more than in representation, the twelve tribes of Israel. Or perhaps he refers to Isa. 51. 1. where Abraham is called the rock out of which they were hewn. That God who raised Isaac out of such a rock, can, if there be occasion, do as much again, for with him nothing is impossible. Some think he pointed to those beheaded soldiers that were present, telling the Jews that God would raise up a church for himself among the Gentiles, and entail the blessing of Abraham upon them. Thus when our first parents fell, God could have left them to perish, and out of stones have made them the image of their father: we are stones then again, for with him we should be the seed of Abraham's seed, rather than such hard, dry, barren sinners as you are." Note, As it is lowering to the confidence of the sinners in Zion, so it is encouraging to the fears of the sons of Zion, that, whatever comes of the present generation, God will never want a church in the world; if the Jews fall off, the Gentiles shall be grafted in, ch. 21. 43. Rom. 11. 12.

IV. It is a word of terror to the careless and secure Pharisees and Sadducees, and other Jews, that knew not the signs of the times, nor the day of their visitation, v. 10. "Now look about, now that the kingdom of God is at hand, and be made sensible,"

1. "How strict and short your trial is; Now the axe is carried before you, now it is laid to the root of the tree, now you are upon your good behaviour, and are to be so but a while; now you are marked for ruin, and cannot avoid it but by a speedy and sure repentance. Now we expect that God will make quicker work with you by these judgments than he did formerly, and that they will begin at the house of God; where God allows more means, he allows less time." Behold, I come quickly. Now they were put upon their last trial; now, or never.

2. "How sore and severe your doom will be, if you do not improve this; It is now declared with the axe at the root, to shew that God is earnest in the declaration, that every tree, however high in gifts and honours, however green in external professions and performances, if it bring not forth good fruit, the fruits meet for repentance, is heen down, disowned as a tree in God's vineyard, unworthy to have room there, and is cast into the fire of God's wrath; that grace, and good works, and repentance can ever have the power to make a tree good for fruit? are they good for? If not fit for fruit, they are fit for fuel. Probably, this refers to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, which was not, as other judgments had been, like the lopping off of the branches, or cutting down of the body of the tree, leaving the root to bud again, but it would be the total, final, and irrecoverable extirpation of that people, which Christ will come to make a great and continued impenitent. Now God would make a full end, wrath was coming on them to the utmost.

V. A word of instruction concerning Jesus Christ, in whom all John's preaching centred. Christ's ministers preach, not themselves, but him. Here is,

1. The dignity and pre-eminence of Christ above John. See how meanly he speaks of himself, that he might magnify Christ; (v. 11.) "I indeed baptize you with water, that is the utmost I can do." Note, Sacrifices derive not their efficacy from those who administer them; they can only apply the sign; it is Christ's prerogative to give the thing signified, 1 Cor. 3. 6. 2 Kings 4. 31. But he that comes after me is mightier than I. Though John had much power, for he came in the spirit and power of Elijah, ch. 1. 15. Christ had more, he was truly greater, great in the sight of the Lord, (ps. a greater was born of woman,) yet he thinks himself unworthy to be in the meanest place of attendance upon Christ; whose shoes I am not worthy to bear. He sees, (1.) How mighty Christ is, in comparison with him. Note, It is a great comfort to faithful ministers, to think that Jesus Christ is mightier than they, can do that for them, and that by them, which they cannot do; his strength is perfected in their weakness. (2.) How mean he is, in comparison with Christ, not worthy to carry his shoes after him! Note, Those whom God puts honour upon, are thereby made very humble and low in their own eyes; willing to be abased, so that Christ may be magnified; to be a thing, to be nothing, so that Christ may be all.

2. The usual and intended Christ's appearing, which they were now speedily to expect. When it was prophesied that John should be sent as Christ's forerunner, (Mal. 3. 1, 2.) it immediately follows, The Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come, and shall sit as a refiner, v. 3. And, after the coming of Elijah, the day comes, that shall burn as an oven, (Mal. 4. 1.) to which the Baptist seems here to refer. Christ will come to make a full end, v. 11. But by the powerful working of his grace: He shall baptize you, that is, some of you, with the Holy Ghost, and with fire. Note, [1.] It is Christ's prerogative to baptize with the Holy Ghost. This he and in the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit conferred upon the apostles, to which Christ himself applies these words of John, Acts 1. 5. This he does in the graces and comforts of the Spirit given to them that ask him, Luke 11. 13. John 7. 38, 39. See Acts 11. 16. [2.] They who are baptized with the Holy Ghost are baptized as with fire; the seven spirits of God appear as seven lamps of fire, Rev. 4. 5. Is fire enlightening, the Spirit of Judgment must be illumined by him. Is it warning? And do not their hearts burn within them? Is it consuming? And does not the Spirit of Judgment, as a Spirit of burning, consume the dross of their corruptions? Does fire make all it seizes like itself? And does it move upward? So does the Spirit make the soul holy like itself, and its tendency is heaven-ward. Christ says, I am come to send fire, Luke 12. 49. It is the conclusions of his judgment; (v. 12.) Whose fire is in his hand. His ability to distinguish, as the eternal wisdom of the Father, who sees all by a true light, and his authority to distinguish, as the Person to whom all judgment is committed, is the fire that is in his hand, Jer. 15. 7. Now he sits as a Refiner. Observe here, [1.] The visible church is Christ's floor; O my threshing, and the corn of my floor. Isa. 28. 1. It contains the crop of wheat and chaff. [2.] In this floor there is a mixture of wheat and chaff. True believers are as wheat, substantial, useful, and valuable; hypocrites are as chaff, light and empty, useless and worthless, and carried about with every wind; these are now mixed, good and bad, under the same external profession, and in the same visible communion. [3.] There is a day coming when the floor shall be purified, and the wheat and chaff shall be separated. Something of this kind is often done in this world, when God calls his people out of Babylon, Rev. 18. 4. But it is the day of the last judgment that will be the great winnowing, distinguishing day, which will infallibly determine concerning doctrines and works, (1 Cor. 3. 13.) and concerning persons, (ch. 28. 32, 33.) when saints and sinners shall be parted for ever. [4.] Heaven is the garner into which Jesus Christ will shortly gather all his wheat, and not a grain of it shall be lost: he will gather them as the ripe fruits were gathered in. Death's scythe is made use of to gather them to their people. In heaven the saints are brought together, and no longer scattered; they are safe, and no longer exposed; separated from corrupt neighbours without, and corrupt affections within, and there is no chaff among them. They are not only gathered into the barn, (ch. 15. 50.) but into the garner, where they are thoroughly purified. [5.] Hell is the unquenchable fire, which will burn up the chaff, which will certainly be the portion and punishment, and everlasting destruction, of hypocrites and unbelievers. So that here are life and death, good and evil, set before us; according as we now are in the field, we shall be then in the floor. 13. Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him. 14. But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? 15. And Jesus answering, said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him. 16. And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him 17 And lo, a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

Our Lord Jesus, from his childhood till now, when he was almost thirty years of age, had lain hid in Galilee, as it were, buried alive; but now, after a long and dark night, behold, the Sun of righteousness rises in glory. The futility of time was come that Christ should enter on his prophetic office; and he chooses to do it, not at Jerusalem, (though it is probable that he went thither at the three yearly feasts, as others did,) but there where John was baptizing; for to him resorted those who waited for the consolation of Israel, to whom alone he would be welcome. John the Baptist was six months older than our Saviour, and it is supposed that he began to preach and baptize about six months before Christ was sown; but by reason of many ways, in the region round about Jordan; and more was done towards it in these six months than had been done in several ages before. Christ's coming from Galilee to Jordan, to be baptized, teaches us not to shrink from pains and travail, that we may have an opportunity of drawing nigh to God in an ordinance. We should be willing to go farther than the come short of communion with God. They who will find must seek. Now in this story of Christ's baptism we may observe.

1. How hardly John was persuaded to admit of it, v. 14, 15. It was an instance of Christ's great humility, that he would offer himself to be baptized of John; that he who knew no sin would submit to the baptism of repentance. Note, As soon as ever Christ began to preach, he preached humility; preached it by his example, preached it to all, especially to young ministers. Christ was designed for the highest honours, yet in his first step he thus abases himself. Note, They who would rise high must begin low. Before honour is humility. It was a great piece of respect done to John, for Christ thus to come to him; and it was a return for the service he did him, in giving notice of his approach. Note, Those that honour God he will honour. Now here we have,

1. The objection that John made against baptizing Jesus, v. 14. John forbade him, as Peter did, when Christ went about to wash his feet, John 13. 6, 8. Note, Christ's gracious condescensions are so surprising, as to appear at first incredible to the strongest believers; so deep and mysterious, that even they who know his mind well cannot soon find out the meaning of them. But, by reason of their being start objections against the will of Christ. John's modesty thinks this an honour too great for him to receive, and he expresses himself to Christ, just as his mother had done to Christ's mother; (Luke 1. 43.) Whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? John had now obtained a great name, and was universally respected; yet see how humble he is still! Note, God has further honours in store for those whose spirits continue low when their reputation rises.

(1.) John thinks it necessary that he should be baptized of Christ; I have need to be baptized of thee with the baptism of the Holy Ghost, as of fire, for that was Christ's baptism, v. 11. [1.] Though John was filled with the Holy Ghost from the womb, (Luke 1. 15.) yet he acknowledges he had need to be baptized of Christ. Note, we need much of the Spirit of God, yet, while here, in this imperfect state, see that they have need of more, and need to apply themselves to Christ for more. [2.] John has need to be baptized, though he was the greatest that ever was born of woman; yet, being born of a woman, he is polluted, as others of Adam's seed are, and owns he has need of cleansing.
Note, the purest souls are most sensible of their own remaining impurity, and seek most earnestly for spiritual washing. [3.] He has need to be baptized of Christ, who can do that for us, which no one else can, and which must be done for us, or we are undone. Note, The best and holiest of men have need of Christ, and better than others, and are made more sensible of that need. [4.] This was said before the multitude, who had a great zeal for John, and were ready to embrace him for the Messiah; yet he publicly owns that he had need to be baptized of Christ. Note, It is no disparagement to the greatest of men, to confess that they are undone without Christ and his grace. [5.] John was Christ's forerunner, and foreknew what he was to be; this was the reason that he had need to be baptized of him. Note, Even they who were before Christ, in time dependent on him, received from him, and had an eye to him. [6.] While John was dealing with others about their souls, observe how feelingly he speaks of the case of his own soul, I have need to be baptized of thee. Note, Ministers, who preach to others, and baptize others, are concerned to look to it that they preach to themselves, and be themselves baptized with the Holy Ghost. Take heed to thyself first; save thyself. 1 Tim. 4. 16.

(2.) He therefore thinks it very preposterous and absurd, that Christ should be baptized by him; Comest thou to me? Does the holy Jesus, that is separated from sinners, come to be baptized by a sinner, as a sinner, and among sinners? How can this be? Or (3.) How can Christ be given of it? Note, Christ's coming to us may well be wondered at.

2. The over-ruling of this objection: (v. 13.) Jesus said, Suffer it to be so now. Christ accepted his humiliation, but not his refusal; he will have the thing done; and it is fit that Christ should take his own method, though we do not understand it, nor can give a reason for it. So we must all bow down under God's dealings.

(1.) If Christ can be given of it, he must be so now. He does not deny that John had need to be baptized of him, yet he will now be baptized of John. * Ask not.—Let it be yet so; Suffer it to be so now. Note, Every thing is beautiful in its season. But why now? Why yet? [1.] Christ is now in a state of humiliation; he has emptied himself, and made himself of no reputation. He is not only found in fashion as a man, but he is now made less than the angels. Let God therefore now let him be baptized of John; as if he needed to be washed, though perfectly pure; and thus he was made Sin for us, though he knew no sin. [2.] John's baptism is now in reputation, it is that by which God is now doing his work; that is the present dispensation, and therefore Jesus will now be baptized with water; but his baptismizing with the Holy Ghost is reserved for hereafter, many days hence, Acts 1. 5. John's baptism has now its day, and therefore honour must now be put upon that, and they who attend upon it must be encouraged. Note, They who are of greatest attainments in gifts and graces, should yet, in their place, bear their testimony to instituted ordinances, by a humble and diligent attendance on them, that they may give a grace to them, and add to their value. John was dead while we see he does so, we must own, John was now increasing, and therefore it must be thus yet; shortly he will decrease, and then it will be otherwise. [3.] It must be so now, because now is the time for Christ's appearing in public, and this will be a fair opportunity for it. See John 1. 31-32. Thus he must be made manifest to Israel, and be signified Christ, plain to all hearts and eyes, in the face of the people, which was most conducive to his own self-abasing.

(2.) The reason he gives for it; Thus it becomes us to fulfill all righteousness. Note, [1.] There was a propriety in every thing that Christ did for us; it was all graceful; (Heb 2. 10. 7. 26.) and we must study to do not only that which behoves us, but that which becomes us; not only that which is indisputably necessary, but that which is lovely, and of good report. [2.] Our Lord Jesus looked upon it as a thing well becoming him, to fulfill all righteousness, that is, (as Dr. Whitby explains it,) to own every divine institution, and to shew his readiness to comply with all God's righteous partings. Thus it becomes him to justify God, and approve his wisdom, in sending John to prepare his way by the baptism of repentance. Thus it becomes us to countenance and encourage every thing that is good, by pattern as well as precept. Christ often mentioned John and his baptism with honour, which, that he might do the better, he was himself baptized. Thus Jesus began his ministry in a manner that all the ministers must take the same method. Thus Christ filled up the righteousness of the ceremonial law, which consisted in divers washings; thus he recommended the gospel-ordinance of baptism to his church, put honour upon it, and shewed what virtue he designed to put into it. It became Christ to submit to John's washing with water, because it was a divine appointment; but it became him to oppose the Pharisees' washing with water, because it was a human invention and imposition; and he justified his disciples in refusing to comply with it. With the will of Christ, and this reason for it, John was entirely satisfied, and then he suffered him. The same modesty which made him at first decline the honour Christ offered him, now made him do otherwise, yet with the utmost cheerfulness and resolution; he would lose no time. How was he straitened till it was accomplished!

Now, when he was coming out of the water, and all the company had their eye upon him, 1. Lo! the heavens were opened unto him, so as to discover something above and beyond the starry firmament, at least, to him. This was, (1.) To encourage him to go on in his undertaking, with the prospect of the glory and joy that were set before him. Heaven is opened to receive him, when he has finished the work he is now entering upon. (2.) To encourage us to receive him, and submit to him. Note, In and through Jesus Christ, the heavens are opened to the children of men. Sin shut up heaven, put a stop to all friendly intercourse between God and man; but now, when Jesus Christ has done all that belongs to heaven to all believers. Divine light and love are darted down upon the children of men, and we have boldness to enter into the holiest. We have receipts of mercy from God, we make returns of duty to God, and all by Jesus Christ, who is the Ladder that has its foot on earth and its top in heaven, by whom alone it is that we have any comfortable correspondence with God. And now, when Christ is come, we have the key of heaven at last. The heavens were opened when Christ was baptized, to teach us, that when we duly attend on God's ordinances, we may expect communion with him, and communications from him.

2. He saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, or as a dove, and coming enlightening upon him. Christ
The Spirit of God descended, and lighted on him. In the beginning of the old world, the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, (Gen. 1:2.) hovered as a bird upon the nest. So here, in the beginning of this new world, Christ, as God, needed not to receive the Holy Ghost, but it was foretold that the Spirit of the Lord should rest upon him, (Isa. 11:1-2.) and we read so; for God, he was to be a Prophet; and prophets always spake by the Spirit of God, who came upon them. Christ was to execute the prophetic office, not by his divine nature, (says Dr. Whitby,) but by the allusions of the Holy Spirit. [2.] He was to be the Head of the church; and the Spirit descended upon him, by him to be delivered to all believers, in his gifts, graces, and comforts. The ointment on the head ran down to the skirts. Christ received gifts for men, that he might give gifts to men. [2.] He descended on him like a dove; whether it was a real, living dove, or, as was usual in visions, the representation or similitude of a dove, is uncertain. If there must be a bodily shape, (Luke 3:22.) it must not be that of a man, for the being seen in fashion as a man was peculiar to the second person; nor must it be the shape of any of the fowls of heaven, (heaven being uncreated,) and of all fowl none was so significant as the dove. [1.] The Spirit of Christ is a dove-like spirit; not like a silly dove, without heart, (Hos. 7:11.) but like an innocent dove without gall. The Spirit descending, not in the shape of an eagle, which is, though a royal bird, yet a bird of prey, but in the shape of a dove, than which no creature is more harmless and inoffensive. Such was the Spirit of Christ; Ye shall not strive, nor cry; such must Christians be, harmless as doves. The dove is remarkable for her eyes; we find that both the eyes of Christ, (Cant. 5:12.) and the eyes of the church, (Cant. 1:4.) are compared to doves’ eyes, for they have the same spirit. The dove mourns much, (Isa. 58:14.) Christ wept oft; and penitent souls are compared to doves of the valleys. [2.] The dove was the only fowl that did not depart from the ark. [2.] The Spirit, by the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God. [3.] The tidings of the decrease of Noah’s flood were brought by a dove, with an olive-leaf in her mouth; fitly therefore are the glad tidings of peace with God brought by the Spirit as a dove. It speaks God’s good-will toward men; that his thoughts towards us are thoughts of good, and not of evil. By the voice of the turtle heard in our land, (Cant. 2:12.) the Chaldean paraphrase understands, the voice of the Holy Spirit. That God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, is a joyful message, which comes to us upon the wing, the wings of a dove. 3. To explain and complete this solemnity, there came a voice from heaven, which, we have reason to think, was heard by all that were present. The dove was manifestly the symbol of the descent of the Spirit, but God the Father by a voice; for when the law was given they saw no manner of similitude, only they heard a voice: (Deut. 4:12.) and so this gospel came, and gospel indeed it is, the best news that ever came from heaven to earth; for it speaks plainly, and fully God’s favour to Christ, and us in him.

1. See here how God owns our Lord Jesus; This is my Son, in Sins. Observe, [1.] The relation he stood in to him; He is my Son. [2.] He is the only Son of God by eternal generation, as he was begotten of the Father before all worlds, (Col. 1:15. Heb. 1:1.) and by supernatural conception; he was therefore called the Son of God, because he was condescended by the power of the Holy Ghost; (Luke 1:35.) yet this is not all; he is the Son of God by special designation to the work and office of the World’s Redeemer. He was sanctified and sealed, and sent upon that errand, brought up with the Father for it, (Prov. 8:30.) appointed to it; I will make him my First-born, Ps. 89.27. [2.] The affection the Father had for him; He is my beloved Son; his dear Son, the Son of his love; (Col. 1.13.) he had lain in his bosom from all eternity, (John 1.18.) had been always his delight, (Prov. 8:30.) but particularly as Mediator, and in undertaking the work of man’s salvation, he was his beloved Son. He is mine Elect, in whom my soul delights. See Isa. 42.1. Because he consented to the covenant of redemption, and delighted to do that will of God, therefore the Father loved him. John 10.17.—3.35. Behold, then, behold, and wender, what manner of love the Father has bestowed upon us, that he should deliver up him that was the Son of his love, to suffer and die for these that were the generation of his wrath; yea, and that he therefore loved him, because he laid down his life for the sheep! Now know we that he loved us, seeing he has not withheld his Son, his only Son, his Isaac whom he loved, but gave him to be a sacrifice for our sin.

2. See here how ready he is to own us in him; He is my beloved Son, not only with whom, but in whom, I am well-pleased. He is pleased with all that are in him, and in the place of him. His heart has been displeased with the children of men, but now his anger is turned away, and he has made us accepted in the Beloved, Eph. 1.6. Let all the world take notice, that this is the Peacemaker, the Days-man, who has laid his hand upon us both, and that there is no coming to God as a Father, but by him as Mediator, John 14.6. In him our spiritual sacrifices are acceptable, for he is the Mediator that sanctifies every gift. 1 Pet. 2.5. One of Christ, God is a consummating Fire, but, in Christ, a reconciled Father. This is the sum of the whole gospel; it is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that God has declared, by a voice from heaven, that Jesus Christ is his beloved Son, in whom he is well-pleased, with which we must by faith cheerfully concur, and say, that he is our beloved Saviour, in whom we are well-pleased.

CHAP. IV.

John Baptist said concerning Christ, He must increase, but I must decrease; and so it proved. For, after John had baptized Christ, and borne his testimony to him, we hear little more of his ministry, he had done what he came to do, and thereforefar there is as much talk of Jesus as there had been of John. As the rising Sun advances, the morning star disappears. Concerning Jesus Christ we have in this chapter, I. The temptation he underwent, the triple assault the tempter made upon him, and the reply he gave to each assault, v. 1—11. II. The teaching work he undertook, the places he preached in, (v. 12—16.) and the subject he preached on, v. 17. III. His calling of disciples, Peter and Andrew, James and John, v. 18—22. IV. His miraculous power, v. 22—24. The effect of the Gospel of the desert to them, both to be taught and to be healed.

1. THEN was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil. 2. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward an hungered. 3. And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. 4. But he answered and said, It is written. Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. 5. Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city.
and setteth him o. a pinnacle of the temple, 6.  And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down; for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. 7. Jesus said unto him, It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. 8. Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them: 9. And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. 10. Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. 11. Then the devil leaveth him, and, behold, angels came and ministered unto him.

We have here the story of a famous duel, fought hand to hand, between Michael and the dragon, the Seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, nay, the serpent himself, in which the Seed of the woman suffers, being tempted, and so has his heel bruised; but the serpent is quite baffled in his temptations, and so has his head broken; and our Lord Jesus comes off a conqueror, and so secure of not only comfort, but conquest at last, to all his faithful followers. Concerning Christ's temptation, observe,

1. The time when it happened: Then; there is an emphasis laid upon that. Immediately after the heavens were opened to him, and the Spirit descended on him, and he was declared to be the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world, the next news we hear of him is, he is tempted; for then he is best able to grapple with the temptation. Note, 1. Great privileges, and special tokens of divine favour will not secure us from being tempted. Nay, 2. After great honours put upon us, we must expect something that is humiliating; as Paul had a messenger of Satan sent to buffet him, after he had been in the third heavens. 3. God usually prepares his people for the time when he calls them to it; he gives strength according to the day, and, before a sharp trial, gives more than ordinary comfort. 4. The assurance of our sonship is the best preparative for temptation. If the good Spirit witness to our adoption, that will furnish us with an answer to all the suggestions of the evil spirit, designed either to daemon or disquiet us.

Then, when he was newly come from a solemn ordinance, when he was baptized, then he was tempted. Note, After we have been admitted into communion with God, we must expect to be set upon by Satan. The enriched soul must double its guard. When thou hast eaten and art full, then beware. Then, when he began to shew himself publicly to Israel, then he was tempted, so as he never had been while he lived in privacy. Note, The Devil has a particular spite at useful persons, who are bad, but given to do good, especially at their first setting out. It is the advice of the Son of Sirach, (Ecclesiastic. 2. 1.) My son, if thou come to serve the Lord, prepare thyself for temptation. Let young ministers know what to expect, and arm accordingly.

II. The place where it was; in the wilderness; probably in the great wilderness of Sinai, where Moses and Elijah fasted forty days, for no part of the wilderness of Judea was so abandoned to wild beasts as this is said to have been, Mark 1. 13. When Christ was baptized he did not go to Jerusalem to there to publish the glories that had been put upon him, but retired into a wilderness. After communion with God, it is good to be private a while, lest we lose what we have received, in the crowd and hurry of worldly business. Christ withdrew into the wilderness, 1. To gain advantage to himself. Retirement gives an opportunity for meditation and communion with God, and for the most active life must yet have their contemplative hours, and must find time to be alone with God. Those are not fit to speak of the things of God in public to others, who have not first conversed with those things in secret by themselves. When Christ would appear as a Teacher come from God, it shall not be said of him, "He is newly come from travelling." He abounds in knowledge, but, "He is newly come out of a desert, he has been alone conversing with God and his own heart." 2. To give advantage to the tempter, that he might have a readier access to him than he could have had in company. Note, Though solitude is a friend to a good heart, yet Satan knows how to improve it against us. Woe to him that is alone. Those who, under pretence of sanctity, retire from the busy world, and deserts, find that they are not out of the reach of their spiritual enemies, and that there they want the benefit of the communion of saints. Christ retired, (1.) That Satan might have leave to do his worst. To make his victory the more illustrious, he gave the enemy sun and wind on his side, and yet baffled him. He might give the Devil advantage, for the prince of this world had nothing in him; but he has in us, and therefore we must pray not to be led into temptation, and must keep out of harm's way. (2.) That he might have opportunity to do his best himself, that he might be exalted in his own strength; for so it was written, I have trod the winepress alone, and of the people there was none with me. Christ entered the lists without a second. Note, II. The preparations for it, which were two,

1. He was directed to the combat; he did not wilfully thrust himself upon it, but he was led up of the Spirit to be tempted of the Devil. The Spirit that descended upon him like a dove made him meek, and yet made him bold. Note, Our care must be, not to enter into temptation; but if God, by his providence, order us into circumstances of temptation for our trial, we must not think it strange, but do our duty, and set not our hearts and minds too fast in the faith, and all shall be well. If we presume upon our own strength, and tempt the devil to tempt us, we provoke God to leave us to ourselves; but, whosoever God leads us, we may hope he will go along with us, and bring us off more than conquerors.

Christ was led, to be tempted of the Devil, and him only, whereas others are tempted. For they are driven aside of their centre, and erst; (1.) The Devil takes hold of that handle, and ploughs with that heifer: but our Lord Jesus had no corrupt nature, and therefore he was led securely, without any fear or trembling, as a champion into the field, to be tempted purely by the Devil.

Now Christ's temptation is, (1.) An instance of his own condescension and his condescension. Thus they come against the flesh, buffetings, siftings, wearings, combats, all which denote hardship and suffering; therefore Christ submitted to them, because he would humble himself, in all things to be made like unto his brethren; thus he gave his back to the smiters. (2.) An occasion of Satan's confusion. There is no conquest without a combat. Christ was tempted, that he might overcome the tempter, who had tempted the first Adam, and triumphed over him; but he shall not always triumph, the second Adam shall overcome him, and lead captive. (3.) Matter of comfort to all the saints. In the temptation of Christ it appears, that our enemy is subtle, sly, and very dexterous in his temptations; but it appears withal, that he is not invincible. Though he is a strong man armed, yet the Captain of our salvation is stronger than he. It is some comfort to us to think that Christ suffered, being tempted; for thus it appears that temptations, if not yielded to, are discouraging to the affections; and much should he be the lot of these with whom God is well-pleased. And we have a High-Priest who knows, by experience, what it is to be tempted, and that who therefore is the more tenderly touched with the feeling of our infirmities in an hour of temptation, Heb. 2. 18.—4. 15. But it is much more a comfort to think that Christ conquered, being tempted, and conquered for us; not only that the enemy we grapple with is a conquered, baffled, disarmed enemy, but that we are interested in Christ's victory over him, and through him are more than conquerors.

2. He was dieted for the combat, as wrestlers, who are to prepare in all things; (1 Cor. 9. 25.) but Christ beyond any other, for he fasted forty days and forty nights, in compliance with the type and example of Moses the great law-giver, and of Elias the great reformer, of the Old Testament. John Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, was no less that spiritual, but not in such things as were miraculous; (John 10. 41.) that honour was reserved for Christ. Christ needed not to fast for mortification; (he had no corrupt desires to be subdued) yet he fasted, (1.) That herein he might humble himself, and might seem as one abandoned, whom no man seeketh after. (2.) That he might give Satan both occasion and advantage against him; and so make his victory over him the more illustrious. (3.) That he might sanctify and recommend fasting to us, when God in his providence calls to it; or when we are reduced to straits, and are destitute of daily food, or when it is requisite for the keeping under of the body or the quickening of prayer, those excellent preparatives for temptation. If good people are brought low, if they want friends and succours, this may comfort them, that their Master himself was in like manner exposed. We may then take occasion to remember, that the Spirit, was his Father's; and, that he took up on himself our natural infirmities, that he might alone for us, Man fell by eating, and that way we often sin, and therefore Christ was an hungered.

IV. The temptations themselves. That which Satan aimed at, in all his temptations, was, to bring him to sin against God, and so to render him for ever incapable of being a Sacrifice for the sin of others. Now, whatever the colours were, that which he aimed at was, to bring him, to. 1. To despise of his Father's goodness. 2. To presume upon his Father's power. 3. To alienate his Father's honour, by giving it to Satan. In the two former, that which he tempted him to, seemed innocent, and therein appeared the subtlety of the tempter; in the last, that which he tempted him with, seemed desirable. The two former are artful temptations, which there was need of something more than a temptation, which there was need of great resolution to resist; yet he was baffled in them all.

1. He tempted him to despise of his Father's goodness, and to distrust of his Father's care concerning him. (1.) See how the temptation was managed; (v. 3.) The tempter came to him. Note, The Devil is the tempter, and therefore he is Satan—an adversary; for those are our worst enemies, that entice us to sin, and are Satan's agents, are doing his work, and carrying on his designs. He is called emphatically the tempter, because he was so to our first parents, and still is so, and all other tempters are set on work by him. The tempter came to Christ in a visible appearance, not terrible and affrighting, as afterward in his agony in the garden; no, if ever the Devil transformed himself into an angel of light, he did it now, and pretended to be a good genius, a guardian angel. Observe the subtlety of the tempter, in joining this first temptation with what went before, to make it the stronger. [1.] Christ began to be hungry, and therefore the motion seemed very proper, "to turn these stones into bread" for his necessary support. Note, It is one of the wiles of Satan to take advantage of our outward condition, in that to plant the battery of his temptations. He is an adversary no less watchful than sly; and the more ingenious he is to take advantage against us, the more industrious we must be to give him none. When he began to be hungry, and that in a wilderness, where there was no house, be had then the Devil assaulted him. Note, Want and poverty are a great temptation to discontent and unbelief, and the use of unlawful means for our relief, under pretence that necessity has no law; and it is excused with this, that hunger will break through stone-walls, which yet is no excuse, for the law of God ought to be stronger to us than stone-walls. Agur prays against poverty, not because it is an affliction and reproach, but because it is a temptation; lest I be full, and steal. Those therefore who are reduced to straits, have need to double their guard; it is better to starve to death, than live and thrive by sin. [2.] Christ was lately declared to be the Son of God, and here the Devil tempts him to doubt of that; If thou be the Son of God. Had not the Devil known that the Son of God was to come into the world, he would not have said this; and had he not been told it, he would not have said it to him, nor durst he have said it, if Christ had not now drawn a veil over his glory, and if the Devil had not now put on an impudent face. First, "Thou hast now an occasion to question whether thou be the Son of God or no; for can it be, that the Son of God, who is heir of all things, should be reduced to such straits? If God were thy Father, he would not see thee, seemed very proper, 'to turn these stones into bread.' Ps. 30. 10, 12. It is true, there was a voice from heaven, This is my beloved Son, but surely it was delusion, and thou wast imposed upon by it; for either God is not thy Father, or he is a very unkind one." Note, 1. The great thing Satan aims at, in tempting good people, is, to overthrow their relation to God as a Father, and so to cut off their dependence on him, their duty to him, and their communion with him. The greatest harm that he can do to them is to make them think that they are the children of God; the evil spirit, as the accuser of the brethren, does all he can to shake that testimony. 2. Outward affictions, wants and burdens, are the great arguments Satan uses to make the people of God question their sonship; as if afflictions could not consist with, when really they proceed from, God's fatherly love. They know how to answer this temptation very ingeniously. Though I be a discouragement, though I be a reproach, though I be a curse, yet I will trust in him, and love him as a Friend, even when he seems to come forth against me as an Enemy. 3. The Devil aims to shake our faith in the word of God, and bring us to question the truth of that. Thus he began with our first parents: Eva, has God so did so and so? Surely he has not. So here, Has God said that thou art his beloved Son? Surely he did not say so; or if he did, it is not true. We then give place to the Devil, when we question the truth of any word that God has spoken; for his business, as the father of lies, is to oppose the true sayings of God. 4. The Devil carries on his designs very much by possessing people with hard thoughts of God, as if he were unkind, or unfaithful, and had forsaken or forgotten those who have ventured their all with him. He endeavoured to beget in our first parents a notion that God forbade them the tree of knowledge, because he grudged them the benefit of it; and so here he insinuates to our Saviour, that the Father had cast him off, and left him to shift for himself. But see how unreasonable this suggestion was, and how easily answered. If Christ seemed to be a mere Man now, because he was hungry, why was he not confessed to be more than a Man, even the Son of God, when for forty days he fasted, and was not hungry? Secondly, "Thou hast now an opportunity to show that thou art the Son of God. If thou art the Son of God, prove it by this, command that these stones (a heap of which, probably, lay now before him) be made bread, v. 3. John Baptist said but the other day, that God can, out of stones, raise up children to Abraham; a divine power therefore can, no doubt, turn stones into bread, for those children; if therefore thou hast that power, exert it now in a time of need for thyself." He does not say, Pray to thy Father that he would turn them into bread, but command it to be done; thy Father hath forsaken thee, set up for thyself, and be not obliged to him. The Devil is for nothing that is humbling, but every thing that is assuming; and gains his point, if he can but bring men off from their dependence upon God, and possess them with an opinion of their self-sufficiency. 2. See how this temptation was resisted and overcome. [1.] Christ refused to comply with it. He would not command these stones to be made bread; not because he could not, or his power, which soon after this, turned water into wine, could have turned stones into bread; for this was the Devil, not God, speaking. It would not be allowed. At first view, the thing appears justifiable enough, and the truth is, The more plausible a temptation is, and the greater appearance there is of good in it, the more dangerous it is. This matter would bear a dispute, but Christ was soon aware of the snares in the grass, and would not do any thing. First, That looked like questioning the truth of the voice he heard from heaven, or putting that upon a new trial which was already settled. Secondly, That looked like distrusting his Father's care of him, or limiting him to one particular way of providing for him. Thirdly, That looked like setting up for himself, and being his own carver; or, Fourthly, That looked like gratifying Satan, by doing a thing at his moment. Some would have said, To give the Devil his own way, in some things, and not to make wait upon God, to consult him, is more than his due; it is like inquiring of the god of Ekron, when there is a God in Israel. [2.] He was ready to reply to it; (v. 4.) He answered, and said, It is written. This is observable, that Christ answered and baffled all the temptations of Satan with, It is written. He is himself the Author of it, and could have produced the mind of God without having recourse to the writings of Moses; but he put honour upon the scripture, and, to set us an example, he appealed to what was written in the law; and he says this to Satan, taking it for granted that he knew well enough what was written. It is possible that these who are the Devil's children may yet know very well what is written in God's book; The devil believe, and tremble. This method we must take when at any time we are tempted to sin; resist and repel the temptation with, It is written. The word of God is the sword of the Spirit, therefore we must have the spiritual armory; (Eph. 6. 17.) and we may say of it as David of Goliath's sword, none is like that in our spiritual conflicts. This answer, as all the rest, is taken out of the book of Deuteronomy, which signifies the second law, and in which there is very little ceremonial; the Levitical sacrifices and purifications could not avail in this case; and the proofs of his divinity in the real less holy water and the sign of the cross, which are of human invention; but moral precepts and evangelical promises, mixed with faith, these are mighty, through God, for the vanquishing of Satan. This is here quoted from Deut. 8. 3, where the reason given why God fed the Israelites with manna, is, because he would teach them that man shall not live by bread alone. This Christ applies to his own case. Israel was God's son, whom he called out of Egypt, (Hos. 11. 1.) so was Christ; (ch. 2. 15.) Israel was then in a wilderness, Christ was so now, perhaps the same wilderness. Now, First, The Devil would have him question his sonship, because he was in straits; no, says he, Israel was God's son, and a son he was very tender of, and whose manners he would not rob of that name, (Eph. 2. 13, 15.) and yet he brought them into straits; and it follows there, (Deut. 8. 5.) As a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee. Christ, being a Son, thus learns obedience. Secondly, The Devil would have him distrust his Father's love and care. "No," says he, "that would be to do as Israel did, who, when they were in want, said, Is the Lord among us? and, Can he furnish a table in the wilderness? Can he give bread?" Thirdly, The Devil would have him, as soon as he began to be hungry, immediately look out for supply; whereas God, for wise and holy ends, suffered Israel to hunger before he fed them; to humble them, and prove them. God will have his children, when they want, not only to wait on him, but to wait for him. Fourthly, The Devil would have him to supply himself with bread; "No," says he, "I am not here as a man, but as a Christ. It is a point long since settled, and incontestably proved, that man may live without bread, as Israel in the wilderness lived forty years upon manna." It is true, God, in his providence, ordinarily maintains men by bread out of the earth; (Job 28. 6.) but he can, if he pleases, make use of other means to keep men alive; any word proceeding out of the mouth of God, any thing that God shall order and appoint for that end, will be as good a livelihood for man as bread, and will maintain him as well. As we may have bread, and yet not be nourished, if God deny his blessing, (Hab. 1. 6, 9; Mic. 6. 14.) for though bread is the staff of life, it is God's blessing that is the staff of bread; so we may want bread, and yet he nourish some other way. God sustained the prophet Elijah by the ravens, (1 Kings 17.) and sustained himself just now for forty days; he sustained Israel with bread from heaven, angels' food; Elijah with bread sent miraculously by ravens, and another time with the widow's meal miraculously multiplied; therefore Christ need not turn stones into bread, but trust God to keep him alive some other way; no that he is hungry, as he had done forty days before he hungered. As God is so wise, he must not think to live without God, so in our greatest straits we must learn to live upon God; and when the fig-tree does not blossom, and the field yields no meat, when all ordinary means of succour and support are cut off, yet then we must rejoice in the Lord; then we must not think to command what we will, though contrary to his command, but must humbly pray for what he thinks fit to give us, and be thankful for the bread of our allowance, though a short allowance. Let us learn of Christ here to be at God's finding, rather than at our own; and not to take any irregular courses for our supply, when our wants are ever so pressing. (Ps. 37. 3.) Jehovah-jireh; some way or other the Lord will provide. It is better to live poorly upon the fruits of God's goodness, than live plentifully upon the products of our own sin.

2. He tempted him to presume upon his Father's power and protection! See what a restless unrestrained adversary the Devil is! If he fail in one assault, he tries another.

Now in this second attempt we may observe, (1.) What the temptation was, and how it was managed. In general, finding Christ so confident of his Father's care of him, in point of nourishment, he endeavours to draw him to presume upon that care, first subtle the Devil, as in the case of missing our way, both on the right hand and on the left, and therefore must take heed, lest, when we avoid one extreme, we be brought by the artifices of Satan, to run into another; lest, by overcoming our prodigality, we fall into covetousness. Nor are any extremes more dangerous than those of despair and presumption, especially in the affairs of religion. Some people who have obtained a persuasion that Christ is able and willing to remove them from their sins, are then tempted to presume that he will save them in their sins. Thus when people begin to be zealous in religion, Satan hurries them into bigotry and intemperate heats.

Now in his temptation we may observe,

[1.] How he made way for it. He took Christ, not by force and against his will, but moved him to go, he persuaded him to go. Note, Either Christ went upon the ground, and so went up the stairs to the top of the temple, or whether he went in the air is uncertain; but so it was, that he was set upon a pinnacle, or spire; upon the face, (so some,) upon the battlements, (so others,) upon the wing, (so the word is,) of the temple. Now observe, First, How submissively Christ was, in suffering himself to be hurried thus, that he might let Satan do his worst. First, An evil attempt to pull him up to the top of the temple was made; but he, as if it never had a possibility of success, lost all the hurry he made. Second, He was, in the choice of the place for his temptations. Intending to solicit Christ to an ostentation of his own power, and a vain-glorious presumption upon God's providence, he fixes him on a public place in Jerusalem, a populous city, and the joy of the whole earth; in the temple, one of the wonders of the world, continually gazed upon with admiration by some one or other. There he might make himself remarkable, and he taken notice of by every body, and prove himself the Son of God: not, as he was urged in the former temptation, in the obscurities of a wilderness, but before multitudes, upon the most eminent stage of action.

Observe, 1. That Jerusalem is here called the holy city; for so it was in name and profession, and there was in it a holy seed, that was the substance thereof. Note. There is no city on earth so holy as to exempt and secure us from the Devil and his temptations. The first Adam was tempted in the holy garden, the second in the holy city. Let us not, therefore, in any place, be off our watch. Nay, the holy city is the place where he does, with the greatest advantage and success, tempt men to pride and presumption; but, blessed be God, into the Jerusalem above, that holy city, no sinner shall enter; there we shall be for ever out of temptation.

2. That he set him upon a pinnacle of the temple, which (as Josephus describes it, Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 14.) was so very high, that it would make a man's head dizzy to look down to the bottom. Note, Pinnacles of the temple areplaces of temptation; I mean, (1.) High places are so; they are places of admiration, by being high above the others, and a man a fair mark for Satan to shoot his fiery darts at. God casts down, that he may raise up; the Devil raises up, that he may cast down: therefore they who would take heed of falling, must take heed of climbing. (2.) High places in the church are, in a special manner, dangerous. They who excel in gifts, who are in eminent stations, and have gained great reputation, have need to keep humble; for Satan will, if he can, draw them up with pride, that they may fall into the condemnation of the Devil. Those that stand high are charged to stand fast.

[2.] How he moved it; "If thou be the Son of God, now show thyself to the world, and prove thyself to be so; cast thyself down, and then," First, Thou wilt be admired, as under the special protection of God, so long as they see thee receive no hurt by a fall from such a height. The Devil, as the barbarous people did of Paul, “that thou art a God.” Tradition says, that Simon Magus by this very thing attempted to prove himself a god, but that his pretensions were disproved, for he fell down, and was miserably bruised. “Nay,” Secondly, “Thou wilt be receiv’d, as coming with a special commission from Heaven. All Jerusalem shall see and acknowledge, not only that thou art more than a man, but that thou art that Angel of the covenant, that should suddenly come to the temple, (Mal. 3. 1.) and from thence descend into the streets of the holy city; and thus the work of convincing the Jews will be cut short, and soon done.”

Observe, The Devil said, Cast thyself down. The Devil could not cast him down, though a little while, he could not cast him down, but he was cast down. Note, The power of Satan is a limited power; hitherto he shall come, and no further. Yet, if the Devil had cast him down, he had not gained his point; that had been his suffering only, not his sin. Note, Whatever real mischief is done us, it is of our own doing; the Devil can but persuade, he cannot compel; he can but say, Cast thyself down; he cannot cast us down. Every man is tempted, when he is drawn down to give his own judgment and not enforced, but enticed. Therefore let us not hurt ourselves, and then, blessed be God, no one else can hurt us, Prov. 19. 12.

[3.] How he backed this motion with a scripture; For it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee. But is Saul also among the prophets? Is Satan so well versed in scripture, as to be able to quote it so readily? It seems, he is. Note. It is possible for a man to have his head full of scriptures notions, and his mouth full of scripture expressions, while his heart is full of reigning enmity to God and all goodness. The knowledge which the devils have of the scripture, increases both their mischieffulness and their torment. Never did the Devil speak with more vexation to himself, than when he said to Christ, I know thee whom thou art. The Devil would persuade Christ to throw himself down, hoping that he would he his own murderer, and that there would be an end of him and his undertaking, which he looked upon with a jealous eye; to encourage him to do it, he tells him, that there was no danger, that the good angels would protect him, for First, There was something right. It is true, the Devil knows it by experience; for he finds his attempts against them fruitless, and he frets and rages at it, as he did at the hedge about Job, which he speaks of so sensibly, Job 1. 10. He was also right in applying it to Christ, for to him all the promises of the protection of the saints primarily and eminently belonged; and therefore he tempted Christ, as he supposed, to measure his faith by this promise, that not a bone of theirs shall be broken. (Ps. 34. 20.) was fulfilled in Christ, John 19. 36. The angels guard the saints for Christ’s sake.

Secondly, There was a great deal wrong in it; and perhaps the Devil had a particular spite against this promise, and perverted it, because it often stood in his way, and baffled his mischievous designs against the saints. See here, 1. How he misapplied it; and that was bad. The promise is, They shall keep thee; but how? In all thy ways; not otherwise; if we go out of our way, out of the way of our duty, we forfeit the promise, and put ourselves out of God’s protection. Now this word made against the tempter, and therefore he industriously left it out. If Christ had cast himself down, he had been in no danger; for he had no call so to expose himself. It is good for us upon such occasions to consult the scriptures themselves, and not to take things upon trust, that we may not be imposed upon by those that maim and mangle the word of God; we must do as the noble Bereans, who searched the scriptures daily. 2. How he misrepresented it; and that was worse. Scripture is abused when it is pressed to patronize sin; and when men thus wrest it to their own destruction, 2 Pet. 3. 16. This promise is firm, and stands good; but the Devil made an ill use of it, when he used it as an encouragement to presume upon the divine care. Note, It is no new thing for the grace of God to be turned into wantonness; and for men to take encouragement in sin from the discoveries of God’s good will to sinners. But shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? throw ourselves down, that the angels may bend us up? God forbid.

(2.) How Christ overcame this temptation; he resisted and overcame it, as he did the former, with It is written. The Devil’s abusing of scripture did not prevent Christ from using it, but he presently urges, Deut. 6. 16. Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. The meaning of this is not, Therefore thou must not tempt me; but, Therefore I must not tempt my Father. In the place whence it is quoted, it is in the plural number. Ye shall not tempt; here it is singular, Thou shalt not. Note, We are then likely to get good by the word of God, when we hear and receive general promises as speaking to us in particular. Satan said, It is written, thou shalt not tempt. He wrote not that one scripture contradicts another. God said, It is written, thou shalt not tempt me, and he in one mind, but that is a promise, this is a precept, and therefore that is to be explained and applied by this; for scripture is the best interpreter of scripture; and they who prophesy, who expound scripture, must do it according to the proportion of faith, (Rom. 12. 6.) consistently with it.

If Christ should cast himself down, it would be the tempting of God, [1.] As it would be requiring a further confirmation of that which was so well confirmed. Christ was abundantly satisfied that God was already his Father, and took care of him, and gave his angels a charge concerning him; and therefore to put it up to a new experiment, would he tempt him, as the Pharisees tempted Christ; when they had so many signs on earth, they demanded a sign from heaven. This is limiting the Holy One of Israel. [2.] As it would be requiring a special preservation of him, in doing that which he had no call to do, we expect the name God has promised not to forsake us, therefore he should follow us out of the way of our duty; that because he has promised to supply our wants, therefore he should humour us, and please our fancies; that because he has promised to keep us, we may willfully thrust ourselves into danger, and may expect the desired end, without using the appointed means; this is presumption, this is tempting God. And it is an aggravation of the sin, that he is the Lord our God; it is an abuse of the privilege we enjoy, in having him for our God; he has thereby encouraged us to trust him, but we are very ungrateful, if therefore we tempt him; it is contrary to our duty to him as our God. This is to affront him whom we ought to honour. Note, We must never promise ourselves any more than God has promised us.

3. He tempted him to the most black and horrid idolatry, with the proffer of the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them. And here we may observe.

(1.) How the Devil made this push at our Saviour, v. 8, 9. The worst temptation was reserved for the last. Note, Sometimes the snares last; and with those, the bitterest. But the hardest blow is the sorest; therefore, whatever temptation we have been assaulted by, still we must prepare for worse; must be armed for all attacks, with the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left. In this temptation, we may observe,

[1.] What he showed him—all the kingdoms of the world. In order to this, he took him up into an exalted prospect of things; and the Devil, not content with the high mountain, produced the bursting of the heavens, as Balsam with Balaam, he changed his ground. The pinnacle of the temple is not high enough; the prince of the power of the air must have him further up into his territories. Some think this high mountain was on the other side of Jordan, because there we find Christ next after the temptation, John 1. 28, 29. Perhaps it was mount Pægah, whence Moses was bid to ascend in communion with God, and all the kings of Canaan showed him. Hither the blessed Jesus was carried for the advantage of a prospect; as if the Devil could show him more of the world than he knew already, who made and governed it. Thence he might discover some of the kingdoms situate about Jotida, though not the glory of them; but there was doubtless a jiggery and a delusion of Satan’s in it; it is probable that that which the Devil showed him was, but a landscape, an airy representation in a cloud, such as that great deceiver could easily frame and put together; setting forth, in proper and lively colours, the glories and splendid appearance of princes, and their robes and crowns, their retinue, equipage, and life-guards; the pomp of thrones, and courts, and stately palaces, the sumptuous buildings in cities, the gardens and fields, the sumptuous and magnificent instances of their wealth, pleasure, and quietness; so as might be most likely to strike the fancy, and excite the admiration and affection. Such was this show, and his taking of him up into a high mountain, was but to humour the thing, and to colour the delusion: in which vêt the blessed Jesus did not suffer himself to be imposed upon, but saw through the charade. He remained to the end, that his victory over him might be the more illustrious. Hence observe, concerning Satan’s temptations, that, First, They often come in at the eye, which is blinded to the thines it should see, and dazzled with the vanities it should be turned from. The first sin began in the eye, Gen. 3. 6. We therefore need to make a covenant with our eyes, and to pray that God would turn them away from beholding vanity.

Secondly. Temptation commonly take rise from the world, and the things of it. The lust of the flesh, and of the eye, with the pride of life, are the topics from which the Devil fetches most of his arguments.

Thirdly. That it is a great cheat which the Devil puts upon poor souls, in his temptations. He deceives, and so destroys; he imposes upon men with shadows and false colours; shows the world and the glory of it, and hides from men's eyes the sin and sorrow of it. So that, by pride of all this glory, the cares and calamities which attend great possessions, and the thorns which crown themselves are lined with. Fourthly. That the glory of the world is the most charming temptation to the unhallowed and unawary, and that by which men are most imposed upon.

Laban's sons grudge Jacob all his glory; the pride of life is the most dangerous snare.

[2.] What he said to him; (v. 2.) All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.

See,

First. How vain the promise was. All these things will I give thee. He seems to take it for granted, that in the former temptations he had in part gained his point, and proved that Christ was not the Son of God, because he had not given him those evidences of it which he demanded; but that here he was tempted by the Devil, and the man of God; for he, "It seems that the God, whose Son thou thinkest!st thyself to be, deserts thee, and starves thee—a sign that he is not thy Father; but if thou wilt be ruled by me, I will provide for thee than so; own me for thy father, and ask my blessing, and all this will I give thee." Note, Satan makes an easy prey of men, when he can persuade them to think themselves abased, as of God. Thy fall is too premeditated in that. All this will I give thee. And what was all that? It was but a map, a picture, a mere phantasm, that had nothing in it real or solid, and this he would give him; a goodly prize! Yet such are Satan's proflers. Note, Multitudes lose the sight of that which is, by setting their eyes on that which is not. The Devil's baits are all a sham; they are shows and shadows with which he deceives them, or rather they deceive him. The notions of the earth had been, long before, promised to the Messiah; if he be the Son of God, they belong to him; Satan pretends now to be a good angel, probably one of those that were set over kingdoms, and to have received a commission to deliver possession to him according to promise. Note, We must take heed of receiving even that which God had promised, out of the Devil's hand; we do so with such a precipitancy and compliance in such an sly way.

Secondly. How vile the condition was: If thou wilt fall down, and worship me. Note, The Devil is fond of being worshipped. All the worship which the heathen performed to their gods, was directed to the Devil, (Deut. 32. 17.) who is therefore called the god of this world, 2 Cor. 4. 4. 1 Cor. 10. 20. And vain would he draw Christ into his interests, and persuade him, now that he set up for a teacher, to preach up the Gentile idolatry, and to introduce it again among the Jews, and then the nations of the earth would soon flock in to him. What temptation could be more hideous, more black? Note, The best of saints may be tempted to the worst of sins, especially when they are under the power of melancholy; as, for instance, to atheism, blasphemy, murder, self-murder, and what not. It is their affliction which is their weakness, and the trial of their fidelity which they are not their sin; Christ was tempted to worship Satan.

1. With abhorrence and detestation! Get thee hence, Satan! The two former temptations had something of colour, which would admit of a consideration; but this was so gross as not to bear a parley; it appears abominable at the first sight, and therefore is immediately rejected. If the best friend we have in the world should suggest such a thing as this to us, Go, serve other gods, he must not be heard with patience, for the Devil's temptations have not been written with the same readiness in his forefront, they are open before-hand; they are not to be disputed with, but rejected; "Get thee hence, Satan! Away with it, I cannot bear the thought of it." While Satan tempted Christ to do himself a mischief, by casting himself down, though he yielded not, yet he heard it; but now that the temptation flies in the face of God, he cannot bear it; "Get thee hence, though!"

2. With an argument fetched from scripture. Note, In order to the strengthening of our resolutions against sin, it is good to see what a great deal of reason there is for those resolutions. The argument is very suitable, and exactly to the purpose, taken from Deut. 6. 13. and 10. 20. Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. Christ does not dispute whether he were an angel of light, as he pretended, or not; but though he were, for he must not be worshipped, because that is an honour due to God only. Note, It is good to make our answers to temptation as full and as brief as may be, so as not to leave room for objections. Our Saviour has recourse to the fundamental law in this case, which is indispensable, and universally obligatory. Note, Religious worship is due to God only, and must not be given to any creature; it is a flower of the crown which cannot be alienated. Note, The Devil's picture, the Lord's glory, which he will not give to another, and which he would not give to his own Son, by obliging all men to honour the Son, even as they honour the Father, if he had not been God, equal to him, and one with him. Christ quotes this law concerning religious worship, and quotes it with application to himself; First, To show that in his estate of humiliation he was himself made under this law; though, as God, he was worshipped, yet, No, he did worship God, both publicly and privately. He obliges us to no more than what he was first pleased to oblige himself to. Thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness. Secondly, To show that the law of religious worship is of eternal obligation: though he abrogated and altered many institutions of worship, yet this fundamental law of nature—that God only is to be worshipped, he came to destroy and confirm, and enforce such laws. We have here the end and issue of this conflict, v. 11. Though the children of God may be exercised with many and great temptations, yet God will not suffer them to be tempted above the strength which they either have, or he will put into them, 1 Cor. 10. 13. It is but for a season that they are in heaviness, through manifold temptations.

Now the issue was glorious; and much to Christ's honour: 1. The Devil was baffled, and quitted the field: Then the Devil left him, forced to do so by the power that went along with that word of command, Get thee hence, Satan. He made a shamefaced and inglorious retreat, and came off with disgrace; and the more daring his attempts had been, the more mortifying was the foil that was given him. Magnus tamen excitat animus—the attempt, however, in which he failed, was daring. Then, when he had done his worst, had tempted him with all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, and found that he was not influenced by that bait, that he could not prevail with that temptation. Yet when he had overthrown the children of the children of men, then he leaves him; then he gives him over as more than a man. Since this did not move him, he desairs of moving him, and begins to conclude, that he is the Son of God, and that it is in vain to tempt him any further. Note, If we resist the Devil, he will flee from us; he will yield, if we keep our ground; as when John said, the Devil was steadfastly left off speaking to him. When the Devil left our Saviour, he owned himself fairly beaten; his head was broken by the attempt he made to bruise Christ's heel. He left him because he had nothing in him, nothing to take hold of; he saw it was to no purpose, and so gave over. Note,
The Devil, though he is an enemy to all the saints, is a conquered enemy. The Captain of our salvation has defeated and disarmed him; we have nothing to do but to pursue the victory.
2. The holy angels came and attended upon our victorious Redeemer; Behold, angels came and mi-nered unto him. They came in a visible appearance, as the Devil had done in the temptation. While the Devil was making his assaults upon our Saviour, the angels stood at a distance, and their immediate attendance and ministration were suspended, that it might appear that he vanquished Satan in his own strength, and that his victory might be the more illustrious; and that afterward, when Michael makes use of his angels in fighting with the dragon and his angels, it might appear, that it is not because he needs them, or could not do his work without them, but because he is pleased to honour them so far as to employ them. One angel might have served to bring him food, but here are many attending him, to testify their respect to him, and their readiness to receive his commands. Behold this! It is worth taking notice of; (1.) That as there is a world of wicked, malicious spirits that fight against Christ and his church, and all particular believers, so there is a world of holy, blessed spirits engaged and employed for them. In refercence also to the Church of God, his church is a school of comfort from our communion with angels.
(2.) That Christ's victories are the angels' triumphs. The angels came to congratulate Christ on his success, to rejoice with him, and to give him the glory due to his name; for that was sung with a loud voice in heaven, when the great dragon was cast out, (Rev.
12. 9, 10.) Now is come salvation and strength.
(3.) That the angels ministered to the Lord Jesus, not only food, but whatever else he wanted after his great fatigue. See how the instances of Christ's condescension and humiliation were balanced with tokens of his glory. As when he was crucified in weakness, yet he lived by the power of God; so when in weakness he was tempted, was hungry and weary, yet by his divine power he commanded the ministration of angels. Thus the Son of man did eat and drink and work, as the Son of God; (Psa. 110. 4.)
and the angels were ministering unto him, (Luke 1. 13.) Thus the Son of man was tempted as a vecin the wilderness, 1 Kings 19. 4, 7. Note, Though God may suffer his people to be brought into wants and straits, yet he will take effectual care for their supply, and will rather send angels to feed them, than see them perish. Trust in the Lord, and verily thou shalt be fed, Ps. 37. 5.

Christ was thus succoured after the temptation, [1.] For his encouragement to go on in his undertaking, that he might see the powers of heaven siding with him, when he saw the powers of hell set against him. [2.] For our encouragement to trust in him; for as he knew, by experience, what it was to suffer, being tempted, and how hard that was, so he knew what it was to be succoured, being tempted, and how comfortable that was; and therefore we may expect, not only that he will sympathize with his tempted people, but that he will come in with seasonable relief to them; as our great Melcholy, when we are tempted, comforts and supports us in the battle, and as the angels here ministered to him. Lastly, Christ, having been thus signalized and made great in the invisible world by the voice of the Father, the descent of the Spirit, his victory over devils, and his demission over angels, was doubtless qualified to appear in the visible world as the Mediator between God and man; for consider how great this Man was!

12. Now when Jesus had heard that John was cast into prison, he departed into Galilee: 13. And leaving Nazareth, he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea coast, in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim. 14. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esias the prophet, saying, 15. The land of Zablon, and the land of Nephthalim, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles; 16. The people which sat in darkness saw great light: and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up. 17. From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

We have here an account of Christ's preaching in the synagogues of Galilee, for he came into the world to be a Preacher; the great salvation which he wrought out, he himself began to publish, (Heb.
2. 3.) to shew how much his heart was upon it, and ours should be.

Several passages in the other gospels, especially in that of St. John, are supposed, in the order of the story of Christ's life, to intervene between his tem-tation and his preaching in Galilee. His first appearance after his temptation, was when John Bat-pist pointed to him, saying, Behold the Lamb of God, John 1. 29. After that, he went up to Jerusalem, to the passover. (John 2.) discoursed with Nicodemus, (John 3.) with the woman of Samaria, (John 4.) and then returned into Galilee, and preached there.

But Matthew, having had his residence in Galilee, begins his story of Christ's public ministry, with his first preaching there, which here we have an account of, Observe,
1. The time; when Jesus had heard that John was cast into prison, then he went into Galilee, v. 12.
Note, 'The cry of the saints' sufferings comes up into the ears of the Lord Jesus. If John be cast into prison, Jesus hears it, takes cognizance of it, and stirs his course accordingly; he remembers the causes and situations that abide his people. Observe,
1. Christ did not go into the country, till he heard of John's imprisonment; for he must have time given him to prepare the way of the Lord, before the Lord himself appear. Providence wisely ordered it, that John should be exalted before Christ shone forth; otherwise the minds of people would have been distracted between the two; one would have said,
'I am of John, and another, I am of John.'

Christ must be our harbinger, but not his rival. The moon and stars are lost when the sun rises. John had done his work by the baptism of repentance, and then he is laid aside. The witnesses were slain when they had laid all their testimony, and not before and this, Rev. 11. 2. He did go into the country as soon as he heard of John's imprisonment; not only to provide for his own safety, Knowing that the Pharisees in Judea were as much enemies to him as Herod was to John, but to supply the want of John Baptist, and to build upon the good foundation he had laid. Note, God will not leave himself without witness, nor his church without guides; when he removes one instrument, he can raise up another, for he has the residue of the Spirit, and he will do it, if he has work to do. Moses my servant is dead, John is cast into prison; now therefore, Joshua, arise, Jesus, arise.

11. The place where he preached; in Galilee, a remote part of the country, that lay farthest from Jerusalem, and was there looked upon with contempt, as rude and boorish. The ins that he took country were reckoned out, not fit for soldiers, but not polite men, or fit for scholars. Thither Christ went, there he set up the standard of his gospel; and in this, as in other things, he humbled himself. Observe,

1. The particular city he chose for his residence; not Nazareth, where he had been bred up; no, he left Nazareth; particular notice is taken of that, v. 13. He went into Galilee, and came into the country of the Gadarees, for the men of that city thrust him out from among them, Luke 4. 29. He made them his first, and a very fair, offer of his service, but they rejected him and his doctrine, and were filled with indignation at him and it; and therefore he left Nazareth, and shook off the dust of his feet for a testimony against those there, who would not have him to teach them. Nazareth was the first place that refused Christ, and was therefore refused by him. Note, It is just with God, to take the gospel and the means of grace from those that slight them, and thrust them away. Christ will not stay long where he is not welcome. Unhappy Nazareth! If thou hast known in this thy day the things that belong to thy peace, how well had it been for thee! But now they are hid from thine eyes.

2. He did lay dwelt in Capernaum, which was a city of Galilee, but many miles distant from Nazareth, a great city and of much resort. It is said here to be on the sea coast, not the great sea, but the sea of Tiberias, an inland water, called also the lake of Gennesaret. Close by the falling of Jordan into this sea stood Capernaum, in the tribe of Naphtali, but bordering upon Zebulun; hither Christ came, and here he dwelt. Some think that his father Joseph had a habitat here, others, that he had it in Nazareth. Note, If some reject Christ, yet others will receive him, and bid him welcome. Capernaum is glad of Nazareth's leavings. If Christ's own countrymen be not gathered, yet he will be glorious. "And thou, Capernaum, hast now a day of it; thou art now lifted up to heaven; be wise for thyself, and know the time of thine visitation."

The prophecy that was fulfilled in this, v. 14—15. It is quoted, Isa. 9. 1, 2, but with some variation. The prophet in that place is foretelling a greater darkness of affliction to befal the contemporaries of Immanuel, than befell the countries there mentioned, either in their first captivity under Babylon, which was but light, (1 Kings 15. 20.) or in their second captivity under the Assyrian, which was much heavier, 2 Kings 15. 29. The punishment of the Jewish nation for rejecting the gospel, should be sorer than either; (see Isa. 8. 21, 22.) for those captivated places had some reviving in their bondage, and saw a great light again, ch. 9. 12. This is Isaiah's sense; but the Scripture has many fulfilments; and the Evangelist here takes only the latter clause, which speaks of the return of the light of liberty and prosperity to those countries that had been in the darkness of captivity, and applies it to the appearing of the gospel among them.

The places are spoken of, v. 15. The land of Zebulun is rightly said to be by the sea coast, for Zebulun was a haven of ships, and rejected in her going out, Gen. 49. 13. Deut. 33. 18. Of Napthali, it had been said, that he should give good words, (Gen. 49. 21.) and should be satisfied with favour, (Deut. 33. 22.) that is, he should be satisfied with the fulness of grace and peace which God would be pleased to bestow upon all the Gentiles. In this sense the text may be applied to the New Testament. The fulness of grace and peace which was given to the Gentiles by the gospel, was just such a fulness as is therein spoken of, which had a diffusive influence did the Sun of righteousness cast.

Now, concerning the inhabitants of these places, observe, (1.) The posture they were in before the gospel came among them; (v. 16.) they were in darkness. Note, Those that are without Christ, are in the dark, nay, they are darkness itself; as the darkness that was upon the face of the deep. Nay, they were dead, as under the day of the shadow of death, and the dead cannot see but through a glass in the dark. And the dead were not only great darkness, as the grave is a land of darkness, but great danger. A man that is desperately sick, and not likely to recover, is in the valley of the shadow of death, though not quite dead; so the poor people were in the borders of damnation, though not yet damned, dead in law. And, which is worst of all, they were sitting in this condition. Sitting is a continuing posture; where we sit, we are of a certain station, are likely to be in a certain condition, and likely to be so, despairing to find the way out. And it is a contested posture; they were in the dark, and they loved darkness, they chose it rather than light; they were willingly ignorant. Their condition was sad; it is still the condition of many great and mighty nations, which are to be thought of, and prayed for, with pity. But their condition is more sad, who sit in darkness in the midst of gospel-light. For that is in the dark because it is good light, may be sure that the sun will shortly arise; but he that is in the dark because he is blind, will not so soon have his eyes opened. We have the light, but what will that avail us, if we be not light in the Lord? (2.) The privilege they enjoyed, when Christ and his gospel came among them; it was as great a reviving as ever light was to a benighted traveller. Note, When the gospel comes, light comes; when it comes to any place, when it comes to any soul, it makes day there, John 3. 19. Luke 1. 78, 79. Light is discovering, it is directing; so is the gospel.

It is a great light; denoting the clearness and evidence of gospel-revelations; not like the light of a candle, but the light of the sun when he goes forth in his strength. Great in comparison with the light of the law, the shadows of which were now done away. It is a light of the world, and of vast consequence; it will last long, and spread far. And it is a growing light, intimating in that word, It is springing up. It was but spring of day with them; now the day dawned, which afterward shone more and more. The gospel-kingdom, like a grain of mustard-seed, or the morning-light, was small in its beginnings, gradual in its growth, but great in its perfection.

We observe, The light sprang up to them; they did not go to seek it; but were prevented with the blessings of this goodness. It came upon them ere they were aware, at the time appointed, by the disposal of him who commanded the morning, and causes the day-spring to know its place, that it may take hold of the ends of the earth, Job 38. 12, 13.

The text he preached upon is mentioned, v. 17. From that time, that is, from the time of his coming into Galilee, into the hand of Zachanah and Nabhath, from that time, he began to preach. He had been preaching, before this, in Judea, and had made and baptized many disciples; (John 4. 1.) but his preaching was not so public and constant as now it began to be. The work of the ministry is so great and awful, that it is fit to be entered upon by steps and gradual advances.

The subject which Christ dwelt upon now in his preaching, (and it was indeed the sum and substance of all his preaching,) was the very same that John had preached upon; (ch. 3. 2.) Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; for the gospel is the same for substance under various dispensations; the commands the same, and the reasons to enforce them the same; an angel from heaven daries not preach and publish the same, (Ch. 3. 1.) and will preach for it is the everlasting gospel. Fear God, and, by repentance, give honour to him, Rev. 14. 6, 7. Christ put a great respect upon John’s ministry, when he preached to the same purport that he had preached before him. By this he showed that John was his messenger and ambassador; for when he brought the errand himself, it was the same that he had sent by him. Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; Isa. 44. 26. The Son came on the same errand that the servants came on, (ch. 21. 37.) to seek fruit, fruits meet for repentance. Christ had lain in the bosom of the Father, and could have preached sublime notions of divine and heavenly things, that should have alarmed and amused the learned world, but he pitches upon this old, plain text, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand, Luke 6. 27.

[1.] This he preached first upon; he began with this. Ministers must not be ambitious of broaching new opinions, framing new schemes, or coinning new expressions, but must content themselves with plain, practical things, with the word that is nigh us, even in our mouth, and in our heart. We need not go up to heaven, nor down to the deep, for matter or language in our preaching. As John prepared Christ’s way, so Christ prepared his own, and made way for the farther discoveries he designed, with the doctrine of repentance. If any man will do this part of his will, he shall know more of his doctrine, John 7. 17. [2.] This he preached often upon; wherever he went, this was his subject, and neither he nor his followers ever reckoned it worn threadbare, as those would do that have one, that have itching ears, and are fond of novelty and variety, which is not in the nature of things, nor in the method of preaching, so truly edifying. Note, That which has been preached and heard before, may yet very profitably be preached and heard again; but then it should be preached and heard better, and with new affections; what Paul had said before, he said again, weaving, Phil. 3. 1, 18. [3.] This he preached as gospel; that it was the word of God, and the means of change and return to yourselves. Note, The doctrine of repentance is right gospel-doctrine. Not only the austere Baptist, who was looked upon as a melancholy, morose man, but the sweet and gracious Jesus, whose lips dropped as a honey-comb, preached repentance; for it is an unspeakable privilege that room is left for repentance. [4.] The reason is still the same; The kingdom of heaven is at hand; for it was not reckoned to be fully come; till the pouring out of the Spirit after Christ’s ascension. John had preached the kingdom of heaven at hand above a year before this; but now that it was so much nearer, the argument was so much of effect, as now is in the faith of the Angal, Rom. 13. 11. We should be so much the more quickened to our duty, as we see the day approaching, Heb. 10. 25.

18. And Jesus, walking by the sea of Galilee, saw two brethren, Simon called Peter, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea: for they were fishers of men. 19. And he saith unto them, Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men. 20. And they straightway left their nets, and followed him. 21. And going on from thence, he saw another two brethren, James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, in a ship with Zebedee their father, mending their nets: and he called them. 22. And they immediately left the ship and their father, and followed him.

When Christ began to preach, he began to gather disciples, who should now be the hearers, and hereafter the preachers, of his doctrine, who should now be witnesses of his miracles, and hereafter concerning them. Now, in these verses, we have an account of the first disciples that he called into fellowship with himself.

And this was an instance, 1. Of effectual calling to Christ. In all his preaching he gave a common call to repentance; but this was a particular call to those that were given him by the Father. Let us see and admire the power of Christ’s grace, own his word to be the rod of his strength, and wait upon him for those powerful influences which are necessary to the efficacy of the gospel-call—those distinguishing influences. All the country was called, but these were called out, were redeemed from amongst men. Christ gave so peculiar a call to those that were given him by the Father, that he was not manifested unto the world. 2. It was an instance of ordination, and appointment to the work of the ministry. When Christ, as a Teacher, set up his great school, one of his first works was to appoint ushers, or under-masters, to be employed in the work of instruction. Now he began to give gifts unto men, to put the treasure into earthen vessels. It was an early instance of his care for his church.

Now we may observe here.

1. Where they were called—by the sea of Galilee, where Jesus was walking, Capernaum being situated near that sea. Concerning this sea of Tiberias, the Jews have a saying, That of all the seven seas that God made, he made choice of none but this sea of Genesaret; which is very applicable to Christ’s ministry, as it is the sea of Galilee, and as he ministered with his presence and miracles. Here, on the banks of the sea, Christ was walking for contemplation, as Isaac in the field; hither he went to call disciples: not to Herod’s court, (for few mighty or noble are called,) not to Jerusalem, among the chief priests and the elders, but to the sea of Galilee; surely Christ sees not as man sees. Not but that the same power which effectually called Peter and Andrew, would have wrought upon Annas and Caiaphas, for with God nothing is impossible; but, as in other things, so in his converse and attendance, he would humble himself, and show that God has chosen the poor of this world. Galilee was a remote part of the nation, the inhabitants were less cultivated and refined, their very language was broad and uncouth to the curious, their speech bewrayed them. They who were picked up at the sea of Galilee, had not the advantages and improvements, no, not of the more polished Galileans; yet thither Christ went, to call his apostles that were to be the prime ministers of state in his kingdom. For he chose the fouls things of this world, to confound the wise.

II. Who they were. We have an account of the call of two pairs of brothers in these verses—Peter and Andrew, James and John; the two former, and, probably, the two latter also, had had acquaintance with Christ before, (John 1. 40, 41.) but were not till now called into a close and constant attendance upon him. Note, Christ brings poor souls by degrees, and not all at once, to follow him, the same as his disciples of John, and so were the better disposed to follow Christ. Note, Those who have submitted to the discipline of repentance, shall be welcome to the joys of faith. We may observe concerning them,

1. That they were brothers. Note, It is a blessed thing, when they who are kinsmen according to the flesh, (as the apostle speaks, Rom. 9. 3.) are brought together into a spiritual alliance with Jesus Christ. It is the honour of a house, and of those that are of the same family, are of God's family.

2. That they were fishers. Being fishermen, (1.) They were poor men: if they had had estates, or any considerable stock in trade, they would not have made it their trade, however they might have made it their recreation. Note, Christ does not despise the poor, and therefore we must not; the poor are evangelized, and the Fountain of honour sometimes gives more abundant honour to that part which most lacked. (2.) They were unlearned men, not bred up to books or literature as Moses was, who was conversant with all the learning of the Egyptians. Note, Christ sometimes chooses to endow those with the gifts of grace who have least to show of the gifts of nature. Yet this will not justify the bold intrusion of ignorant and unqualified men into the work of the ministry; extraordinary gifts of knowledge and spiritual endowment are not now to be expected, but requisite abilities must be obtained in an ordinary way, and without a competent measure of these, none are to be admitted to that service. (3.) They were men of business, who had been bred up to labour. Note, Diligence in an honest calling is pleasing to Christ, and no hindrance to a holy life. Moses was called from keeping sheep, and David from following the ewes, to be mighty men to display his might. He was open to the temptations of Satan than to the calls of God. (4.) They were men that were accustomed to hardships and hazards; the fisher's trade, more than any other, is laborious and perilous; fishermen must be often wet and cold; they must watch, and wait, and toil, and be often in peril by water. Note, Those who have learned to bear hardships, and to run hazards, are best prepared for the fellowship and service of Christ. Good soldiers of Christ must endure hardness.

III. What they were doing. Peter and Andrew were then using their nets, they were fishing; and James and John were mending their nets, which was an instance of their industry and good husbandry. They did not go to their father for money to buy new nets, but took pains to mend their old ones. It is commendable to make what we have as far, and last as we can, and make use of what we have. Note, their father Zebedee, ready to assist him, and make his business easy to him. Note, It is a happy and hopeful presage, to see children careful of their parents, and dutiful to them. Observe, 1. They were all employed, all very busy, and none idle. Note, When Christ comes, it is good to be found doing. "Am I in Christ?" is a very needful question for us to ask ourselves; and, next to that, "Am I in my calling?" 2. They were differently employed; two of them were fishing, and two of them mending their nets. Note, Ministers should be always employed, either in teaching or studying; they may always find themselves something to do, if it be not their own fault; and mending their nets is, in its season, as necessary work as fish for Christ. IV. What the call was. (v. 19.) Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men. They had followed Christ before, as ordinary discipless, (John 1. 37.) but so they might follow Christ, and follow their calling too; therefore they were called to a more close and constant attendance, and must leave their calling. Note, Even they who have been called to follow Christ, have need to be called to follow on, and those who have been so called, and so designed for the work of the ministry. Observe, 1. What Christ intended them for; I will make you fishers of men, this alludes to their former calling. Let them not be proud of the new honour designed them, they are still but fishers; let them not be afraid of the new work cut out for them, for they have been used to fishing, and fishers they are still. It was usual with Christ to speak of spiritual and heavenly things by such images, and in such expressions, as took rise from common things that offered themselves to his view. David was called from feeding sheep to feed God's Israel; and when he is a king, is a shepherd. Note, (1.) Ministers are fishers of men, not to destroy them, but to save them, by bringing them into another element. They must fish, not for wrath, wealth, and preference, to gain them to themselves, but for souls, rejoicing that they have gained them to Christ. They watch for your souls. (Heb. 13. 17.) and seek not yours, but you. 2 Cor. 12. 14, 16. (2.) It is Jesus Christ that makes them so; I will make you fishers of men. It is he that qualifies men for this work, calls them to it, authorizes them in it, and gives them success in it, gives them commission to fish for souls, and wisdom to win them. Those ministers are likely to have comfort in their work, who are thus made by Jesus Christ.

2. What they must do in order to this; Follow me. They must separate themselves to a diligent attendance on him, and set themselves to a humble imitation of him; must follow him as their Leader. Note, (1.) Those whom Christ employs in any service for him, must first be fitted and qualified for it. (2.) Those who would preach Christ, must first learn Christ, and learn of him. How can we expect to bring others to the knowledge of Christ, if we do not know him well ourselves? (3.) Those who would get an acquaintance with Christ, must be diligent and constant in their attendance on him. The apostles were prepared for their work, by accompanying Christ all the time that he went in and out among them, Acts 1. 21. There is no learning comparable to that which is got by following Christ. Joshua, by accompanying Moses, was fitted to be his successor. (4.) Those who are to fish for men, must first follow Christ, and do it as he did, with diligence, faithfulness, and tenderness. Christ is the great Pattern for preachers, and they ought to be workers together with him.

V. What was the success of this call. Peter and Andrew straightway left their nets; (v. 20.) and James and John immediately left the ship and their father. (v. 21.) Note, Those who would follow Christ, must leave all to follow him. Every christian must leave all in affection, sit loose to all, must hate father and mother, (Luke 14. 26.) must love them less than Christ, must be ready to part with his interest in them rather than with his interest in Jesus Christ; but those who are devoted to the work of the ministry are, in a special manner, concerned to disentangle themselves from all the affairs of this life, that they may give themselves wholly to that work which requires the whole man. Now,
1. This instance of the power of the Lord Jesus gives us good encouragement to depend upon the sufficiency of his grace. How strong and effectual is his word! He speaks, and it is done. The same power goes along with this word of Christ, Follow me, that went along with that of Moses, Let my people come out, &c. Ps. 110. 3.
2. This instance of the pliability of the disciples, gives us a good example of obedience to the command of Christ. Note, It is the good property of all Christ's faithful servants to come when they are called, and to follow their Master wherever he leads them. They objected not their present employments, their engagements to their families, the difficulties of their way; but, with hearts willing, to, or their own unfitness for it; but, being called, they obeyed, and, like Abraham, went out not knowing whither they went, but knowing very well whom they followed. James and John left their father, it is not said what became of him; their mother Salome was a constant follower of Christ; no doubt, their father Zebedee was a believer, but he called to follow Christ fastened on the young ones. Youth is the learning age, and the labouring age. The priests ministered in the prime of their time.
23. And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people. 24. And his fame went throughout all Syria: and they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatic, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them. 25. And there followed him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan.
See here, 1. What an industrious preacher Christ was; He went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom. Observe,
1. What Christ preached—the gospel of the kingdom. The kingdom of heaven, that is, of grace and glory, is emphatically the kingdom, the kingdom that was now to come; the kingdom which shall survive,
as it doth surpass, all the kingdoms of the earth.
The gospel is the charter of that kingdom, containing the King's coronation oath, by which he has graciously obliged himself to pardon, protect, and save the subjects of that kingdom; it contains also their oath of allegiance, by which they oblige themselves to observe his statutes and seek his honour; this is the gospel of the kingdom; this Christ was himself the Preacher of, that our faith in it might be confirmed, to which he so frequently points in the synagogues;
not there only, but there chiefly, because sometimes the places of concourse, where wisdom was to lift up her voice; (Prov. 1. 21.) because they were places of concourse for religious worship, and there, it was to be hoped, the minds of the people would be prepared to receive the gospel; and there the scriptures of the Old Testament were read, the expositions of which he held easily introduce the gospel of the kingdom. 3. What he did in preaching; He went about all Galilee, teaching. He might have issued out a proclamation to summon all to come to him; but, to show his humility, and the condescensions of his grace, he goes to them; for he waits to be gracious, and comes to seek and save.
Josephus says, There were about two hundred cities and towns in Galilee, and all, or most of them, Christ visited. He went about doing good. Never was there such an itinerant preacher, such an indefatigable one, as Christ was; he went from town to town, from day to day, and night to night, as the Spirit of God. This is an example to ministers, to lay themselves out to do good, and to be instant and constant,
in season, and out of season, to preach the word.
II. What a powerful Physician Christ was; he went about, not only teaching, but healing, and with his word, that he might magnify that above all his name. He sent his word, and healed them.
Now observe,
1. What diseases he cured—all without exception. He healed all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease. There are diseases which are called the refractions of physicians, being obstinate to all the methods they can prescribe; but even those were the glory of this Physician, for he healed them all, however invertebrate. His word was the true panacea.

Three general words are here used to intimate this; he healed every sickeness, above, as blindness, lameness, fever, dropsy; every disease, or languishing, paralysis, as fluxes and consumptions; and all torments, paralyses, as gout, stone, convulsions, and such like torturing distempers; whether the disease was acute or chronic; whether it was a raging or a wasting disease; none was too bad, none too weak, none too incurable, to be healed by a word's speaking.
Three particular diseases are specified; the palsy, which is the greatest weakness of the body; lissuny, which is the greatest malady of the mind; and possession of the Devil, which is the greatest misery and calamity of both; yet Christ healed all: for he is the sovereign Physician both of soul and body, and has command of all diseases.
2. What patients he had. A Physician who was so easy of access, so sure of success, who cured immediately, without either a painful suspense and expectation, or such painful remedies as are worse than the disease; who cured gratis, and took no fees, could not but have abundance of patients. See here what flocking there was to him from all parts;
great multitudes of people came, not only from Gailee, but from the country about that town of Jerusalem, and from Judea, which lay a great way off;
for his fame went throughout all Syria, not only among all the people of the Jews, but among the neighbouring nations, which, by the report that now spread far and near concerning him, would be prepared to receive his gospel, when afterwards it should be brought them. This is given as the reason why multitudes came to him. Note, What we hear of Christ from others, should invite us to invite him. The queen of Sheba was invited, by the fame of Solomon, to pay him a visit. The voice of fame is,
"Come, and see." Christ both taught and healed.
They who came for cures, met with instruction concerning the things that belonged to their peace. It is well if any thing will bring people to Christ; and they who come to him, will find more in him than they expected, and more than they could have imagined. Nothing else will do for those who are Syrian, coming to be healed of their diseases, many of them became converts. 2 Kings 5. 15, 17. They sought health for the body, and obtained the salvation of the soul; like Saul, who sought the asses, and found the kingdom. Yet it appeared, by the issue, that many of those who rejoiced in Christ as a Healer, forgot him as a Teacher.
Now concerning the cures which Christ wrought, let us, once for all, observe the miracle, the mercy,
and the mystery of them.
1. The miracle of them. They were wrought in such a manner, as plainly speak them to be the immediate products of a divine and supernatural power; and they were God's seal to his commission. Nature could not do these things, it was the God of nature; the cures were many, of diseases incurable by the art of the physician, of persons that were strangers, of all ages and conditions; the cures were wrought openly, before many witnesses, in mixed companies of persons that would have denied the matter of fact, if they could have had any colour for it. No cure ever failed, or was afterward called in question; they were wrought speedily, and not (as cures by natural causes) gradually; they were perfect cures, and wrought with a worldly speaking; all which proves him a Teacher come from God, for, otherwise, none could have done the works that he did, John 3. 2. He appeals to these as credentials, ch. 11. 4. 5. John 5. 35. It was expected that the Messiah should work miracles, (John 7. 31.) miracles of this nature; (Isa. 35. 6.) and we have this indisputable proof of his being the Messiah; never was there any man that did thus; and therefore his healing and his preaching gentry, (as John would have us think,) and the same went together, for the former confirmed the latter; thus here he began to do and to teach, Acts 1. 1.

(2.) The mercy of them. The miracles that Moses wrought, to prove his mission, were most of them plagues and judgments, to intimidate the terror of that dispensation, though from God; but the miracles that Christ wrought, were all of them blessings (except the cursing of the barren fig-tree) blessings and favours; for the gospel-dispensation is founded, and built up, in love, and grace, and sweetness; and the management is such as tends not to affright but to allure us to obedience. Christ designed by his cures to win upon people, and to ingratiate himself and his doctrine into their minds, and so to draw them with the bands of love. Hos. 11. 4. The miracle of him proved, his doctrine a faithful saying, and convinced men's judgments; the mercy of them proved it worthy of all acclamation, and wrought upon their affections. They were not only great works, but good works, that he showed them from his Father; (John 10. 32.) and his goodness was intended to lead men to repentance, (Rom. 2. 4.) as also to show that kindness, and beneficence, and doing good to all, to the utmost of our power, and opportunity, are essential branches of that holy religion which Christ came into the world to establish. (3.) The mystery of them. Christ, by curing bodily diseases, intended to show that his great errand into the world was to cure spiritual maladies. He is the Sun of Righteousness, that arises with this healing under his wings. As the Conventor of sinners, he is the Physician of souls, and has taught us that his very presence is medicinal, and a cure, as our rule, v. 17. But in the world, in this case, it is the words and wondrous works that are directed to this end, and are spoken of as medicinal. It is to show that the devil, the enemy, and all his operations, are the power of sin and corruption; and to that end, the miracle of healing was spoken of as medicinal. God sent forth his Son that he might have life in him, John 3. 17.
an exposition of the law, upon a mountain, because upon a mountain the law was given; and this was also a solemn promulgation of the christian law. But observe the difference: when the law was given, the Lord came down upon the mountain; now the Lord went up: then, he spake in thunder and lightning; now, in a still small voice; then the people were ordered to keep their distance; now they are invited to a blessed change! If God’s grace and goodness are (as certainly they are) his glory, then the glory of the gospel is the glory that excels, for grace and truth came by Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. 3. 7. Heb. 12. 18. &c. It was foretold of Zebedan and Issaachar, two of the tribes of Galilee, (Dent. 33. 19.) that they shall call the people to the mountain; to this mountain we are called, to learn to offer the sacrifices of righteouness. Now was this the mountain of the Lord, where he taught as his ways, Isa. 2. 2. 3. Mic. 4. 1. 2.

III. The auditors were his disciples, who came unto him; came at his call, as appears by comparing Mark 3. 13. Luke 6. 13. To them he directed his speech, because they followed him for love and learning, while others attended him only for cures. He taught them, that he was willing to be taught; (the meek will he teach his way;) because they would understand what he taught, which to others was foolishness; and because they were to teach others; and it was therefore requisite that they should have a clear and distinct knowledge of these things themselves. The duties prescribed in this sermon were to be conscientiously performed by all those that would enter into that kingdom of heaven which they were set up, with hope, to have the benefit of it. But though this discourse was directed to the disciples, it was in the hearing of the multitude; for it is said, (ch. 7. 28.) The people were astonished. No bounds were set about this mountain, to keep the people off, as were about mount Sinai; (Exod. 19. 12.) for, through Christ, we have access to God, not only to speak to him, but to hear from him. Nay, he had an eye to the multitude, in preaching this sermon. When the fame of his miracles had brought a vast crowd together, he took the opportunity of so great a confluence of people, to instruct them. Note, It is an encouragement to a faithful minister to cast the net of the gospel where there are a great many fishes, in hope that some will be caught. The sight of a multitude puts life into a preacher, which yet must arise from a desire of their profit, not his own praise.

IV. The solemnity of his sermon is intimated in that word, when he was set. Christ preached many times occasionally, and by interlocutory discourses; but this was a set sermon, καθὼς ὁ διάκονος ἔλαβε τοῦτον, when he had placed himself so as to be best heard. He sat down as a Judge or Lawgiver. It intimates with what dignity and solemnity composed and the approbation of God should be spoken and heard. He sat, that the scriptures might be fulfilled, (Mal. 3. 3.) He shall sit as a refiner, to purge away the dross, the corrupt doctrines of the sons of Levi. He sat as in the throne, judging right; (Ps. 9. 4.) for the word he speak shall judge us. That phrase, He opened his mouth, is only a Hebrew periphrasis of speaking, as Job 3. 1. Yet it intimates the importance of this discourse; the congregation being large, he required his voice, and spake louder than usual. He had spoken long by his servants the prophets, and opened their mouths; (Ezek. 3. 27. 24. 27. 31. 22.) but now he opened his own, and spake with freedom, as one having authority. One of the ancients has this remark upon it; Christ taught much without opening his mouth, that is, by his holy and exemplary life; nay, he taught, when, being led as a lamb to the slaughter, he opened not his mouth; but now he opened his mouth, and taught, that the scriptures might be fulfilled, Prov. 8. 1, 2, 6. Doth not Wisdom cry—cry on the top of high places? And the opening of her lips shall be right things. He taught them, according to the promise, (Isa. 54. 13.) All thy children shall be taught of the Lord; for this purpose he had the tongue of the learned, (Isa. 53. 4.) and the Spirit of the Lord, Isa. 11. 2. He taught them, which were the end and they could bear, and what the good they should abide and abound in; for Christianity is not a matter of speculation, but is designed to regulate the temper of our minds and the tenor of our conversations; gospel-time is a time of reformation; (Heb. 9. 10;) and by the gospel we must be reformed, must be made good, must be made better. The truth, as it is in Jesus, is the truth which is according to godliness, 1 Th. 1. 1.

3. Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. 4. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. 5. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth. 6. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled. 7. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. 8. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. 9. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God. 10. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness’ sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. 11. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. 12. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.

Christ begins his sermon with blessings, for he came into the world to bless us, (Acts 3. 26.) as the great High-Priest of our profession; as the blessed Melchizedec; as He in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed, Gen. 12. 3. He came not only to purchase the evil they, but to take it away; and pronounce blessings on us; and here he does it as one having authority, as one that can command the blessing, even life for evermore, and that is the blessing here again and again promised to the good; his pronouncing of them happy makes them so; for those whom he blesses, are blessed indeed. The Old Testament ended with a curse, (Mal. 4. 6.) the New Testament begins with a blessing; and Christ invited them to another blessing, that we should inherit the blessing. Each of the blessings Christ here pronounces has a double intention: 1. To show who they are that are to be accounted truly happy, and what their characters are. 2. What that is—wherein true happiness consists in the promises made to persons of certain characters, the performance of which will make them happy.
ent the fat, and drink the sweet, and carry all before them with a high hand, and have every sheaf bowing to their sheaf; happy the people that is such a case; and their designs, aims, and purposes are acceptable, they will bless the Lord, (Ps. 10. 3.) they will be red.

Now our Lord Jesus came to correct this fundamental error, to advance a new hypothesis, and to give us quite another notion of blessedness and blessed people, which, however paradoxical it may appear to those who are prejudiced, yet is in itself, and appears to be to all who are savingly enlightened, a rule and doctrine of eternal truth and certainty, by which all must be judged. If this, therefore, be the beginning of Christianity, not beginning of a christian's practice must be to take his measures of happiness from those maxims, and to direct his pursuits accordingly.

2. It is designed to remove the discouragements of the weak and poor who receive the gospel, by assuring them that his gospel did not make those only happy that were eminent in gifts, graces, comforts, and usefulness; but that even the least in the kingdom of heaven, whose heart was upright with God, was happy in the honours and privileges of that kingdom.

3. It is designed to invite souls to Christ, and to make way for his law into their hearts. Christ's pronouncing these blessings, not at the end of his sermon, to dismiss the people, may remind us of mount Gerizim and mount Ebal, on whose blessings we may depend when the law were read, Deut. 27. 12. &c. There the curses are expressed, and the blessings only implied; here the blessings are expressed, and the curses implied: in both, life and death are set before us; but the law appeared more as a ministration of death, to deter us from sin; the gospel as a dispensation of life, to allure us to Christ, in whom alone all good is to be found. And he by whom these gracious words were wrought by his hand, (ch. 4. 23, 24.) and who heard the gracious words proceeding out of his mouth, would say that he was all of a piece, made up of love and sweetness.

4. It is designed to settle and sum up the articles of agreement between God and man. The scope of the divine revelation is to let us know what God expects from us, and what we may then expect from him. He has now more fully set forth in a few words than here, nor with a more congruity to each other; and that is that gospel which we are required to believe; for what is faith but a conformity to these characters, and a dependence upon these promises? The way to happiness is here opened, and made a highway; (Isa. 35. 8.) and this coming from the mouth of Jesus Christ, it is intimated that from him, and by him, we are to receive both the seed and the fruit; both the grace required, and the glory promised. Nothing passes through the heart of a wretched and fallen man, but through his hand. Some of the wiser heathen had notions of blessedness different from the rest of mankind, and looking toward this of our Saviour. Seneca, undertaking to describe a blessed man, makes it out, that it is only an honest, good man that is to be so called: De Vida beati. V. "Cui multum bonus malumque sit, nisi bonus multus animus, et excellens fortitudo, nec fragant—Cui vera voluptas, nec bona multa—Cui contemptus—Cui tum bonus honestas, tum malum turpitudine. In whom estimation nothing is good or evil, but a good or evil heart—Whom no occurrences slavely or defect—Whose true pleasure consists in a contempt of pleasure—To whom the only good is virtuous, and the only evil vice."

Our Lord Jesus gives us eight characters of blessed people, which represent to us the principal graces of a christian. On each of them a present blessing is pronounced; Blessed are they; and to each a future blessedness is promised, which is variously expressed, so as to suit the nature of the grace or duty recommended.

Do we ask then who are happy? It is answered, 1. The poor in spirit are happy, v. 3. There is a poverty of spirit that is so far from making men blessed, that it is a sin and a sorrow, and base fear, and a willing subjection to the lusts of men. But this poverty of spirit is a gracious disposition of soul, by which we are emptied of self, in order to our being filled with Jesus Christ. To be poor in spirit, is, 1. To be contentedly poor, willing to be empty of worldly wealth, if God orders that to be our lot; to bring our mind to our condition, when it is low; and to commit all things to a wise dispensation, high in spirit, poor and proud, murmuring and complaining, and blaming their lot, but we must accommodate ourselves to our poverty, must know how to be abused, Phil. 4. 12. Acknowledging the wisdom of God in appointing us to poverty, we must be easy in it, patiently bear the inconveniences of it, be thankful for what we have, and make the best of that which is. It is to sit loose to all worldly wealth, and not set our hearts upon it, but cheerfully to bear losses and disappointments, which may befall us in the most prosperous state. It is not, in pride or pretence, to make ourselves poor, by throwing away what God has given us, especially as those in the church of Rome, who vew poverty, and yet encroach the wealth of nations; but, if we be rich in the world, we must be poor in spirit, that is, we must confound the poor, and sympathize with them, as being touched with the feeling of their infirmities. We must expect and prepare for poverty; must not inordinately fear or shun it, but must bid it welcome, especially when it comes upon us for keeping a good conscience, Heb. 10. 34. Job was poor in spirit, when he blessed God in taking away, as well as giving. 2. It is to be humble and lowly in our own eyes. To be poor in spirit, is to think meanly of ourselves, to value what we are, and do; the poor are often taken in the Old Testament for the humble and self-denying, as opposed to those that are at ease, and the proud; it is to be as little children in our opinion of ourselves, weak, foolish, and insignificant, ch. 18. 4—19. 14. Laodicea was poor in spirituals, wretchedly and miserably poor, and yet rich in spirit, so well increased with goods, as to have need of nothing, Rev. 3. 17. On the other hand, Paul was rich in spirituals, excelling most in gifts and graces, and yet poor, out of love to the poor, though worse than the least of all saints, and nothing in his own account. It is to look with a holy contempt upon ourselves, to value others, and undervalue ourselves in comparison of them. It is to be willing to make ourselves cheap, and mean, and little, to do good; to become all things to all men. It is to acknowledge that God is great, and we are mean; that he is holy, and we are sinful; that he is all, and we are nothing, less than nothing, and wretched, to be willing to humble ourselves before him, and under his mighty hand. 3. It is to come off from all confidence in our own righteousness and strength, that we may depend only upon the merit of Christ for our justification, and the Spirit and grace of Christ for our sanctification. That broken and contrite spirit with which the publican cried for mercy to a poor sinner, is this poverty of spirit. Who is poor, because he is always in want of God's grace, always begging at God's door, always hanging on in his house. Now, (1.) This poverty in spirit is put first among the christian graces. The philosophers did not reckon humility among their moral virtues, but Christ puts it first. Self-denial is the first lesson to be learned in his school, and poverty of spirit entitled to the first foundation. The foundation of all other graces is laid in humility. Those who would build high, must begin low; and it is an excellent preparation for the entrance of gospel-grace into the soul; it fits the soil to receive the seed. Those who are weary and heavy laden, are the poor in spirit, and they shall find rest with Christ.

2. They are blessed. Now they are so, in this world. God looks graciously upon them. They are his little ones, and have their angels. To them labor, whether they be rich or poor, easy or heavy, is easy, and they are easy to themselves and all about them, and nothing comes amiss to them; while high spirits are always uneasy.

3. There is the kingdom of heaven. The kingdom of grace is composed of such; they only are fit to be members of Christ's church, which is called the congregation of the poor. (Ps. 74. 19.) The kingdom of glory is prepared from those who humble themselves, and comply with God when he humbles them, shall be thus exalted. The great, high spirits go away with the glory of the kingdoms of the earth; but the humble, mild, and yielding souls obtain the glory of the kingdom of heaven. We are ready to think concerning these who are rich, and do good with their riches, that, no doubt, theirs is the kingdom of this world; but we can thus far say, in store a good security for the time to come; but what shall the poor do, who have not wherewithal to do good? Why, the same happiness is promised to those who are contentedly poor, as to those who are usefully rich. If I am not able to spend cheerful for his sake, if I can but want cheerfully for his sake, even that shall be recompensed. And do not receive a good Master then?

II. They that mourn are happy; (v. 4.) Blessed are they that mourn. This is another strange blessing, and fits suddenly the former. The poor are accustomed to mourn, the graciously poor mourn graciously. We are apt to think, Blessed are the merry; but Christ, who was himself a great Mourner, says, Blessed are the mourners. There is a sinful mourning, which is an enemy to blessedness—the sorrow of the world; despairing melancholy upon a spiritual account, and disconsolate grief upon a temporal account. There is a natural mourning, which may prove a friend to blessedness, by the grace of God working with it, and sanctifying the afflictions to us, for which we mourn. But there is a gracious mourning, which qualifies for blessedness, a habitual seriousness, the mind mortified to mirth, and an actual brokenness of spirit, a confession of our own sins; this is godly sorrow, a sorrow according to God; sorrow for sin, with an eye to Christ, Zech. 12. 10. Those are God's mourners, who live a life of repentance, who lament the corruption of their nature, and their many actual transgressions, and God's withdrawings from them; and who, out of regard to God's honour, mourn also for the sins of others, and sigh and cry for their abominations, Ezek. 9. 4. 2. A sympathizing mourning for the afflictions of others; the mourning of those who weep with them that weep, are sorrowful for the solemn assemblies, for the desolations of Zion, (Zech. 3. 18. Ps. 137. 1.) especially who look with compassion on perishing souls, and weep over them, as Christ over Jerusalem.

1. These gracious mourners, (1.) Are blessed. As in vain and sinful laughter the heart is sorrowful, so in gracious mourning the heart has a serious joy, a secret satisfaction, which a stranger does not intermeddle with. They are blessed, for they are like the Lord Jesus, who was a man of sorrows, and of whom we never read that he laughed, but often that he wept. They are armed against the many temptations of the flesh, against the world, and are prepared for the comforts of a sealed pardon and a settled peace.

2. They shall be comforted. Though perhaps they are not immediately comforted, yet plentiful provi-
of the divine favour. 1. Righteousness is here put for all spiritual blessings. See Ps. 24. 5.—ch. 6. 33. They are purchased for us by the righteousness of Christ; conveyed and secured by the imputation of that righteousness to us; and confirmed by the faithfulness of God. To have Christ made of God to us Righteousness, and to be made the righteousness of God in him; to have the whole man renewed in righteousness, so as to become a new man, and to bear the image of God; to have an interest in Christ and the promises—this is righteousness.

2. These we must hunger and thirst after. We must truly and really desire them, as one who is hungry and thirsty desires meat and drink, who cannot be satisfied with any thing but meat and drink, and will be satisfied with them, though other things be sweeter. Our desires of spiritual blessings must be earnest and imperative: "Grant these, or else I die; every thing else is cross and chaff, unsatisfying; give me these, and I have enough, though I had nothing else." Hunger and thirst are appetites that return frequently, and call for fresh satisfactions; so these holy desires rest not in any thing attained, but are carried out toward renewed pardons, and daily fresh supplies of grace. The question is, how to give these appetites of righteousness, grace to do the work of every day in its day, as duly as the living body calls for food. Those who hunger and thirst will labour for supplies; so we must not only desire spiritual blessings, but take pains for them in the use of the appointed means. Dr. Hammond, in his Practical Catechism, distinguishes between hunger and thirst. Hunger is a desire of food to sustain, such is satisfaction; righteousness. Thirst is the desire of drink to refresh, such is justifying righteousness, and the sense of our pardon.

Those who thus hunger and thirst after spiritual blessings, are blessed in those desires, and shall be filled with those blessings. (1.) They are blessed in those desires. Though all desires of grace are not grace, (elevated, faint desires are not;) yet such a desire is a proof of some inward principle. Our desires of spiritual blessings must be earnest and imperative: "Grant these, or else I die; every thing else is cross and chaff, unsatisfying; give me these, and I have enough, though I had nothing else." Hunger and thirst are appetites that return frequently, and call for fresh satisfactions; so these holy desires rest not in any thing attained, but are carried out toward renewed pardons, and daily fresh supplies of grace. The question is, how to give these appetites of righteousness, grace to do the work of every day in its day, as duly as the living body calls for food. Those who hunger and thirst will labour for supplies; so we must not only desire spiritual blessings, but take pains for them in the use of the appointed means. Dr. Hammond, in his Practical Catechism, distinguishes between hunger and thirst. Hunger is a desire of food to sustain, such is satisfaction; righteousness. Thirst is the desire of drink to refresh, such is justifying righteousness, and the sense of our pardon.

V. The merciful are happy, v. 7. This, like the rest, is a paradox; for the merciful are not taken to be the wisest, nor are likely to be the richest; yet Christ pronounces them blessed. Those are the merciful, who are piously and charitably inclined to pity, help, and succour, persons in misery. A man may he truly merciful, who has not wherewithal to be merciful, if he be so disposed; who does but what is in his own willing mind. We must not only bear our own afflictions patiently, but we must, by christian sympathy, partake of the afflictions of our brethren; pity must be showed, (Job 6. 14.) and bowls of mercy put on; (Col. 3. 12.) and, being put on, they must put forth themselves in contributing all we can for the assistance of those who are any way in misery. We must have compassion on the souls of others, and help them; pity the ignorant, and instruct them; the careless, and warn them; those who are in a state of sin, and snatch them as brands out of the burning. We must have compassion on those who are melancholy and in sorrow, and comfort them; (Job 16. 5.) on those whom we have advantage against, and not be rigorous and severe with them; on those who are in want, and supply them; which if we do in the heart, we must show it also in our hands; shut up the bowls of our compassion, James 2. 15, 16. 1 John 3. 17, 18. Draw out thy soul by dealing thy bread to the hungry, Isa. 58. 7, 90, Nay, a good man is merciful to his heart.

Now, as to the merciful, 1. They are blessed; so it was said in the Old Testament; Blessed is he that considers the poor, Ps. 41. 1. Herein they resemble the God, who, "in that the merciful as he is merciful, we are, in our measure, perfect as he is perfect. It is an evidence of love to God; it will be a satisfaction to ourselves, to be so only instrumental for the benefit of others. One of the purest and most refined delights in this world, is that of doing good. In this word, Blessed are the merciful, is included that saying of Christ, which otherwise we find not in the gospels, It is eternal life. The merciful shall find with God eternal mercy, (ch. 6. 14.) satisfying mercy, (Prov. 19. 17.) sustaining mercy, (Ps. 41. 2.) mercy in that day; (2 Tim. 1. 18.) nay, they shall inherit the kingdom prepared for them; (ch. 25. 34, 35.) whereas they have judgment without mercy, (which can be nothing short of hell-fire,) who have showed no mercy.

VI. The pure in heart are happy; (v. 8.) Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. This is the most comprehensive of all the beatitudes; here holiness and happiness are fully described and put together.

1. Here is the most comprehensive character of the blessed; they are the pure in heart. Note, True religion consists in heart-purity. Those who are inwardly pure, show themselves to be under the power of pure and undefiled religion. True christliness lies in the heart, in the fountain of the soul; the washing of that from wickedness, Jer. 4. 14. We must lift up to God, not only clean hands, but a pure heart, Ps. 24. 4, 5. 1 Tim. 1. 5. The heart must be pure, in opposition to mixture—an honest heart that aims well; and pure, in opposition to pollution and defilement; as wine unmixed, as water unmuddied. The heart must be kept pure from fleshly lusts, all unchaste thoughts and desires; and every unclean word, rendered pure in the mouth by the washing of that from wickedness, Jer. 4. 14. We must lift up to God, not only clean hands, but a pure heart, Ps. 24. 4, 5. 1 Tim. 1. 5. The heart must be pure, in opposition to mixture—an honest heart that aims well; and pure, in opposition to pollution and defilement; as wine unmixed, as water unmuddied. The heart must be kept pure from fleshly lusts, all unchaste thoughts and desires; and every unclean word, rendered pure in the mouth by the washing of that from wickedness, Jer. 4. 14. We must lift up to God, not only clean hands, but a pure heart, Ps. 24. 4, 5. 1 Tim. 1. 5. him for ever, and never lose the sight of him; this is heaven's happiness. (2.) The happiness of seeing God is promised to those, and those only, who are pure in heart. None but the pure are capable of seeing God, nor would it be a felicity to the impure. What pleasure could an unsanctified soul take in the vision of a holy God? As he cannot endure to look upon their impurity, so they cannot endure to look upon his purity; they shall anathematize Jerusalem, and all that are pure in heart, all that are truly sanctified, have desires wrought in them, which nothing but the sight of God will satisfy; and divine grace will not leave those desires unsatisfied.

VII. The peace-makers are happy, v. 9. The wisdom that is from above, is first pure, and then peacable. The peace-makers are those who have, 1. A peaceable disposition: as, to make a lie, is to be given and addicted to lying, so, to make peace, is to have a strong and hearty affection to peace. I am for peace, Ps. 120. 7. It is to love, and desire, and delight in peace; to look on it as in our element, and to study to be peaceable. 2. A peaceable conduct: industriously, as far as we can, to preserve the peace, that it be not broken, and to recover it when it is broken; to hearken to proposals of peace ourselves, and to be ready to make them to others; where distance is among brethren and neighbours, to do all we can to accommodate it, and to be repairers of the breaches. The making of peace is sometimes a thankless office, and it is the lot of him who parts a fray, to have blows on both sides; yet it is a good office, and we must be forward to it. Some think that this is intended especially as a lesson for ministers, who should do all they can to reconcile those who are at variance, and to promote Christian love among those under their charge.

Now, (1.) Such persons are blessed; for they have the satisfaction of enjoying themselves, by keeping the peace, and of being truly serviceable to others, by disposing them to peace. They are working together with Christ, who came into the world to stay all enmities, and to proclaim peace on earth. (2.) They shall be called the children of God; it will be an evidence to themselves that they are so; God will own them as such, and herein they will resemble him. He is the God of peace; the Son of God is the Prince of peace; the Spirit of adoption is a Spirit of peace. Since God has declared himself reconcilable to us all, he will not own those for his children who are implacable in their enmity to one another; for if the peace-makers are blessed, we to the peace-breakers! Now by this it appears, that Christ never intended to have his religion propagated by fire and sword, or penal laws, or to acknowledge bigotry, or immutable zeal, as the mark of his disciples. The children of this world love to fish in troubled waters, but the children of God are the peace-makers, the quiet in the land.

VIII. Those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, are happy. This is the greatest paradox of all, and peculiar to Christianity; and therefore it is put last, and more largely insisted upon than any of the rest. Do you recollect, if your father's dream is, doubled, because hardly credited, and yet the thing is certain; and in the latter part there is a change of the person, "Blessed are ye—the my disciples, and immediate followers. This is that which you, who excel in virtue, are more immediately concerned in; for you must reckon upon hardships and troubles more than other men." Observe here, 1. The case of suffering saints described; and it is a hard case, and a very piteous one. (1.) They are persecuted, hunted, pursued, run down, as noxious beasts are, that are sought for to be destroyed; as if a Christian did caput gerere lunatum—bear a wolf's head, as an outlaw is said to do—any one that finds him may slay him; they are abandoned as the offscouring of all things; fined, imprisoned, banished, striped of their estates, excluded from all places of profit and trust, scourged, racked, tortured, always delivered to death, and accused and kept for the slaughter. This has been the effect of the emission of the serpents out of the garden against the holy seed, ever since the time of righteous Abel. It was so in Old Testament times, as we find, Heb. 11. 35. &c. Christ has told us that it would much more be so with the Christian church, and we are not to think it strange, 1 John 3. 13. He has left us an example. (2.) They are reviled, and have all manner of evil said against them falsely. Nick-names, and names of reproach, are fastened upon them, upon particular persons, and upon the generation of the righteous in the gress, to render them odious; sometimes to make them despriable, that they may be trampled upon; sometimes to make them formidable, they are powerfully assailed; things are laid to their charge that they knew not, Ps. 51. 10. Jer. 20. 18. Acts 17. 18. These reproaches have no power in their hands to do them any other mischief, could yet do this; and those who have had power to persecute, have found it necessary to do this too, to justify themselves in their barbarous usage of them; they could not have bated them, if they had not dressed them in bear-skins; nor have given them the worst of treatment, if they had not first represented them to be the worst of beings. They will wear you, and persecute you. Note, Reviling the saints is persecuting them, and will be found so shortly, when hard speeches must be accounted for, (Judg. 15.) and cruel mockings, Heb. 11. 36. They will say all manner of evil of you falsely; sometimes before the seat of judgment, as witnesses; sometimes in the seat of the scornful, with hypocritical mockers at feast; they are the song of the drunkards; sometimes to their faces, as Shimei cursed David; sometimes behind their backs, as the enemies of Jeremiah did. Note, There is no evil so black and horrid, which, at one time or other, has not been said, falsely, of Christ's disciples and followers.

(5.) All this is for righteousness' sake, (v. 10.) for my sake, v. 11. If for righteousness' sake, then is the reward of righteousness; for they are interested in the work of righteousness. Enemies to righteousness are enemies to Christ. This precludes these from this blessedness who suffer unjustly, and are evil spoken of truly for their real crimes; let such be ashamed and confounded, it is part of their punishment; it is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes the martyr. Those suffer for righteousness' sake, who suffer because they will not sin against their consciences, and who suffer for doing that which is good. Whatever pretence persecutors have, it is the power of godliness that they have an enmity to; it is really Christ and his righteousness that are maligned, hated, and persecuted; For thy sake I have borne reproach, Ps. 69. 9. Rem. 8. 36. 1. The comforts of suffering saints laid down. (1.) They are blessed; for the authority of their life-time, and the authority of Christ's kingdom (Luke 16. 25.) and receive them upon a good account. They are blessed, for it is an honour to them; (Acts 5. 41.) it is an opportunity of glorifying Christ, of doing good, and of experiencing special comforts and visits of grace, and tokens of his presence, 2 Cor. 1. 5. Dan. 3. 25. Rom. 8. 29. (2.) They shall be recompensed; Theirs is the kingdom of heaven. They have at present a sure title to it, and sweet foretastes of it; and shall ere long be in possession of it. Though there be nothing in those sufferings that can, in strictness, merit of God, (for the sins of the best deserve the worst,) yet this is here promised as a reward; v. 12.
Great is your reward in heaven: so great, as far to transcend the service. It is in heaven, future, and out of sight; but well secured, out of the reach of chance, fraud, and violence. Note, God will provide that those who lose for him, though it be life itself, shall not lose him in the end. Heaven, at last, will be an abundant recompense for all the difficulties we meet with in our way. This is that which hath come up the suffering saints in all ages—this joy we before them.

5. “So persecuted they the prophets that were before you, v. 12. They were before you in excellency, above what you are yet arrived at; they were before you in time, that they might be examples to you of suffering affliction and of patience, James 5. 10. They were in like manner persecuted and abused; and can you expect to go to heaven in a way by yourselves? Was not Isaiah mocked for his line upon line? Elias for his bald head? Were not all the prophets thus treated? Therefore marvel not at it as a strange thing, murmur not at it as a hard thing; it is a comfort to see the way of suffering a beaten road, and an honour to follow such leaders. That grace which was sufficient for them, to carry them through their sufferings, shall not be deficient to you. Those who are slain, shall be raised up, and those who are mocked, shall see them who of old mocked the messengers of the Lord,” 2 Chron. 36. 16. ch. 23. 35. Acts 7. 52.

4. Therefore rejoice and be exceeding glad, v. 12. It is not enough to be patient and content under these sufferings as under common afflictions, and not to render railing for railing; but we must rejoice, because the honour and dignity, the pleasure and advantage, of suffering for Christ, is more than all that can be hoped of it. Not that we must take a pride in our sufferings, (that spoils all,) but we must take a pleasure in them, as Paul; (2 Cor. 12. 10.) as knowing that Christ is herein before-hand with us, and that he will not be behind-hand with us, 1 Pet. 4. 12, 13.

13. Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be salted? It is henceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men. 14. Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. 15. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick: and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. 16. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.

Christ had lately called his disciples, and told them that they should be fishers of men; here he tells them farther what he designed them to be— the salt of the earth, and lights of the world, that they might be indeed what it was expected they should be.

1. Ye are the salt of the earth. This would encourage and support them under their sufferings, that, though they should be treated with contempt, yet they should really be blessings to the world, and the more so for their suffering thus. The prophets, who went before them, were the salt of the land of Canaan; but the apostles were the salt of the whole earth, for they must go into all the world to preach the gospel. It was a discouragement to them that they were so few and so weak. What could they do in so large a province as the whole earth? Nothing, if they were to work by force of arms and dint of sword; but, being to work silently as salt, one handful of that salt would diffuse its savour far and wide; would go a great way, and work insensibly and irresistibly as leaven, ch. 13. 33. The doctrine of the gospel is as salt; it is penetrating, quick, and powerful; (Heb. 4. 12.) it reaches the heart, Acts 2. 37. It is cleansing, purifying, removing, and destroying sin and corruption. We read of the savour of the knowledge of Christ; (2 Cor. 2. 14.) for all other learning is insipid without that. An everlasting covenant is called a covenant of salt; (Numb. 18. 19.) and the gospel is an everlasting gospel. Salt was required in all the sacrifices, (Lev. 2. 13.) in Ezekiel's mystical temple, Ezek. 43. 24. Now Christ's disciples, having themselves learned the doctrine of the gospel, and being employed to teach it to others were as salt. Note, Christians, and especially ministers, are the salt of the earth.

1. If they be such as they should be, they are as good salt, white, and small, and broken into many grains, but very useful and necessary. Pliny says, Sine sale vita humana non potest degere.—Without salt, human life cannot be sustained. See in this,

1. What they are to be in themselves; seasoned with the gospel, with salt, patience, and afflictions, and sufferings, as all manners, all seasons with grace, Col. 4. 6. Have salt in yourselves, else you cannot diffuse it among others, Mark 9. 50. (2.) What they are to be to others; they must not only be good, but do good; must insinuate themselves into the minds of people, not to serve any secular interest of their own, but that they may transform them into the taste and relish of the gospel. (3.) What great blessings they are to the world. Many, many blessings, in calling, converting, saving, and uniting men, were a vast heap, ready to putrefy; but Christ sent forth his disciples, by their lives and doctrines, to season it with knowledge and grace, and so to render it acceptable to God, to the angels, and to all that relish divine things.

4. How they must expect to be disposed of; not laid on a heap, they must not continue always together at Jerusalem, but must be scattered as salt upon the meat, here a grain and there another; as the salt was scattered in Israel, that, wherever they live, they may communicate their savour. Some have observed, that whereas it is foolishly called an ill omen to have the salt fall towards us, it is really an ill omen to have this salt fall from us.

2. If they be not, they are as salt that has lost its savour. If you, who should season others, are yourselves unsavoury, void of spiritual life, rebuke, and instruct; if a Christian be so, especially if a minister be so, his condition is very sad; for, (1.) He is irrecoverable; Wherewith shall it be salted? Salt is a remedy for unsavoury meat, but there is no remedy for unsavoury salt. Christianity will give a man a relish; but if a man can take up and continue the profession of it, and yet remain flat and foolish, and graceless and insipid, no other doctrine, no other means, can be applied, to make him savoury. If Christianity do not do it, nothing will. (2.) He is unprofitable; It is thenceforth good for nothing; what use can it be put to, in which it will not do more hurt than good? As a man without reason, so is a Christian without grace. A wicked man is the worst of creatures; a wicked Christian is the worst of men; and a wicked minister is the worst of Christians. (3.) He is doomed to ruin and rejection; He shall be cast out—expelled the church and the communion of the faithfu1, to which he is a blot and a burden; and he shall be trodden under foot of men. Let God be glorified in the shame and rejection of those by whom he has been reproached, and who have made themselves fit for nothing but to be trampled upon.

The light of the world, v. 14. This also bespeaks its usefulness, as the former, (Sole sae sale nihil utilius—Nothing more useful than the sun and salts,) but more glorious. All Christians are light in the Lord, (Eph. 5. 8.) and must shine as lights, (Phil. 2. 15.) but ministers in a special manner. Christ calls himself the Light of the world, (John 8. 12.) and they are workers together with him, and have some of his honour put upon them. Truly the light is sweet; it is welcome; the light of the first day of the world was so, when it shone out of darkness; so is the morning light of every day; so was the gospel, and those that spread it, to all sensible people. The world sat in darkness, Christ raised up his disciples to shine in it; and that, they may do so, from him they borrow and derive their light.

This similitude is here explained in two things: 1. As the lights of the world, they are illustrious and conspicuous, and have many eyes upon them. A city that is set on a hill, cannot be hid. The disciples of Christ, especially they who are forward and zealous in his service become remarkable, and are taken notice of as beacons. They are for signs, (Isa. 8. 18.) men wondered at; (Zech. 3. 8.) all their names were taken up. Some admire them, commend them, rejoice in them, and study to imitate them; others envy them, hate them, cen sure them, and study to blast them. They are concerned therefore to walk circumspectly, because of their observers; they are as spectacles to the world, and must take heed of everything that looks ill, because they are so much looked at. The disciples of Christ were obscure men before he called them, but the character he put upon them dignified them, and as preachers of the gospel they made a figure; and though they were reproached for it by some, they were respected for it by others, advanced to thrones, and made judges; (Luke 22. 50.) for Christ will honour those that honour him.

2. As the lights of the world, they are intended to illuminate and give light to others, (v. 15.) and therefore be set up as lights. They having lighted these candles, they shall not be put under a bushel, not confined always, as they are now, to the cities of Galilee, or the fast sheep of the house of Israel, but they shall be sent into all the world. The churches are the candlesticks, the golden candlesticks, in which these lights are placed, that their light may be diffused; and the gospel is so strong a light, and carries with it so much of its own evidence, that, like a city on a hill, it cannot be hid, it cannot but appear to be from God, to all those who do not wilfully shut their eyes against it. It will give light to all that are in the house, to all that will draw near to it, and come where it is. Those to whom it does not give light, must thank themselves; they will not be in the house with it; will not make a diligent and learned inquiry into it, but are strangers to it. (2.) The must shine as lights. [1.] By their good preaching. The knowledge they have, they must communicate for the good of others; not put it under a bushel, but spread it. The talent must not be buried in a napkin, but traded with. The disciples of Christ must not muffle themselves up in privacy and obscurity, under pretence of contemplation, modesty, or self-preservation, (which would be in effect to reject the minister the same, Luke 12. 3.) [2.] By their good living. They must be burning and shining lights; (John 5. 33.) must evidence, in their whole conversation, that they are indeed the followers of Christ, James 3. 13. They must be to others for instruction, direction, quickening, and comfort, Job 29. 11. See here, First, How our light must shine—by doing such good works as men may see, and may approve of; such works as are of good report among men that are without, and will therefore give them cause to think well of Christianity. We must do good works that may be seen to the edification of others, but not that they may be seen to our own ostentation; we are bid to pray in secret, and what lies between God and our souls, must be kept to ourselves; but that which is of itself open and obvious to the sight of men, we must study to make conspicuous, and in this manner we must shine (Thynnesworth, Phil. 2. 15.) 4. 8. Those about us must not only hear our good words, but see our good works; that they may be convinced that religion is more than a bare name, and that we do not only make a profession of it, but abide under the power of it.

Secondly, For what end our light must shine—That those who see your good works, may be brought, not to glorify you, (which was the thing the Pharisees aimed at, and it spoiled all their performances,) but to glorify your Father which is in heaven. Note, The glory of God is the great thing we must aim at in every thing we do in religion. 1 Pet. 4. 11. In this centre the lines of all our actions must meet. We must not only endeavour to glorify God ourselves, but we must do all we can to bring others to glorify him. There is a holy emulation to imitate your good works, and so may glorify God. Note, The holy, regular, and exemplary conversation of the saints, may do much toward the conversion of sinners; those who are unacquainted with religion, may hereby be brought to know what it is. [Examples teach.] And those who are prejudiced against it, may hereby be brought in love with it, and thus there is a winning virtue in a godly conversation.

17. Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. 18. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. 19. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. 20. For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.

Those to whom Christ preached, and for whom he gave these instructions to his disciples, were such as in their religion had an eye, 1. To the scriptures of the Old Testament as their rule, and therein Christ here shows them they were in the right: 2. To the Scribes and Pharisees as their example, and therein Christ here shows them they were in the wrong; for,

1. The rule which Christ came to establish, exactly agreed with the scriptures of the Old Testament, here called the law and the prophets. The prophets were commentators upon the law, and both together made up that rule of faith and practice which Christ found upon the throne in the Jewish church, and here he keeps it on the throne.

1. He protests against the thought of cancelling and weakening the Old Testament; Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets. (1.) “Let not the pious Jews, who have an affection for the law and the prophets, fear that I intend to destroy them.” Let them not be prejudiced against Christ and his doctrine, from a jealousy that this kingdom he came to set up, would derogate from the honour of the scriptures, which they had embraced as coming from God, and of which they had experienced the power and purity; no, let them be satisfied that Christ has no ill design upon the law and the prophets. (2.) “Let not the profane Jews, who have a disinfection of the law and the prophets, and are weary of that yoke, hope that I am come to destroy them.” Let not carnal libertines imagine that the Messiah is come to discharge them from the obligation of divine precepts, to secure to them divine promises to make them happy, and yet to give them leave to live as they list. Christ commands nothing new, which was forbidden either by the law of nature or the other law, and the only reason why those laws had enjoined; it is a great mistake to think he does, and he here takes care to rectify the mistake; I am not come to destroy. The Saviour of souls is the Destroyer of nothing but the works of the Devil, of nothing that comes from God, much less of those excellent dictates which we have from Moses and the prophets. No, he came to fulfill them. That is, [1.] To obey the commands of the law, for he was made under the law, Gal. 4. 4. He in all respects yielded obedience to the law, honoured his parents, sanctified the sabbath, prayed, gave alms, and did that which never any one else did, obeyed perfectly, and never broke the law in any thing. [2.] To make good the promises of the law, and the predictions of the prophets, which did all bear witness to him. The covenant of grace is, for substance, the same now that it was then, and Christ the Mediator of it. [3.] To answer the types of the law; thus, (as Bishop Tillotson expresses it,) he did not make void, but make good, the ceremonial law, and manifested himself to be the Substance of all these shadows. [4.] To fill up the defects of it, and so to complete and perfect it. Thus the word יְשֵׁבָתָא יְשֵׁבָתָא properly signifies. If we consider the law as a vessel that had some water in it before, but it was not full; the one thing needful is that the law is full, that it is so filled that the right hand is full, and the left hand overflows; or, as a picture that is first rough-drawn, displays some outlines only of the piece intended, which are afterward filled up; so Christ made an improvement of the law and the prophets by his additions and explications. [5.] To carry on the same design; the christian institutes are so far from thwarting and contradicting that which was the main design of the Jewish religion, that they promote and support it. [6.] “Let not I come to destroy the time of reformation, (Heb. 9. 10.) not the repeal of the law, but the amendment of it, and, consequently, its establishment.

2. He asserts the perpetuity of it; that not only he designed not the abrogation of it, but that it never should be abrogated; (v. 18.) “Verily I say unto you, I, the Amen, the faithful Witness, solemnly declares, that after all heaven and earth pass, then time shall be no more, and the unhonourable state of the law shall be no more, the age that compenses shall supersede all laws, one jot or one tittle, the least and most minute circumstance, shall be no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled;” for what is it that God is doing in all the operations, both of providence and grace, but fulfilling the scripture? Heaven and earth shall come together, and all the fulness thereof be wrapt up in ruin and confusion, rather than any word of God shall fall to the ground, or be in vain. The word of the Lord endures for ever, both that of the law, and that of the gospel. Observe, The care of God concerning his law extends itself even to those things that seem to be of least account in it, the iota and the tittle; for whatever belongs to God, and bears his stamp, is with so little, that perhaps to preserve it to his glory it shall be necessary to be conscious to themselves of so much imperfection, that they allow it for a maxim, Après jurin non sunt jurata—The extreme points of law, are not laws, but God will stand by and maintain every iota and title of his law.

3. He gives it in charge to his disciples, carefully to preserve the law, and shows them the danger of the neglect of it. He charges them not to abrogate the least of the commandments of the law of Moses, much more any of the greater as the Pharisees did, who neglected the weightier matters of the law, and shall teach men so as they did, who made void the commandment of God with their traditions, (ch. 15. 3.) he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven. Though the Pharisees be cried up for such teachers as should be, they shall not be such. The Jewish religion, but whoever shall do and teach them, as Christ's disciples would, and thereby prove themselves better friends to the Old Testament than the Pharisees were, they, though despised by men, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. Note, (1.) Among the commands of God there are some less than others; none absolutely little, but comparatively so. The Jews reckon the least of the commandments of the law to be that of the bird's nest; (Deut. 22. 6, 7.) yet even that had a significance and an intention very great and considerable. (2.) It is a dangerous thing, in doctrine or practice, to abrogate the least of God's commands; to break them, that is to go about either to contract the extent, or weaken the obligation of them; whoever does so, will find it is at his peril. Thus to vacate any of the ten commandments, is too bold a stroke for the jealous God to pass by. It is something more than transgressing the law, it is making void the law, Ps. 119. 126. (3.) That the further such corruptions as these spread, the worse they are. It is impudence enough to break the command, but it is a greater degree of it to teach men so. This plainly refers to those who at this time sat in Moses' seat, and by their comments corrupted and perverted the text. Opinions that tend to weaken the authority, and the value of the precepts, by corrupt glosses on the scripture, are bad when they are held, but worse when they are propagated and taught as the word of God. He that does so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven, in the kingdom of glory; he shall never come thither, but be eternally excluded; or, rather, in the kingdom of the gospel-church. He is so far from deserving the dignity of a teacher in it, that he shall be excluded from it. The prophet that teaches these lies, shall be the tail in that kingdom; (Isa. 9. 15.) when truth shall appear in its own evidence, such corrupt teachers, though cried up as the Pharisees, shall be of no account with the wise and good. Nothing makes ministers more contemptible and base than corrupting the law, Mal. 2. 8, 11. Those who extenuate and encourage sin, and discontinue and put contempt upon strictness in religion and exterior devotion, are the dregs of the church. But, on the other hand, [1.] Those are truly honourable, and of great account in the church of Christ, who lay out themselves by their life and doctrine to promote the purity and strictness of practical religion; who both do and teach that which is good; for those who do not as they teach, pull down with one hand what they build up with the other, and give themselves the lie, and tempt men to think that all religion is a delusion; but those who speak from experience, who live up to what they preach, are truly great; they honour God, and God will honour them, (1 Sam. 2. 10.) and hereafter they shall shine as the stars in the kingdom of our Father.

II. The righteousness which Christ came to establish by this rule, must exceed that of the Scribes and Pharisees. v. 20. This was strange doctrine to those who looked upon the Scribes and Pharisees as having arrived at the highest pitch of religion. The Scribes were the most noted teachers of the law, and the Pharisees the most celebrated professors of it, and they both sat in Moses' chair, (eh. 23. 2.) and had such a reputation among the people, that they were looked upon as super-conformable to the law, and people did not think themselves obliged to be as good as they; it was therefore a great surprise to them, to hear that they must be better than they, or they should not go to heaven; and therefore Christ here avers it with solemnity; I say unto you, It is so. The Scribes and Pharisees were enemies to Christ and his doctrine, and were great opposers of his grace; they must be taken from them, and something commended in them. They were much in fasting, and prayer, and giving of alms; they were punctual in observing the ceremonial appointments, and made it their business to teach others; they had such an interest in the people, that they thought, if but two men went to heaven, one would be a Pharisee; and yet our Lord Jesus here tells his disciples, that the religion he came to establish did not exclude the badness, but excel the goodness, of the Scribes and Pharisees. We must do more than they, and better than they, or we shall come short of heaven. They were parzial in the law, and laid most stress upon the ritual part of it; but we must be universal, and not think it enough to give the priest his tithe, but must give God our hearts. They minded only the outside, but we must establish conscience, inside goodness. They aimed at the praise and applause of men, but we must aim at acceptance with God: they were proud of what they did in religion, and trusted to it as a righteousness; but we, when we have done all, must deny ourselves, and say, We are unprofitable servants, and trust only to the righteousness of Christ; and thus we may go out of the Scribes and Pharisees.

21. Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill: and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment: 22. But I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire. 23. Therefore, if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee; 24. Leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. 25. Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. 26. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing.

Christ having laid down these principles, that Moses and the prophets were still to be their rulers, but that the Scribes and Pharisees were to be no longer their rulers, proceeds to expound the law in some particular instances, and to vindicate it from the corrupt glosses which these expositors had put upon it, as not anything new, only limits and restrains some permissions which had been abused; and as to the precepts, shows the breadth, strictness, and spiritual nature of them, adding such explanatory statutes as made them more clear, and tended much toward the perfecting of our obedience to them. In these verses, he explains the law of the sixth commandment, according to the true intent and full force of it.

I. Here is the command itself laid down; (v. 12.) We have heard it, and remember it; he speaks to them who knew the law, who had Moses read to them in their synagogues every sabbath-day; yea have heard that it was said by them, or rather as it is in the margin, to them of old time, to your fathers the Jews, Thou shalt not kill. Note, The laws of Moses were not novel, but were delivered to them of old time; they are ancient laws, but of that nature as never to be antiquated nor grew obsolete. The moral law agrees with the law of nature, and the eternal rules and reasons of good and evil, that is, the rectitude of the eternal Mind. Killing is here forbidden, killing ourselves, killing any other, directly or indirectly, or being any way accessory to it. The law of God, the God of life, is a hedge of protection about our lives. It was one of the precepts of Noah, Gen. 9. 5, 6.

II. The exposition of this command which the Jewish teachers contented themselves with; their comment upon it was, Whosoever shall kill, shall be in danger of the judgment. This was all they had to say upon it, that wilful murderers were liable to the sword of justice, and casual ones to the judgment of the city of refuge. The courts of judgment sat in the gate of their principal cities; the judges, ordinarily, were in number twenty-three; these tried, condemned, and executed murderers; so that whoever killed, was in danger of their judgment. Now this gloss of theirs upon this commandment was faulty, for it intimated, 1. That the law of the sixth commandment was only external, and forbade no more than the act of murder, and had no restraint upon the inward lusts, from which wars and fightings come. This was indeed the seditious, false, the fundamental error of the Jewish teachers, that the divine law prohibited only the sinful act, not the sinful thought; they were disposed here to write—to rest in the letter of the law, and they never inquired into the spiritual meaning of it. Paul, while a Pharis... son, though ever so much our inferior, as a child, a servant, for we are all made of one blood. Anger is a natural passion; there are cases in which it is lawful and laudable; but it is then sinfull, when we are angry without cause. The word includes all mischiefs, sin causa, sine effectu, et sine modo—without cause, without any good effect, without moderation; so that the anger is then sinful. (1) When it is without any just provocation given; either for no cause, or no good cause, or no great and proportionable cause; when we are angry at children or servants for that which could not be helped, which was not our fault, forgetting that ourselves might have been guilty of, and for which we should not have been angry at ourselves; when we are angry upon groundless surmises, or for trivial affronts not worth speaking of. (2) When it is without any good end aimed at, merely to show our authority, to gratify a brutish passion, to let people know our resentments, and excite ourselves to revenge, then it is in vain, it is to do hurt; whereas if we are at any time angry, it should be to awaken the offender to repentance, and prevent his doing so again; to clear ourselves, (2 Cor. 7. 11) and to give warning to others. (3) When it exceeds due bounds; when we are hard and headstrong in our anger, violent and vehement, outrageous and mischievous, and when we seek the hurt of those we are displeased at. This is a breach of the sixth commandment; 'Thou shalt not kill,' when this anger, would kill if he could and would; he who has anger in him he is doomed with it: Cain's killing his brother began in anger; he is a murderer in the account of God, who knows his heart, whence murders proceed, ch. 15. 19.

2. He tells them, that giving opprobrious language to our brother is tongue-murder, calling him,

2. Race, and Thou fool. When this is done with mildness and for a good end, to convince others of their Heavens, then, as the Heavens says, O vain man, and Paul, Thou fool; and Christ himself, O fools, and slow of heart. But when it proceeds from anger and malice within, it is the smoke of that fire which is kindled from hell, and falls under the same character. (1) Race is a scornful word, and comes from pride, "Thou empty fellow;" it is the language of that which Solomon calls proud wrath, (Prov. 21. 24.) which tramples upon the name of God, which is a name that is upon the dogs of our flock. This people which knows not the law, is cursed, is such language, John 7. 49. (2) Thou fool is a pitiful word, and comes from hatred; looking upon him, not only as mean and not to be honoured, but as vile and not to be loved; "Thou wicked man, thou reprobrate." The former speaks a man without sense, this (in scripture-language) speaks a man without grace; the more the reproach touches his spiritual condition, the more it is a reproach, the more the reproach is a reproach—thou art a haughty taunting of our brother, this is a malignant cursing and condemning of him, as abandoned of God. Now this is a breach of the sixth commandment; malicious slanders and censures are poison under the tongue, that kills secretly and slowly; bitter words are as arrows that wound suddenly, (Ps. 64. 3.) or as a sword in the bones.

The good name of our neighbour, which is better than life, is thereby stabbed and murdered; and it is an evidence of such an ill-will to our neighbour as would strike at his life, if it were in our power.

3. He tells them, that how light soever they made of these sins, they will certainly be reckoned for; he that is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment and anger of God; he that calls him Race, shall be in danger of the council, of being punished in the Scripture, which is directing an Israelite; but whatsoever saith, Thou fool, thou profane person, thou child of hell, shall be in danger of hell-fire, to which he condemns his brother; so the learned

Dr. Whitby. Some think, in allusion to the penal tics used in the several courts of judgment among the Jews, Christ shows that the sin of rash anger exposes men to lower or higher punishments, according to the degrees of its transgressions. They had three capital punishments, each worse than the other; beheading, which was inflicted by the judgment; stoning, by the council or chief Sanhedrim; and burning in the valley of the son of Hinnom, which was used only in extraordinary cases: it signifies, therefore, that rash anger and reproachful language are damming sins; but some are more sinning than others, and the greatest and last degree of it is to have a hatred and a desire to be in hell-fire, to which he condemns his brother; so the learned it may not be our fault; and then come, come and welcome, come and offer thy gifts, and it shall be accepted; therefore we must not let the sun go down upon our wrath any day, because we must go to prayer before we go to sleep; much less let the sun rise upon our wrath on a sabbath-day, because it is a day of prayer.

2. Because, till this be done, we lie exposed to much danger, v. 25. 26. It is at our peril if we do not labour after an agreement, and that quickly, upon two accounts.

(1.) Upon a temporal account. If the offence we have done to our brother, in his body, goods, or reputation, be such as will bear an action, in which he may recover considerable damages, it is our wisdom, and it is duty to our family, to prevent that by a humble submission and a just and peaceable satisfaction; lest otherwise he recover it by law, and put us to a charge, and which is not only a cause of better to compound and make the best terms we can, than to stand it out; for it is in vain to contend with the law, and there is danger of our being crushed by it. Many ruin their estates by an obstinate persisting in the offences they have given, which would soon have been pacified by a little yielding at first.

Solomon's advice in case of necessary action, or the hue and cry, which is to secure and deliver thyself, Prov. 6. 1—3. It is good to agree, for the law is costly. Though we must be merciful to those we have advantage against, yet we must be just to those that have advantage against us, as far as we are able. "Agree, and compound with thine adversary quickly, lest he be exasperated by thy stubbornness, and provoke to insist upon the utmost demand, and will not make thee the abatement which at first he would have made." A prison is an uncomfortable place to those who are brought to it by their own pride and prodigality, their own wilfulness and folly.

(2.) Upon a spiritual account. "Go, and be reconciled to thy brother, be just to him, be friendly with him, because while the quarrel continues, as thou art unfit to bring thy gift to the altar, unfit to come to the table of the Lord, so thou art unfit to die: if thou persist in this sin, there is danger lest thou be suddenly snatched away by the wrath of God, whose judgment thou canst not escape nor except against; and if that iniquity be laid to thy charge, thou art undone for ever." Hell is the prison for all that live and die in malice and uncharitableness, for all that are contentious, (Rom. 2. 8.) and out of prison, there is no rescue, no redemption, no escape, to eternity.

This is very applicable to the great business of our reconciliation to God through Christ; Agree with him quickly, whilst thou art in the way. Note, [1.] The great God is an adversary to all sinners, without regard to a man's interest, without regard to a man's person, without regard to a man's case. He has a controversy with him, that we may be at peace, Job 22. 21. 2 Cor. 5. 20. [2.] It is our common interest to reconcile and compound with him, that he may be at peace, Job 22. 21. 2 Cor. 5. 20. [3.] It is our wisdom to do this quickly, whilst we are in the way. While we are alive, we are in the way; after death, it will be too late to do it; therefore give not sleep to thine eyes until it be done. [4.] They who continue in a state of enmity to God, are continually exposed to the arrests of his judicial justice, to the inclemencies of his wrath. This wise man, Christ is the Judge, to whom impetuous sinners will be delivered; for all judgment is committed to the Son; he that was rejected as a Saviour, cannot be escaped as a Judge, Rev. 6. 16. 17. It is a fearful thing to be thus turned over to the Lord Jesus, when the Lamb shall become a Lion. Angels are the officers to whom Christ will deliver them: (ch. 13. 41, 42.) Devils are so too, having the power of death as executioners to all unbelievers, Heb. 2. 14. Hell is the prison into which those will be cast that continue in a state of enmity to God, 2 Pet. 2. 4. [3.] Damned sinners must remain in it to eternity; they shall not depart till they have paid the uttermost farthing, and that will not be to the utmost ages of eternity: Divine justice will be for ever satisfying, but never satisfied.

27. Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery. 28. But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart. 29. And if thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. 30. And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. 31. It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorce: 32. But I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery.

We have here an exposition of the seventh commandment, given us by the same hand that made the law, and therefore was fittest to be the interpreter of it: it is the law against uncleanness, which hitherto follows upon the former; that laid a restraint upon sinful passions, this upon sinful appetites, both of which ought always to be under the government of reason and conscience, and if indulged are equally pernicious.

I. The command is here laid down, (v. 17.) Thou shalt not commit adultery; which includes a prohibition of all other acts of uncleanness, and the desire of them; but the Pharisees, in their expositions of this command, made it to extend no further than the act of adultery, suggesting, that if the iniquity was not recorded in the heart, and went no further, God could not hear it, would not regard it, (Ps. 66. 18.) and therefore they thought it enough to be able to say that they were no adulterers, Luke 18. 11.

11. It is here explained in the strictness of it, in three things, which would seem new and strange to those who had been always governed by the tradition of the elders, and took all for oracular that they taught.

1. We are here taught, that there is such a thing as heart-adultery, adulterous thoughts and dispositions, which never proceed to the act of fornication or fornication; and perhaps the defilement which these give to the soul, that is here so clearly asserted, was not only included in the seventh commandment, but was signified and implied in many of those ceremonial laws, under the law, for which they were to wash their clothes, and bathe their flesh in water. Whosoever looketh on a woman, (not only another man's wife, as some would have it, but any woman,) to lust after her, has committed adultery with her in his heart, v. 28. This command forbids not only the acts of fornication or adultery, but, (1.) All appetites to them, all lusting after the forbidden object; this is the beginning of the sin, lust conceiving: (Jam. 1. 15.) it is a bad step toward the sin; and where the lust is dwelt upon and approved, and the wanton desire is rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, it is the commission of the sin, as far as the heart can do it; there wants nothing but a convenient opportunity for the sin itself. *Atticera mens under the eye, or wanton glance, or wanton dally-ance baffled or biased; biased, if it say nothing against the sin; baffled, if it prevail not in what it says. (2.) All approaches toward them; feeding the eye with the sight of the forbidden fruit; not only looking for that end, that I may lust; but looking till I do lust, or looking to gratify the lust, where further satisfaction cannot be obtained. The eye is both the inlet and outlet of a vast deal of wicked thoughts of this kind, witness Joseph's mistress, (Gen.
29. 7.) Samson, (Judg. 16. 1.) David, 2 Sam. 11.
2. We read of eyes full of adultery, that cannot cease from sin, 2 Pet. 2. 14. What need have we, therefore, with holy Job, to make a covenant with our eyes, to make this bargain with them, that they should have the pleasure of beholding the light of the sun and the works of God, provided they would never fasten or dwell upon anything that might occasion impure imaginations or desires; and under this penalty, that if they did, they must smart for it in penitential tears! Job 31. 1. What have we the covering of the eyes for, but to restrain corrupt glances, and to keep out their defiling impressions?
This forbids also the using of any of our senses to stir up lust. If insuring looks are forbidden fruit, much less are uncles, and wanton dalliances, and the fuel and bollows of this hellish fire. These precepts are hedges about the law of heart-purity,
v. 8. And if looking be lust, who dress and deck, and expose themselves, with design to be looked at and lusted after, (like Jezebel, that pointed her face and tried her head, and looked out of the window,) are no less guilty. Men sin, but devils tempt to sin.
3. Which looks and such dalliances are so very dangerous and destructive to the soul, that it is better to lose the eye and the hand that thus offend, than to give way to the sin, and perish eternally in it.
This lesson is here taught us, v. 29, 30. Corrupt t Nature would soon object against the prohibition of heart-adultery, that it is impossible to be governed by it; It is a hard saying, who can bear it? Flesh and blood cannot but look with pleasure upon a beautiful face, and be tempted to lust after and dallying with such an object. Such pretences as these will scarcely be overcome by reason, and therefore must be argued against with the terrors of the Lord, and so they are here argued against.
(1.) It is a severe operation that is here prescribed for the preventing of these fleshly lusts. *If thy right eye offend thee, or cause thee to offend, by wanton didnce or dalliance, upon forbidden objects; if thy right hand offend thee, or cause thee to offend, by wanton dalliances; and if it were indeed imposable, as is pretended, to govern the eye and the hand, and they have been so accustomed to these wicked practices, that they will not be withheld from them; if there were no other way to restrain them, (which, blessed be God, through his grace, there is,) they were better for us to pluck out the eye, and cut off the right hand, than to think of the right eye, and right hand, the more honourable and useful, to turn them both in sin to the ruin of the soul. And if this must be submitted to, at the thought of which nature startles, much more must we resolve to keep under the body, and to bring it into subjection; to live a life of mortification and self-denial; to keep a constant watch over our own hearts, and to suppress the first rising of lust and corruption there; to avoid the occasions of sin, to resist the beginnings of it, and to decline
the company of those who will be a snare to us, their sin, and will be accountable for it. This is one way of being hurtaker with adulterers, Ps. 50. 18.
33. Again, ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths: 34. But, I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: 35. Nor by the earth, for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King. 36. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black: 37. But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these, cometh of evil.

We have here an exposition of the third commandment, which we are the more concerned rightly to understand, because it is particularly said, that God will not hold him guiltless, however he may hold himself, who breaks this commandment, by taking the name of the Lord God in vain. Now as to this command,

1. It is agreed on all hands that it forbids perjury, forswearing, and the violation of oaths and vows, v. 33. This was said to them of old time, and is the true intent and meaning of the third commandment.

2. Thou shalt not use, or take up, the name of God (as we do by an oath) in vain, or unto vanity, or for a lie. He hath not lift up his soul unto vanity, is expanded in the next words, nor swear deceitfully, Ps. 24. 4.

3. Perjury is a sin condemned by the light of nature, as a complication of impurity toward God and injustice toward man, and as rendering a man highly obnoxious to the divine wrath, which was always judged to follow so infallibly upon that sin, that the forms of swearing were commonly turned into executions or imprecations; as that, God do so to me, and more also; and with us, So help me, God; wishing I may never have any help from God, if I swear falsely. Thus, by the consent of nations, have men cursed themselves, not doubting but that God would curse them, if they lied against the truth then, when they solemnly called God to witness to it. It is added, from some other scriptures, but shall perform unto the Lord thine oaths; (Numb. 30. 2.) which may be meant, either, I. Of those promises to which God is a party, vows made to God; these must be punctually paid: (Excl. 5. 4, 5.) or, 2. Of those promises made to our brethren, to which God was a Witness, he being appealed to concerning our sincerity; these must be performed to the Lord, with an eye to him, and for his sake; for to him, by ratifying the promise with an oath, we have made ourselves debtors; and if we break a promise so ratified, we have not lied unto men only, but unto God.

4. It is added, from some other scriptures, but shall perform unto the Lord thine oaths; (Numb. 30. 2.) which may be meant, either, I. Of those promises to which God is a party, vows made to God; these must be punctually paid: (Excl. 5. 4, 5.) or, 2. Of those promises made to our brethren, to which God was a Witness, he being appealed to concerning our sincerity; these must be performed to the Lord, with an eye to him, and for his sake; for to him, by ratifying the promise with an oath, we have made ourselves debtors; and if we break a promise so ratified, we have not lied unto men only, but unto God.

II. It is here added, that the commandment does not only forbid false swearing, but all rash, unnecessary swearing: Swear not at all, v. 34. Compare Jam. 5. 12. Not that all swearing is sinful, so far from it, when rightly done, it is a part of religious worship, and we do it, to give unto the word that is used out of his name. See Deut. 6. 13,—10. 20. Is. 45. 23. Jer. 4. 2. We find Paul confirming what he said by such solemnities, (2 Cor. 1. 23.) when there was a necessity for it. In swearing, we own the truth of something known, to confirm the truth of something doubtful or unknown; we appeal to a greater knowledge; we bind and constraint the reverence of a righteous Judge, if we swear deceitfully.

Now the mind of Christ in this matter is,

1. That we must not swear at all, but when we are duly called to it, and justice or charity to our brother, or respect to the commonwealth, make it necessary for the end of strife, (Heb. 6. 16.) of which necessity the civil magistrate is ordinarily to be the judge. We may be sworn, but we must not swear, we may be adjured, and so obliged to it, but we must not thrust ourselves upon it for our own worldly advantage.

2. That we must not swear lightly and irreverently in common discourse: it is a very great sin to make a ludicrous appeal to the glorious Majesty of heaven, which, being a sacred thing, ought always to be very serious; it is a gross profanation of God's holy name, and of one of the holy things which the children of Israel sanctify to the Lord: it is a sin that has no cloak, no excuse for it, and therefore should be so far weighed, and the means so many ways broken, by the surprise as well as strength of a temptation, that it is not to be used but upon great necessity: the frequent requiring and using of oaths, is a reflection upon Christians, who should be of such acknowledged fidelity, as that their sober words should be as sacred as their solemn oaths.

3. That we must not swear by any promissory oaths, of which Christ more particularly speaks here, for they are oaths that are to be performed. The influence of an affirmative oath immediately ceases, when we have faithfully discovered the truth, and the whole truth; but a promissory oath is to be performed, and therefore cannot be so far weighed, neither so much broken, by the surprise as well as strength of a temptation, that it is not to be used but upon great necessity: the frequent requiring and using of oaths, is a reflection upon Christians, who should be of such acknowledged fidelity, as that their sober words should be as sacred as their solemn oaths.

4. That we must not swear by any creature. It should seem there were some, who, in civility (as they thought) to the name of God, would not make use of that in swearing, but would swear by heaven or earth, &c. This Christ forbids here, (v. 34.) and shows that there is nothing we can swear by, but it is some way or other related to God, who is the Fountain of all beings, and therefore it is as dangerous to swear by them, as it is to swear by God himself: it is the verity of the creature that is laid at stake; now that cannot be an instrument of testimony, but as it has regard to God, who is the summum verum—the chief Truth. As, for instance,

(1.) Swear not by the heaven: "As sure as there is a heaven, this is true;" for it is God's throne, where he resides, and in a particular manner manifests his glory, as a Prince upon his throne: this being the inseparable dignity of the upper world, you cannot swear by heaven, but you swear by God himself.

(2.) Nor by the earth, for it is his footstool. He governs the motions of this lower world; as he rules in heaven, so he rules over the earth; and though under his feet, yet it is also under his eye and care, and stands in relation to him as his, Ps. 24. 1. The earth is the Lord's; so that in swearing by it, you swear by his Owner.

(3.) Neither by Jerusalem, a place for which the Jews had such a veneration, that they could not speak of any thing more sacred, to swear by; but beside the common reference Jerusalem has to God, as part of the earth, it is in special relation to him, for it is the city of the great King, (Ps. 48. 2.) the city of God, (Ps. 46. 4.) he is therefore interested in it, and even the oath taken by it.

(4.) "Neither shalt thou swear by thy head; though it be near thee, and an essential part of thee, yet it is more God's than thine; for he made it, and formed all the springs and powers of it; whereas thou thyself canst not, from any natural, intrinsic influence, change the colour of one hair, so as to make it white or black; so that thou canst not swear by thy head, but thou shalt swear by him who is the Life of the Lifer of life, Ps. 8. 3. 5. That therefore in all our communication we must content ourselves with, Yea, yea, and, Nay, nay, v. 37. In ordinary discourse, if we affirm a thing, let us only say, Yea, it is so; and, if need be, to evidence our assurance of a thing, we may double it, and say, Yea, yea, indeed it is so: Verily, verily, was our Saviour's yea, yea. So if we deny a thing, let it suffice to say, No; or, if it be requisite, to repeat the denial, and say, No, No; and it may be known, that it will suffice to gain us credit; and if it is quite probable, to back what we say with swearing and cursing, is to render it more suspicious. They who can swallow a profane oath, will not strained at a lie. It is a pity, that this, which Christ puts in the mouths of all his disciples, should be fastened, as a name of reproach, upon a sect faulty enough other ways, when (as Dr. Hammond says) we are not only forbidden any more than you say, but are in manner directed to the use of that.

The reason is observable; For whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil, though it do not amount to the iniquity of an oath. It comes in vs. 14.25; so an ancient copy has it: It comes from the Devil, the evil one; it comes from the corruption of men's nature, from passion and vehement; from a reigning vanity in the mind, and a contempt of sacred things; it comes from the corruption of men, may be just; therefore may men use these protestations, because they are distrustful one of another, and think they cannot be believed without them. Note, Christians should, for the credit of their religion, avoid not only that which is in itself evil, but that which cometh of evil, and has the appearance of it. That may be suspected as a bad thing, which comes from a bad cause. An oath is physic, which supposes a disease.

33. Ye have heard that it hath been said. An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: 39. But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. 40. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. 41. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. 42. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.

In these verses the law of retaliation is expounded, and in a manner repealed. Observe, 1. What the Old Testament permission was, in case of injury; and here the expression is only, Ye have heard that it has been said; not, as before, concerning the commands of the decalogue, that it has been said by, or to, them of old time. It was not a command, that every one should of necessity require such satisfaction; but they might lawfully insist upon it, if they pleased; an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. This we find, Exod. 21. 24. Lev. 24. 20. Deut. 19. 21. in all which places it is appointed to be done by the magistrate, who bears not the sword in vain, but is the minister of God, an avenger to execute wrath, Rom. 13. 4. It was a direction to the judges of the Jewish nation, what punishment was fit in case of maims, for terror to such as would do mischief on the one hand, and for a restraint to such as have mischief done to them on the other hand, that they may not insist on a greater punishment than is proper: it is not a life for an eye, nor a limb for a tooth, but observe a proportion; and it is intimated, (Num. 35. 31.) that the forfeiture in this case might be redeemed with money; for when it is provided that no ransom shall be taken for the life of a murderer, it is supposed that for maims a pecuniary satisfaction was allowed.

But some of the Jewish teachers, who were not the most compassionate men in the world, insisted upon it as necessary, that such revenge should be taken, even by private persons, in case that there was no plea left for remission, or the acceptance of satisfaction. Even now, when they were under the government of the Roman magistrates, and consequently the judicial law fell to the ground of course, yet they were still zealous for any thing that looked harsh and severe.

Now, so far this is in force with us, as a direction to magistrates, to use the sword of justice according to the good and wholesome laws of the land, for the terror of evil-doers, and the vindication of the oppressed. That judge neither feared God, nor regarded man, who would not avenge the poor widow of her adversary, Luke 18. 2. 3. And it is in force as a rule to lawgivers, to provide accordingly, and wisely to apportion punishments to crimes, for the restraint of rapine and violence, and the protection of innocency.

II. What the New Testament precept is. As to the complainant himself, his duty is, to forgive the injury as done to himself, and no further to insist upon the punishment of it than is necessary to the public good: and this precept is consistent to the meekness of Christ, and the gentleness of his yoke.

Two things Christ teaches us here.

1. We must not be revengeful. (39.) I say unto you, that ye resist not evil; the evil person that is resistous to you. The resisting of any ill attempt upon us, is here as generally and expressly forbidden, as the resisting of the higher powers is; (Rom. 13. 2.) and yet this does not repeal the law of self-preservation, and the care we are to take of our families: we may avoid evil, and may resist it, so far as is necessary to our own security; but we must not render evil for evil, must not bear a grudge, nor avow our revenges against those that have treated us unkindly, but we must go beyond them by forgiving them, Prov. 20. 22.—24. 29.—25. 21, 22. Rom. 12. 17. The law of retaliation must be made consistent with the law of love, or, if any have injured us, is our recompense in our own hands, but in the hands of God, to whose wrath we must give place; and sometimes in the hands of his viceregents, where it is necessary for the public peace: but it will not justify us in hurting our brother, to say that he began, for it is the second blow that makes the quarrel, and when we were injured, we had an opportunity not to justify our injuring him, but to show ourselves the true disciples of Christ, by forgiving him.

Three things our Saviour instances, to show that Christians must patiently yield to those who bear hard upon them, rather than contend; and these include the others.

(1.) A blow on the cheek, which is an injury to me in my body; "Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, which is not only a hurt, but an affront and indignity, (2 Cor. 11. 20.) if a man in anger or scorn thus abuse thee, turn to him the other cheek;" that is, instead of avenging that injury, prepare for another, and bear it patiently: give not the rude man as good as he brings; do not challenge him, nor enter an action against him; if it be necessary to the public peace that he be bound to his good behaviour, leave that to the magistrate; but for thy own part, it will ordinarily be the wisest course to pass it by, and take no further notice of it: there are no bones broken, no great harm done, forgive it, and forget it; and if proud fools think the worse of thee, and laugh at thee for it, all wise men will value and honour thee for it, as a fellow of the blessed Jesus, who, though he was the Judge of Israel, did not smite those who smote him on the cheek, Micah 5. 1. Though this may perhaps, with some base spirits, expose us to the like affront another time, and so it is, in effect, to turn the other cheek, yet let not that disturb us, but let us trust God and his providence to protect us in the way of our duty. Perhaps, the forgiving of one injury may prevent an avenging of it but would draw on another; some will be overcome by submission, who by resistance would but be the more exasperated, Prov. 23. 22. However, our recompense in Christ's hands, who will reward us with eternal glory for the shame we thus patiently endure; and though it be not directly inflicted, if it be quietly born for conscience sake, and in the exercise of Christ's example, it shall be put upon the score of suffering for Christ.

(2.) The loss of a coat, which is a wrong to me in my estate; (v. 40.) If any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, it is a hard case. Note, It is common for legal processes to be made use of for the doing of the greatest injuries. Though judges be just and circumspect, yet it is possible for bad men, who make no conscience of oaths and forgeries, by course of law to force off the coat from a man's back. Marvel not at the matter, (Eccl. 5. 8.) but, in such a case, rather than go to law by way of revenge, rather than exhibit a cross bill, or stand out to the utmost, in defence of that which is thy doubtless right, let him even take thy cloak also. If the matter be small, which we may lose without any concern to our fences; if it be not, it is good to submit to it for peace sake. "It will not cost me so much to buy another cloak, as it will cost thee by course of law to recover that; and therefore unless thou canst get it again by fair means, it is better to let him take it." (3.) The going a mile by constraint, which is a wrong to me in my liberty; (v. 41.) "Whosoever shall lead thee a mile to run an errand for him, or to wait upon him, and go not, but with him two miles rather than fall out with him: say not, "I would do it, if I were not compelled to it, but I hate to be forced;" rather say, "Therefore I will do it, for otherwise there will be a quarrel;" and it is better to serve him, than to serve thy own lusts of pride and revenge. Some give this sense of it. The Jews taught that the disciples of the wise and the students of the law, to be pressed, as others might, by the king's officers, to travel upon the public service; but Christ will not have his disciples to insist upon this privilege, but to comply rather than offend the public service. The sum of all is, that christians must not be litigious; small injuries must be submitted to, and no notice taken of them; and if the injury be such as requires us to seek reparation, it must be for a good end, and without thought of revenge: though we must not invite injuries, yet we must meet them cheerfully in the way of duty, and make the best of them. If any say, Flesh and blood cannot pass by such an affront, let them remember, that flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

2. We must be charitable and beneficent; (v. 42.) "When thou art asked to give not only to thy neighbours, but labour to do them all the good we can, not We must be ready to give; Give to him that asketh thee. If thou hast an ability, look upon the request of the poor, as giving thee an opportunity for the duty of almsgiving." When a real object of charity presents itself, we should give at the first word: Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; yet the affairs of our charity must be charitable and done with discretion, (Ps. 112. 5.) lest we give the tithe of the ground to him that is worthy, which should be given to those that are necessitous, and deserve well. What God says to us, we should be ready to say to our poor brethren, Ask, and it shall be given you. (2.) We must be ready to lend. It is sometimes as great a piece of charity as giving; as it not only relieves the present exigence, but obliges the borrower to providence, industry, and honesty; and therefore; "From him that would borrow of thee something to live on, or something to trade on, turn not thou away: shun not those that thou knowest have such a request to make to thee, nor contrive excuses to shoo them off. The way to access to him, that would borrow, though he be base, and have not confidence to make known his case and beg the favour, yet thou knowest both his need and his desire, and therefore offer him the kindness." Excorab autemque rogor; honeste precebus occurrac.--I will prevail on before I am entreated; I will anticipate the becoming petition. Seneca, De Vita beat. It becomes us to be thus ready, whether for acts of kindness, for before we call, God hears us, and -prevents us with the blessings of his goodness.

43. Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy: 44. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you. 45. That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. 46. For if ye love those whom love, what reward have ye? Do not even the publicans the same? 47. And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? Do not even the publicans so? 48. Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.

We have here, lastly, an exposition of that great fundamental law of the second table, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, which was the fulfilling of the law. I. See here how this law was corrupted by the comments of the Jewish teachers, v. 43. God said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and they understood those only of their own country, nation, and religion; and those only that they were pleased to look upon as their friends: yet this was not the worst; from this command, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, they were willing to infer what God never designed, Thou shalt hate thine enemy; and they looked upon whom they pleased as their enemies, thus making void the great command of God, and the contrary, Exod. 23. 4, 5. Deut. 27. Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite nor an Egyptian, though these nations had been as much enemies to Israel as any whatsoever. It was true, God appointed them to destroy the seven devoted nations of Canaan, and not to make leagues with them; but there was a particular reason for it—to make room for Israel, and exalt their nation at their enemies' expense. But it was very ill-natured from hence to infer, that they must hate all their enemies; yet the moral philosophy of the heathen allowed this. It is Cicero's rule, Neminem nocere nisi prius lascivum injuria. To injury no one, unless previously injured. De Offic. See how willing corrupt passions are to fetch countenance from the word of God, and to take occasion by the commandment to justify themselves.

II. See how it is cleared by the command of the Lord Jesus, who teaches us another lesson: "But I say unto you, I, who come to be the great Peace-maker, the general Reconciler, who loved you when you were strangers and enemies, I say, Love your enemies," v. 44. Though men are ever so bad themselves, and carry it ever so basely towards us; yet that does not discharge us from the great debt we owe them, of love to our kind, love to our kin. We cannot but find ourselves very prone to wish the hurt, or at least very coldly to desire the good, of those whom we stand in the relation to, if only that which is at the bottom hereof, is a root of bitterness which must be plucked up, and a remnant of corrupt nature which grace must conquer. Note, It is the great duty of Christians to love their enemies; we cannot have complacency in one that is openly winked and profane, nor put a confidence in one that we know to be deceitful; nor are we to love all alike; but we may regard to the last to this end, and so far honour all men; we must take notice, with pleasure, of that even in our enemies which is amiable and commendable; ingenuity, good temper, learning, moral virtue, kindness to others, profession of religion, &c. and love that, though they are our enemies. We must have a compassion for them, and a good will toward them. We are here told, 1. That we must speak well of them: Bless them that curse you. When we speak to them, we must answer their revilings with courteous and friendly words, and not render railing for railing; behind their backs we must commend that in them which is commendable, and when we have said all the good we can of them, not be forward to say anything more. See 1 Pet. 3. 9. They, in whose tongues is the law of kindness, can give good words to those who use none. 2. That we must do well to them. "Do good to them that hate you, and that will be a better proof of love than good words. Be ready to do them all the real kindness that you can, and glad of an opportunity to do it, in their bodies, estates, names, families, and especially to do good to their souls." It was said of Archbishop Cranmer, that the way to make him a friend was to do him an ill turn; so many did hurt themselves who had disdained him. 3. We must pray for them; pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you. Note, (1.) It is no new thing for the most excellent saints to be hated, and cursed, and persecuted, and despitefully used, by wicked people; Christ himself was so treated. (2.) That when at any time we meet with such usage, we have an opportunity of showing our conformity both to the precept and to the example of Christ. It is our own advantage, and that of others, to consider what with whom we have disgraced him. (3.) We cannot otherwise testify our love to them, yet this way we may without ostentation, and it is such a way as surely we durst not dissemble in. We must pray that God will forgive them, that they may never dare the worse for anything they have done against us, and that he would make them to be at peace with us; and this is one way of making them so. Platarch, in his Laconic Apothegms, has this saying, who, being asked what a good king should do, replied, Τὰ μὲν χαίρεται εὐλογεῖται, τὰ δὲ ἐχομεν εἰς κακὸν—Good turns to his friends, and evil to his enemies; he said, How much better is it τὰ μὲν χαίρεται εὐλογεῖται—do good to our friends, and make friends of our enemies. This is heaping coals of fire on their head. These words are here given to enforce this command (which sounds so harsh) of loving our enemies. We must do it. 1. That we may be like God our Father; "that ye may be, may approve yourselves to be, the children of your Father which is in heaven." Can we write after a better copy? It is a copy in which love to the worst of enemies is reconciled to, and consistent with, infinite purity and holiness. God maketh his sun to rise, and sendeth rain, on the just and unjust, p. 43. Note, First, Sunshine and rain are great blessings to the world, and they come from God. It is his sun that shines, and the rain is sent by him. They do not come of course, or by chance, but from God. Secondly, Common mercies must be valued as instances and proofs of the goodness of God, who is not partial or partial in his dispensations to the world of mankind, who would be very miserable without these favours, and are utterly unworthy of the least of them. Thirdly, These gifts of common providence are dispensed indifferentely to good and evil, just and unjust; so that we cannot know love and hatred by what is before us, but by what is within us; nor by the shining of the sun on our heads, but by the rising of the sun of righteousness in our hearts. Fourthly, To make the most of the comforts of this life in common with others, though they abuse them, and fight against God with his own weapons; which is an amazing instance of God's patience and bounty. It was but once that God forbade his sun to shine on the Egyptians, when the Israelites had fought in their dwellings; God could make such a distinction every day. Fifthly, The gifts of God's bounty to wicked men that are in rebellion against him, teach us to do good to those that hate us; especially considering, that though there is in us a carnal mind which is enmity to God, yet we share in his bounty. Sixthly, Those only will be accepted as the children of God, who study to resemble him, particularly in his goodness. [2.] That we may herein do more than others, v. 46, 47. First, Publicans love their friends. Note, We are to do more than others. To do good to them who do good to us, is a common piece of humanity, which even those whom the Jews hated and despised could give as good proofs of as the best of them. The Publicans were men of no good fame, yet they were grateful to such as had helped them to their places, and courteous to those they had a dependence upon; and shall we be no better than they? In doing this we serve ourselves and consult our own advantage; and what regard can we expect for that, unless a regard to God, and a sense of duty, carry us further than our natural inclination and worldly interest? Secondly, We must therefore love our enemies, that we may exceed them. If we must go beyond Scribes and Pharisees, much more beyond Publicans. Note, Christianity is something more than humanity. It is a serious question, and which we should frequently, to ourselves consider, how much more than others? What exceddng thing do we do? We know more than others; we talk more of the things of God than others; we profess, and have promised, more than others; God has done more for us, and therefore justly expects more from us than from others; the glory of God is more concerned in us than in others; but what do we more than others? Wherein do we live above the rate of the children of this world? Are we not carnal, and do we not walk as men, below the character of Christians? In this especially we must do more than others, that while every one will render good for good, we must render good for evil; and this will speak a nobler principle, and is consonant to a higher rule, than the most of men act by. Others salute their brethren, they embrace those of their own party, and way, and opinion; but we must not so confine our respect, but with all our enemies, and other's enemies, we must expect the reward of Christians, if we rise no higher than the virtue of Publicans." Note, They who presume themselves a reward above others, must study to do more than others. Lastly, Our Saviour concludes this subject with this exhortation, (v. 48.) Be ye therefore perfect, as your Father which is in heaven is perfect. Which may be understood, 1. In general, including all these things wherein we must be followers of God as dear children. Note, 1. It is the duty of Christians to desire, and aim at, and press towards, a perfection in grace and holiness, Phil. 3. 12—14. And therein we must study to conform ourselves to the example of our heavenly Father, 1 Pet. 1. 15, 16. Or, 2. In this particular before mentioned, of doing good to our enemies; see Luke 6. 36. It is God's perfection to forgive injuries and to entertain strangers, and to do good to the evil and unthankful, and it will be ours to be like him. We that owe so much, that owe our all, to the divine bounty, ought to copy it out as well as we can.

CHAP. VI.

Christ having, in the former chapter, armed his disciples against the corrupt doctrines and opinions of the Scribes and Pharisees, especially in their expositions of the law, (that was called their leaven, ch. 16. 12.) comes in this curzer, so likewise in most things, in saying against the two sins, which, though in their doctrine they did not justify, yet in their conversation they were notoriously guilty of, hypocrisy and worldly-mindedness; sins which, of all others, the professors of religion need most to guard against, as sins that most easily beset those who have escaped the grosser pollutions that are in the world through lust, and which are therefore highly dangerous. Verily I say unto you, that as ye do these things as if you were the hypocrisies are, nor do as the hypocrisies do. 1. In giving of alms, v. 1—4. 2. In prayer, v. 5—8. We are here taught what to pray for, and how to pray; (v. 9—13.) and to give in prayer, v. 14, 15. 3. In fasting; v. 16, 17. II. Against worldly-mindedness. 1. In our choice, which is the destroying sin of hypocrisies, v. 19—24. 2. In our cares, which is the disguising sin of many good christians, v. 25—34.

1. Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them; otherwise ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven. 2. Therefore when thou dost thine alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrisies do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto you, they have their reward. 3. But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: 4. That thine alms may be in secret: and thy father, which seeth in secret, himself shall reward thee openly.

As we must do better than the Scribes and Pharisees in avoiding heart-sins, heart-adultery and heart-murder, so likewise in maintaining and keeping up heart-religion, doing what we do from an inward, vital principle, that we may be approved of God, not that we may be applauded of men; that is, we must watch against hypocrisy, which was the leaven of the Pharisees, as well as against their doctrine, Luke 12. 1. Alms-giving, prayer, and fasting, are three great christian duties—the three foundations of the church of God; (Acts 20. 35.) to do largesse and serve God with our three principal interests; by prayer with our souls, by fasting with our bodies, by alms-giving with our estates. Thus we must not only depart from evil, but do good, and do it well, and so dwell for evermore.

Now in these verses we are cautioned against hypocrisy in giving alms. Take heed of it. Our being bid to take heed of it intimates that it is a sin, 1. We are in great danger of it, 2. A subtle sin; vanity insinuates itself into what we do ere we are aware. The disciples would be tempted to it by the power they had to do many wonderful works, and their living with some that admired them and others that despised them, both which are temptations to covet to make a fair show in the flesh. 2. It is a sin we are in great danger by. Take heed of hypocrisy, for if it reign in you, it will ruin you. It is the dead fly that spoils the whole box of precious ointment.

Two things are here supposed.

The giving of alms is a great duty, and a duty which all the disciples of Christ, according to their ability, must abound in. It is prescribed by the law of nature and of Moses, and great stress is laid upon it by the prophets. Divers ancient copies here for πίλευετε—your alms, read πεπλευετε—your righteousness, for alms are righteousnesses, Ps. 112. 9. Prov. 10. 2. The Jews called the floor's being sold to the poor, the floor of righteoumess. That which is given to the poor is said to be their due, Prov. 3. 27. The duty is not the less necessary and excellent for its being abused by hypocrites to serve their pride. If superstitious Papists have placed a merit in works of charity, that will not be an excuse for covetous Protestants that are barren in such good works. It is true, our alms-deeds do not deserve heaven; but it is true that we cannot go to heaven without them. It is pure religion, (Jam. 1. 27.) and will be the test at the great day; Christ here takes it for granted that his disciples give alms, nor will he own those that do not.

II. That it is such a duty as has a great reward attending it, which is lost if it be done in hypocrisy. It is sometimes rewarded in temporal things with felicity (Luke 11. 24, 25.) security from distress; (Prov. 28. 27. Ps. 37. 21, 22.) success in distress; (Ps. 41. 1, 2.) honour and a good name, which follow those most that least covet them, Ps. 112. 9. However, it shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, (Luke 14. 14.) in eternal riches.

Quae dederes, solas semper habebis, ofes.

The rise or fall in your affluence form the only wealth you will always retain. —Martial.

This being supposed, observe now,

1. What was the practice of the hypocrites about this duty. They did it indeed, but not from any principle of obedience to God, or love to man, but in pride and vain-glorу; not in compassion to the poor, but purely for ostentation, that they might be exalted for good men, and so might gain an interest in the estimation of the people, with which they knew how to serve their own turn, and to get a great deal more than they gave. Pursuant to this intention, they chose to give their alms in the synagogues, and in the streets, where there was the greatest concourse of people to observe them, who applauded their liberality because they shared in it, but were so ignorant as not to discern their abominable pride. Probably they had collections for the poor in the synagogues, and the common beggars haunted the streets and highways, and upon these public occasions they chose to give their alms. Not that it is unlawful to give alms when men see us; we may do it, we must do it, but not that men may see us; we should rather choose those objects of charity that are less observed. The hypocrites, if they gave alms at their own inclining, not seeing the poor together to be served, but really to proclaim their charity, and to have that taken notice of and made the subject of discourse.

Now the doom that Christ passes upon this is very observable; Verily I say unto you, they have their reward. At first view this seems a promise—if they have their reward they have enough, but two words make it a curse; (Matt. 6. 1.) if the poor be not relieved by that, and not that they be not relieved, but that the poor be not relieved by it, and not that the poor are relieved, but that the poor are relieved by it; in a word, if the poor are not relieved by it, and not that the poor are relieved by it, but that the poor be relieved by it; in a word, if the poor be not relieved by it, then it is a curse, or the reward is a curse.

(1.) It is a great reward, but it is their reward; not the reward which God promises to them that do good, but the reward which they promise themselves, and a poor reward it is; they did it to be seen of men, and they are seen of men; they chose their own deusions with which they cheated themselves, and they shall have what they chose. Carnal professors stupulate with God for preferment, honour, wealth, and they shall have their bellies filled with those things; (Ps. 17. 14.) but let them expect no more; these are their consolation, (Luke 6. 24.) their good things, (Luke 16. 25.) and they shall be put off with these. Didst thou agree with me for a penny? It is the bargain. (Ps. 119. 37.) It is a reward, but it is a present reward, they have it; and there is none reserved for them in the future state. They now have all that they are likely to have from God; they have their reward here, and have none to hope for hereafter. (Ps. 117. 8.) It signifies a receipt in full. What rewards the godly have in this life are but in part of payment; there is more behind, much more; but it is intimated, in this world, that their doom be; themselves have decided it. The world is but for provision to the saints, it is their spending money; but it is pay to hypocrites, it is their portion.

2. What is the precept of our Lord Jesus about it. t. 3. 4. He that was himself such an example of humility, pressed it upon his disciples, as absolutely necessary to the acceptance of their performances. Verily I say unto you, when thou givest alms, (Matt. 6.) that they may do nothing but that which will be seen of men, to be admired of them. It perhaps alludes to the placing of the Corban, the poor man's box, or the chest into which they cast their free-will offerings, on the right hand of the passage into the temple; so that they put their gifts into it with the right hand. Or the giving of alms with the right hand, intimates readiness to it and resolution in it; do it dexterously, not awkwardly, or with a frown. The right hand may be used in helping the poor, lifting them up, writing for them, dressing their sores, and other ways besides giving them to; but whatever kindness thy right hand doeth to the poor, let not thy left hand know it: conceal it as much as possible; industriously keep it private. Do it because it is a good work, but not because it will get thee a good name. In omnibus facitis, re, non testae, mensurare. In all our actions, be you not influenced by a regard to the object, not to the observer. Cic. De Fin. It is intimated, (1.) That we must not let others know what we do; no, not those that stand at our left hand, that are very near us. Instead of acquainting them with it, keep it from them if possible; however, appear so desirous to keep it from them, as that in civility they may seem not to take notice of it, and keep it to themselves, and let it go no farther. (2.) That they should not be influenced by it. As much ourselves, the left hand is a part of ourselves; we must not within ourselves take notice too much of the good we do, must not applaud and admire ourselves. Self-conceit and self-complacency, and an adoring of our own shadow, are branches of pride, as dangerous as vain-glory and ostentation before men. We find these had their good works remembered to their honour, who had not forgotten themselves for them; When saw we thee an hungry and we ministered unto thee? (Matt. 25.) What is the promise of those who are thus sincere, and humble in their alms-giving. Let thine alms be in secret, and then thy Father which seeth in secret will observe them. Note, When we take least notice of our good deeds ourselves, God takes most notice of them. As God hears the wrongs done to us when we do not hear them, (Ps. 38. 14, 15.) so he sees the good done by us, when we do not see it. As he makes their alms his own in this world, so it is no more the hypocrites have their alms; but he, who is God, will take what is done sincerely, and see their alms; that God sees in secret. But this is not all; not only the observation and praise, but the recompense, is of God, himself shall reward them openly. Note, They who in their alms-giving study to approve themselves to God, only turn themselves over to him for their Paymaster. The hypocrite catches at the shadow, but the upright man makes sure of the substance. Observe how emphatically it is expressed; himself shall reward, he will himself be the Rewarder, Heb. 11. 6. Let him alone to make it up in kind or kindness; nay, he will himself be the Rewarder, (Gen. 15. 1.) thine exceeding great reward. He will reward them thy Father, not a master who gives his servant just what he earns and no more, but as a father who gives abundantly more, and without stint, to his son that serves him. Nay, he shall reward thee openly, if not in the present day, yet in the great day; then shall every man have praise of God, open praise, thou shalt be confessed before men. If the work be not open, the reward shall, and that is better.

5. And when thou pravest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, they have their reward. 6. But thou, when thou pravest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret: and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly. 7. But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. 8. Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask him.

In prayer we have more immediately to do with God than in giving alms, and therefore are yet more concerned to be sincere, which is what we are here directed to. Where thou pravest; (v. 3.) It is taken for granted that all the disciples of Christ pray. As soon as ever Paul was converted, behold, he prayeth. You may as soon find a living man that does not breathe, as a living christian that does not pray. For this shall every one that is godly pray. If prayerless, then graceless. "Now, when thou pravest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are, nor do as they do." (v. 2.) Note, Those who would not do as the hypocrites do in their way and actions, must not be as the hypocrites are in their frame and temper. He names nobody, but it appears by ch. 23. 13. that by the hypocrites here he means especially the Scribes and Pharisees.

Now there were two great faults they were guilty of in prayer, against each of which we are here cautioned—vain-glory; (v. 5, 6.) and vain repetitions, v. 7, 8.

1. We must not be proud and vain-glorious in prayer, nor aim at the praise of men. And here observe.

1. What was the way and practice of the hypocrites. In all their exercises of devotion, it was plain the chief thing they aimed at was to be commended by their neighbors, and thereby to make an interest for themselves. When they seemed to soar upwards in prayer, and if it be right, it is the soul's ascent toward God that is to be esteemed; it was downwards in this as their prayer. Observe, (4.) What the places were which they chose for their devotion; they prayed in the synagogues, which were indeed proper places for public prayer, but not for personal. They pretended hereby to do honour to the place of their assemblies, but intended to do honour to themselves. They prayed in the corners of the streets, the broad streets, (so the word signifies,) which were most frequented. They withdrew thither, as if they were under a pious impulse which would not admit delay, but really it was to make themselves to be taken notice of. There, where two streets met, they were not only within view of both, but every passenger turning close upon them would observe them, and hear what they said.

(2.) The posture they used in prayer; they prayed standing; this is a lawful and proper posture for prayer, (Mark 11. 25. When ye stand praying,) but kneeling being the more humble and reverent gesture, Luke 22. 41. Acts 7. 60. Eph. 3. 14. their station was attended to, and of pride and confidence in themselves, (Luke 18. 11.) The Pharisee stood and prayed.

(3.) Their pride in choosing those public places, which is expressed in two things: [1.] They love to pray there. They did not love prayer for its own sake, but they loved it when it gave them an opportunity of making themselves noticed. Circumstances may be such, that our good deeds must needs be done openly, so as to fall under the observation of others, and be commenced by them; but the sin and danger is when we love it, and are pleased with it, because it feeds the proud humour. [2.] It is that they may be seen of men; not that God might accept them, but that men might admire and applaud them; and that they might easily get the estates of widows and orphans into their hands. (Heb. 11. 34.) and that, when they had them, they might devour them without being suspected; (ch. 23. 14.) and effectually carry on their public designs to enslave the people.

(4.) The product of all this, they have their reward; they have all the recompense they must ever expect from God for their service, and a poor recompense it is. What will it avail us to have the good word of our fellow-servants, if our Master do not say, Well done. But if in so great a transaction as is between us and God, when we are at prayer, we can take in so poor a consideration as the praise of men is, it is just that that should be all our reward. They did it to be seen of men, and they are so; and much good may it do them. Note, Those that would approve themselves to God by their integrity in their religion, must have no regard to the praise of men. They must not go to prayer, nor from them that we expect an answer; they are not to be our judges, they are dust and ashes like ourselves, and therefore we must not have our eye to them: what passes between God and our own souls must be out of sight. In our synagogue-worship, we must avoid every thing that tends to make our personal devotion remarkable, as they that caused their voice to be heard on high, Isa. 54. 8. Public places are not proper for private, solemn prayer.

2. What is the will of Jesus Christ in opposition to this. Humility and sincerity are the two great lessons that Christ teaches us; Thou, when thou prayest, do so and so; (v. 6.) thou in particular by thyself, and for thyself. Personal prayer is here supposed to be the duty and practice of all Christ's disciples.

[1.] Instead of praying in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, enter into thy closet, into some place of privacy and retirement. Isaac went into the field, (Gen. 24. 63.) Christ to a mountain, Peter to the house-top. No place amiss in point of ceremony, if it do but answer the end. Note, Secret prayer is to be performed in retirement, that we may be unobserved, and so may avoid ostentation; undisturbed, and so may avoid distraction; unheard, and so may use the greater freedom; yet if the circumstances be such that we cannot possibly avoid being taken notice of, we must not therefore neglect the duty, lest the omission be a greater scandal than the observation of it.

[2.] Instead of doing it to be seen of men, pray to thy Father which is in secret; to me, even to me, Zech. 7. 5. 6. The Pharisees prayed rather to men than to God; whatever was the form of their prayer, the scope of it was to beg the applause of men, and court their favours. "Well, do thou pray to God, and let that be enough for thee. Pray to him as a Father, saith the Father, ready to hear and answer, graciously inclined to pity, help, and succour thee. Pray to thy Father which is in secret." Note, In secret prayer we must have an eye to God, as present before us. It is not enough to pray in my closet when no one else is there; there especially nigh to thee in what thou callest upon him for. By secret prayer we give God the glory of his universal presence, (Acts 17. 24.) and may take to ourselves the comfort of it.

[1.] Thy Father seeth in secret; his eye is upon thee only when there is a just and sincere desire for that which, in our own regard, may not be in begging? The reward will be open; they shall not only have it, but have it honourably: the open reward is that which hypocrites are fond of, but they have not patience to stay for it; it is that which the sincere are dead to, and they shall have it over and above. Sometimes secret prayers are rewarded openly in this world by signal answers to them, which manifest the praying people in the consciences of their adversaries; however, at the great day there will be an open reward, when all praying people shall appear in glory with the great Intercessor. The Pharisees had their reward before all the town, and it was a mere flash and shadow; true christians shall have theirs before all the world, angels and men, and it shall be a weight of glory. 14. We must not pray in secret, when we pray in secret; John 17. 24. Sometimes the life of prayer lies in lifting up the soul and pouring out the heart, yet there is some interest which words have in prayer, especially in joint prayer; for in that, words are necessary, and it should seem that our Saviour speaks here especially of that; for before he said, when thou prayest, here, when ye pray, and the Lord's prayer which follows is a joint prayer, and in that, he that is the mouth of others is most tempted to an ostentation of language and expression, against which we are here warned: we not vain repetitions, either alone or with others; the Pharisees affected this, they made long prayers, (ch. 22. 14.) all their care was to make them long. Now observe,

1. What the fault is that is here reproved and condemned; it is making a mere lip-labour of the duty of prayer; and a secret service, when it is not the service of the soul. This is expressed here by two words, παραξενία, παραξενία. (1.) Vain repetitions. Tautology, babble, idle babbling over the same words again and again to no purpose, like Battus, sub illis mortibus erant, erant sub montibus illis; like that imitation of the wordiness of a God, Eccl. 10. 14. A man cannot tell what shall be; and what shall be after him, who can tell? which is indecent and nauseous in an ordinary use, much more in speaking to God. It is not all repetition in prayer that is here condemned, but vain repetitions. Christ himself prayed, saying the same words, (ch. 26. 44.) out of a more than ordinary fervour and zeal, Luke 22. 44. So Daniel, ch. 9. 18. 19. And there is a very elegant repetition of the same word,
Ps. 136. It may be of use both to express our own affections, and to excite the affections of others.

But the superstitious riproaching of a tale of words, without regard to the sense of them, as the papists, saying by their beads so many Ave-Marys and Paternosters; or the barren and dry groanings of that same things again and again, merely to drill out the prayer to such a length, and to make a show of affection when really there is none; these are the vain repetitions here condemned. When we would fain say much, but cannot say much to the purpose; this is displeasing to God and all wise men. (2.) Much speaking, and affectation of prolixity in prayer, that is, when there is no occasion for it, is an immoderate and a demonstration of the vanity of the principle of the heart. God needs either to be informed or argued with by us, or out of mere folly and impertinence, because men love to hear themselves talk. Not that all long prayers are forbidden; Christ prayed all night, Luke 6. 12. Solomon’s was a long prayer. There is sometimes need of long prayers when our errands and our affections are extraordinary; but merely to prolong the prayer, as if that would make it more pleasing or more prevailing with God, is that which is here condemned; it is not much praying that is condemned; no, we are bid to pray always, but much speaking; the danger of this error is when we only say our prayers, not when we pray them. This caution is explained by that of Solomon, (Eccle. 5. 2.) Let thy words be few, considerate and well weighed; take with you words; (Hos. 14. 2.) choose out words, (Job. 11. 13.) and do not say every thing that comes uppermost.

2. What reasons are given against this.

(1.) This is the way of the heathen, as the heathen do; and it ill becomes christians to worship their God as the Gentiles worship theirs. The heathen were taught by the light of nature to worship God; but becoming vain in their imaginations concerning the object of their worship, no wonder they became so careless, so careless, and particularly in this instance: thinking God altogether such a one as themselves, they thought he needed many words to make him understand what was said to him, or to bring him to comply with their requests; as if he were weak and ignorant, and hard to be entreated. Thus Baal’s priests were hard at it from morning till almost night with their vain repetitions; O Baal, hear us; O Baal, hear us; and vain repetitions they were also accustomed to make at their sacrifice; a very concave prayer, prevailed for fire from heaven first, and then water; 1 Kings 18. 26, 36. Life-labour in prayer, though ever so well laboured, if that be all, is but lost labour.

(2.) It need not be your way, for your Father in heaven knoweth what things we have need of before you ask him, and therefore there is no occasion for such abundance of words. It does not follow that therefore you need not pray, but that your prayer to own your need of him and dependence on him, and to plead his promises; but therefore you are to open your case, and pour out your hearts before him, and then leave it with him.” Consider,

[1.] The God we pray to is our Father by creation, by covenant; and therefore our addresses to him should be easy, natural, and unaffected; children do not need to speak in speechless words to their parents when they want anything; and is it not strange that we should use formal, unmeaning words in praying to our heavenly Father?

Let us come to him with the disposition of children, with love, reverence, and dependance; and then they need not say many words, that are taught by the Spirit of adoption to say that one aright, Abba, Father. [2.] He is a Father that knows our case and knows our wants better than we do ourselves. He knows what things we have need of; his eyes are set upon us and joy through the earth to observe the necessities of his people, (2 Chron. 16. 9.) and he often gives before we call, (Isa. 65. 24.) and more than we ask for, (Eph. 3. 20.) and if he do not give his people what they ask, it is because he knows they do not need it, and that it is not for their good; and of that he is fitter to judge for us than we for ourselves. We need not be long, nor use many words in representing our case; he knows it better than we can tell him, only he will know it from us; (what will ye that I should do unto you?) and when we have told him what it is, we must refer ourselves to him, Lord, all my desire is before thee, Ps. 38. 9. So far is God from being wrought upon by the length or language of our prayers, that the most powerful intercessions are these which are made with groanings that cannot be uttered, Rom. 8. 26. We are not to prescribe, but subscribe to God.

9. After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name: 10. Thy kingdom come: Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven: 11. Give us this day our daily bread: 12. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors: 13. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: for thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen. 14. For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: 15. But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.

When Christ had condemned what was amiss, he directs to do better; for his are reproofs of instruction. Because we know not what to pray for as we should, he would have us ask for the will of God, and then for the power to do it; we must be sensible of what we ask; we must know the end of the prayer, and the reason of the words into our mouths; after this manner therefore pray ye, v. 9. So many were the corruptions that had crept into this duty of prayer among the Jews, that Christ saw it needful to give a new directory for prayer, to show his disciples what must ordinarily be the matter and method of their prayer, which he gives in words that may very well be used as a form; as the summary or contents of the several particular prayers. Not that we are bound to the use of this form only, or of this always, if this were necessary to the consecrating of our other prayers; we are here bid to pray after this manner, with these words, or to this effect. That in Luke differs from this; we do not find it used by the apostles; we are not here taught to pray in that name of Christ, as we are afterward; we are here taught to pray that the kingdom might come which did come when the Spirit was poured out; yet, without doubt, it is very good to use it as a form, and it is a pledge of the communion of saints, it having been used by the church in all ages, at least (says Dr. Whitby) from the third century. It is our Lord’s prayer, it is of his composing, of his appointing; it is very comprehensive, yet very comprehensive. The matter is choice and necessary, the method instructive, and the expression very concise. It has much in a little, and it is requisite for the repetition of the uncommon prayers, and for the public reading of it, for it is used acceptably, no further than it is used with understanding, and without vain repetition.

The Lord’s prayer (as indeed every prayer) is a letter sent from earth to heaven. Here is the inscription of the letter, the person to whom it is directed, our Father; the place where, in heaven; the contents of it in several errands of request; the eldest, for thine is the kingdom; the seal, Amen; and if you will, the date too, this day.

Plainly thus: there are three parts of the prayer.
1. The preface, Our Father which art in heaven. Before we come to our business, there must be a solemn address to him with whom our business lies; Our Father. Intimating, that we must pray, not only alone and for ourselves, but with and for others; for we are members one of another, and are called into fellowship with each other. We are here taught to whom to pray, to God only, and not to saints and angels, for they are ignorant of us, nor to our fellow men, because they cannot give the favours we expect. We are taught how to address ourselves to God, and what title to give him, that which speaks him rather beneficial than magnificent, for we are to come boldly to the throne of grace.

1. We must address ourselves to him as our Father, and must call him so. He is a common Father: if he be our Father, he will pity us under our weaknesses and infirmities, (Ps. 103. 13.) will spare us, (Mal. 3. 17.) will make the best of our performances, though very defective, will deny us nothing that is good for us, Luke 11. 11—13. We have access with boldness to him, as to a father, and have an advocate with the Father, and the Spirit of adoption. When we come repenting of our sins, we must eye God as a Father, as the prodigal did; (Luke 15. 18. Jer. 3. 19.) when we come repented for grace, and peace, and the inheritance and blessing of sons, it is an encouragement that we come to God, not as an unreconciled, avenging Judge, but as a loving, gracious, reconciled Father in Christ, Jer. 3. 4.

2. As our Father in heaven: so in heaven as to be every where else, for the heaven cannot contain him; yet so in heaven as there to manifest his glory, for it is his throne, (Ps. 103. 19.) and it is to believers a throne of grace: thitherward we must direct our prayers, for Christ the Mediator is now in heaven, Heb. 8. 1. Heaven is out of sight, and a world of spirits, therefore our converse with God in prayer must be spiritual; it is on high, therefore in prayer we must be raised above the world, and lift up our hearts to the Father. Heaven is a land of perfect purity, and we must therefore lift up pure hands, must study to sanctify his name, who is the Holy One, and dwells in that holy place, Lev. 10. 3. From heaven God beholds the children of men, Ps. 33. 13, 14. And we must in prayer see his eye upon us: thence he has a full and clear view of all our wants and burdens and desires, and all our infirmities. It is the fundament of his power likewise, as well as of his prospect, Ps. 150. 1. He is not only, as a father, willing to help us, but as a heavenly Father, able to help us, able to do great things for us, more than we can ask or think; he has wherewith to supply our needs, for every good gift is from above. He is a Father, and therefore we may come to him with boldness, but a Father in heaven, and this with reverence. It is the fundament of his power likewise, as well as of his prospect, Ps. 150. 1. Thus all our prayers should be raised to heaven, which is our great aim as Christians, and that is, to be with God in heaven. God and heaven, the end of our whole conversation, must be particularly eyed in every prayer; there is the centre to which we are all tending. By prayer we send before us thither, where we profess to be going.

The petition, Our daily bread. The three first relating more immediately to God and his honour, the three last to our own concerns, both temporal and spiritual; as in the ten commandments, the four first teach us our duty toward God, and the six last our duty towards our neighbour. The method of this prayer teaches us to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then to hope that other things shall be added.

1. Hallowed be thy name. It is the same word that in other places is translated sanctified. But here the old word hallowed is retained, only because people would otherwise not understand it. The word is here, and these words, (1.) We give glory to God; it may be taken not as a petition, but as an adoration; as that, the Lord be magnified, or glorified, for God's holiness is the greatness and glory of all his perfections. We must begin our prayers with praising God, and it is very fit he should be first served, and that we should give glory to God, before we expect to receive mercy and grace from God. We must, first give thanks, and the praise of his perfections, and then let us have the benefit of them. (2.) We fix our end, and it is the right end to be aimed at, and ought to be our chief and ultimate end in all our petitions, that God may be glorified; all other requests must be in subordination to this and in pursuance of it. "Father, glorify thyself in giving me my daily bread and, personal sanctification to me, that I may be fit for the glory of thy name." (3.) We desire and pray that the name of God, that is, God himself, in all that whereby he has made himself known, may be sanctified and glorified both by us and others, and especially by himself. "Father, let thy name be glorified as a Father, and a Father in heaven; glorify thy goodness and thy highness, thy majesty and mercy. Let thy name be sanctified, for it is a holy name; no matter what becomes of our polluted names, but, Lord, what will thou do to thy great name?" When we pray that God's name may be glorified, [1.] We make a virtue of necessity; for God will sanctify his own name, whether we desire it or not; I will be exalted among the heathen, Ps. 46. 10. [2.] We ask for that which we are sure shall be granted; for when our Saviour prayed, Father, glorify thy name, it was immediately answered, I have glorified it, and will glorify it again.

2. Thy kingdom come. This petition has plainly a reference to the doctrine which Christ preached at this time, which John Baptist had preached before, and which he afterwards sent his apostles out to preach—the kingdom of heaven is at hand. The kingdom of God, or God's kingdom, which is in heaven, the kingdom of the Messiah, this is at hand, pray that it may come. Note, We should turn the word we hear into prayer, our hearts should echo to it; does Christ promise, surely I come quickly, our hearts should answer, even so, come. Ministers should pray over the word: when they preach, the kingdom of God is at hand, they should pray, Father, thy kingdom come. What God has promised in the gospel for prosperity, he won, not to super sede, but to quicken and encourage, prayer; and when the accomplishment of a promise is near and at the door, when the kingdom of heaven is at hand, we should then pray for it the more earnestly; thy kingdom come; as Daniel set his face to pray for the deliverance of Israel, when he understood that the time of it was at hand, Dan. 9. 2. 3. Luke, 18. 8. It was the Jews' daily prayer to God, Let him make his kingdom reign, let his redemption flourish, and let his Messiah come and deliver his people. De.

Whity, ex Virtinga. "Let thy kingdom come, let the gospel be preached to all and embraced by all; let all be brought to subscribe to the record God has given in his word concerning his Son, and to embrace him as their Saviour and Sovereign. Let the bounds of the gospel-church be enlarged, the kingdom of the world be made Christ's kingdom, and all men become subjects to it, and live as becomes their character."

3. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. We pray that God's kingdom being come, we and others may be brought into obedience to all the laws and ordinances of it. By this let it appear that Christ's kingdom is come, let God's will be done; and by this let it appear that it is come as a kingdom of grace, for it introduces us to God. We make Christ king and a titular Prince, if we call him King, and do not do his will: having prayed that he may rule us, we pray that we may in every thing be ruled by him. Observe, (1.) The thing prayed for, thy will be done; "Lord, do what thou pleasest with me and mine;" (Isa. 3. 18.) I refer myself to thee, and am well satisfied that all thy counsel concerning me should be performed. In this sense Christ prays, Lord, "Behold, I bring my spirit in the hand of the Lord." (Ps. 44. 23.) He prays to do what is pleasing to thee; give me that grace which is necessary to the right knowledge of thy will, and an acceptable obedience to it. Let thy will be done conscientiously by me and others, not our own will, the will of the flesh, or the mind, not the will of men, (1 Pet. 4. 2.) much less Satan's will, (John 8. 44.) that we may neither displease God in anything we do, "ut nihil nostri conoci dissentat deo," nor be displeased at any thing God does, "ut nihil Dei disputate nobis." (2.) The pattern of it, that it may be done on earth, in this place of our trial and probation, (where our work must be done, or it never will be done,) as it is done in heaven, that place of rest and joy. We pray that earth may be made more like heaven to the observers of God's will, which, through the prevalency of Satan's will, is become so near akin to hell; and that saints may be made more likely to the holy angels in their devotion and obedience. We are on earth, blessed be God, not yet under the earth; we pray for the living only, not for the dead, that are gone down into silence.

4. Give us this day our daily bread. Because our natural being is necessary to our spiritual well-being in this world, therefore, after the things of God's glory, kingship, and kingdom, comes the concern of everyday life. Our prayers supports and comforts of this present life, which are the gifts of God, and must be asked of him, To wter iroun-Bread for the day approaching, for all the remainder of our lives. Bread for the time to come, or bread for our being and subsistence, that is, agreeable to our condition in the world, (Prov. 30. 8.) food convenient for us and our families, according to our rank and station.

Every word in this petition teaches us: (1.) We ask for bread; that teaches us sobriety and temperance; we ask for bread, not dainties, nor superfluities; that which is wholesome, though it be not nice. (2.) We ask for our bread; that teaches us honesty and industry; we do not ask for the bread out of other people's mouths, not the bread of deceit, (Prov. 26. 13.) not the bread of idleness, (Prov. 31. 27.) but the bread of necessity, but. (3.) We do not ask for that bread which teaches us not to take thought for the morrow, (ch. 6. 34.) but constantly to depend upon divine providence, as those that live from hand to mouth. (4.) We beg of God to give it us, not sell us, nor lend it us, but give it us. The greatest of men must be beholden to the mercy of God for their daily bread. (5.) We pray, "Give it to us; not to me only, but to others in common with me." This teaches us charity, and a compassionate concern for the poor and needy. It intimates also, that we ought to pray with our families; we and our household cat together, and therefore ought to pray together. (6.) We pray that God would give it us this day; which teaches us to renew the desire of our souls toward God, as the wants of our bodies are renewed; as duly as the day comes, we must pray to our heavenly Father, and reckon we should as well go a day without meat, as without prayer.

5. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. This is connected with the former: and forgive, intimating, that unless our sins be pardoned, we can have no comfort in life, or the supports of it. Our daily bread does but feed us as lambs for the slaughter, if our sins be not pardoned. We cannot take it well that we must pay us our daily pardon, as duly as we pray for daily bread. He that is washed, needeth to wash his feet. Here we have,

(1.) A petition; Father in heaven, forgive us our debts, our debts to thee. Note, [1.] Our sins are our debts; there is a debt of duty, which, as creatures, we owe to our Creator; we do not pray to be discharged from that, but, upon the non-payment of this, there arises a debt of punishment, and the default of obedience to the will of God, we became obnoxious to the wrath of God; and for not observing the precept of the law, we stand obliged to the penalty. A debtor is liable to process, so are we: a malefactor is a debtor to the law, so are we. [2.] Our heart's desire and prayer to our heavenly Father every day should be, that he would forgive us our debts; that is, the obligation to punishment may be cancelled and vacated, that we may not come into condemnation; that we may be discharged, and have the comfort of it. In suing out the pardon of our sins, the great plea we have to rely upon, is the satisfaction that was made to the justice of God for the sin of man, by the dying of the Lord Jesus our Saviour, or rather Bait to the action, that undertook our discharge.

(2.) An argument to enforce this petition; as we forgive our debtors. This is not a plea of merit, but a plea of grace. Note, Those that come to God for the forgiveness of their sins against him, must make conscience of forgiving those who have offended them, else they curse themselves when they say the Lord's prayer. Our duty is to forgive our debtors; as to debts of money, we must not be rigorous and severe in exacting them from those that are not able to pay them out of their own hand, nor from their families; but this means debts of injury; our debtors are those that trespass against us, that smite us, (ch. 5. 39, 40.) and, in strictness of law, might be prosecuted for it; we must forbear, and forgive, and forget the affronts put upon us, and the wrongs done us; and this is a moral qualification for pardon and peace; it encourages to hope, that God will forgive us, for if there be in the general forgiveness of God, and therefore there is a perfection eminently and transcendently in himself; it will be an evidence to us that he has forgiven us, having wrought in us the condition of forgiveness.

6. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. This petition is expressed,

(1.) Negatively: Lead us not into temptation. Having prayed that the guilt of sin may be removed, (pray for another day,) and that others may not beguile us, that we may not be tempted to folly, that we may not be tempted to it. It is not as if God tempted any to sin; but "Lord, do not let Satan loose upon us; chain up that roaring lion, for he is subtle and sly;" Lord, do not leave us to ourselves, (Ps. 19. 13.) for we are very weak; Lord, do not lay stumbling-blocks and snares before us, nor put us into such circumstances as may be an occasion of falling." Temptations are to be prayed against, both because of the discomfort and trouble of them, and because of the danger we are in of being overcome by them, and the guilt and grieve that then follow.

(2.) Positively: But deliver us from evil, and from the evil one, the devil, the tempter; keep us, that either we may not be assaulted by him, or we may not be overcome by those assaults. Or from the evil thing, sin, the worst of evils; an evil, an only evil; that evil thing which God hates, and which he will render to every man, to destroy them by. Lord, deliver us from the evil of the world, the corruption that is in the world through lust; from the evil of every condition in the world; from the evil of death, from the sting of death which is slain: deliver us from our selves, from our own evil hearts: deliver us from evil men, that they may not be a snare to us, nor we a prey to them.

III. The conclusion: For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen. Some refer this to David's doxology, 1 Chron. 29. 11. Thine, O Lord, is the greatness. It is, 1. A form of plea to enforce the foregoing petitions. It is our duty to plead with God in prayer, to fill our mouth with arguments, (Job 23. 4.) not to move God, but to affect ourselves; to encourage our faith, to excite our fervency, and to evidence both. Not only our plea to God, but prayer, is taken from God himself, and from that which he has made known of himself. We must wrestle with God in his own strength, both as to the matter of our pleas and the urging of them. The plea here has special reference to the three first petitions: "Father in heaven, thy kingdom come, for thine is the kingdom; thy will be done, for thine is the power, hallowed be thy name, for thine is the glory. And as to our own particular errands, these are encouraging: "Thine is the kingdom; thou hast the government of the world, and the protection of the saints, thy willing subjects in it." God gives and saves like a king. "Thine is the power, to maintain and support that kingdom, and to make good all thine engagements to thy people." "Thine is the glory, as the end of all that is given to, and done by, and for thy people." And therefore, "Let their praise waiteth for him. This is matter of comfort and holy confidence in prayer."

2. It is a form of praise and thanksgiving. The best pleading with God is praising of him; it is the way to obtain further mercy, as it qualifies us to receive it. In all our addresses to God, it is fit that praise should have a considerable share, for praise becometh the saints; they are to be to our God for a name and for a praise. It is just and equal: we praise God, and give him glory, not because he needs it—he is praised by a world of angels, but because he deserves it; and it is our duty to give him glory, in compliance with his design in revealing himself to us. Praise is the work and happiness of heaven; and all that would go to heaven hereafter, must begin this. Praise is a wholesome tendril in the bottom of us; it is, The kingdom, and the power, and the glory, it is all thine. Note, It becomes us to be copious in praising God. A true saint never thinks he can speak honourably enough of God: here there should be a gracious fluency, and this forever. Ascribing glory to God, forever, intimates an acknowledgment, that it is eternally due, and an earnest desire to be eternally doing it, with angels and saints above, Ps. 71. 14.

Lastly, To all this we are taught to affix our Amen, so be it. God's Amen is a grant; his fiat is, shall be so: our Amen is only a summary desire; our fiat is, let it be so: it is in token of our desire and assurance to be heard, that we say, Amen. Amen refers to every petition going before, and thus, in compassion to our infirmities, we are taught to knit up the whole in one word, and so to gather up, in the general, what we have lost and let slip in the particulars. It is a good grace, a goodwi 7th, God's first, our last, warming, and to destroy us, a sweet savour upon our spirits. It was of old the practice of good people to say, Amen, audibly at the end of every prayer, and it is a commendable practice, provided it be done with understanding, as the apostle directs, (1 Cor. 14. 16.) and uprightly, with life and liveliness, and inward impressions, answering to that outward expression of desire and confidence.

Most of the petitions in the Lord's prayer had been commonly used by the Jews in their devotions, or words to the same effect: but that clause in the fifth petition, As we forgive our debtors, was perfectly new, and therefore our Saviour here shows for what reason he added it, not with any personal reference upon the peevishness, litigiousness, and ill nature of the men of that generation, though there was cause enough for it, but only from the necessity and importance of the thing itself. God, in forgiving us, has a peculiar respect to our forgiving those that have injured us; and therefore, when we pray for pardon, we must mention our making conscience of that duty, not only to remind ourselves of it, but to blind ourselves to it. See that parable, ch. 18. 23. See also 2 Cor. 6. 7. And therefore it is here inculcated, v. 14, 15.

1. In a promise. If ye forgive, your heavenly Father will also forgive. Not as if this were the only condition required; there must be repentance and faith, and new obedience; but as where other graces are in truth, there will be this, so this will be a good evidence of the sincerity of our other graces. He that releaseth his brother, thereby shows that he repents toward his God. Those which in the prayer are called debts, are here called trespasses, debts of injury, wrong done us in our bodies, goods, or reputation: trespasses; it is a extenuating term for offences, סומעיסות, stumbles, slips, falls. Note. It is a good evidence, and a good help of our forgiving others, to call the injuries done us by a modifying, excusing name. Call them not trespasses, but trespasses, injuries, miseries, great sins, or any other name; or, as one man in prayer, in their praise waiteth for him. This is matter of comfort and holy confidence in prayer.

2. In a threatening. But if you forgive not those that have injured you, that is a sad sign you have not the other requisite conditions, but are altogether unqualified for pardon; and therefore your Father, whom you call Father, and who, as a father, offers you his grace upon reasonable terms, will neither change the agreement, nor account for the breach, nor forgive you, and yet you be defective greatly in forgiving, you cannot expect the comfort of your pardon, but to have your spirits brought down by some affliction or other to comply with this duty. Note. Those that would find mercy with God must shew mercy to their brethren; nor can we expect that he should stretch out the hands of his favour to us, unless we lift them to him, and be hands, and arms, and feet, of mercy. If we do not forgive, we have reason to fear God will answer in anger. It has been said, prayers made in wrath are written in gall. What reason is it that God should forgive us the talents we are indebted to him, if we forgive not our brethren the pence they are indebted to us? Christ came into the world as the great Peace-Maker, not only to reconcile us to God, but one to another, and in this we must comply with him. It is great presumption and of dangerous consequence, for any to make a light matter of that which Christ here lays such a stress upon. Men's passions shall not frustrate God's word.

16. Moreover, when ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily I say unto you, they have their reward. 17. But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head, and wash thy face; 18. That thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret: and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.

We are here cautioned against hypocrisy in fasting, as before in almsgiving, and in prayer.

1. It is here supposed that religious fasting is a duty required of the disciples of Christ, when he, in his providence, calls to it, and when the case of their own souls upon any account requires it; when the bridegroom is taken away, then shall they fast, ch. 9. 13. Fasting is here put last, because it is so not much a duty for its own sake, as a means to dispose us for other duties. Prayer comes in between fasting and fasting, the body and soul of both. Christ here speaks especially of private fasts, such as particular persons prescribe to themselves, as free-will offerings, commonly used among the pious Jews; some fasted one day, some two, every week; others seldom, as they saw cause. On those days they did not eat till sun-set, and then very sparingly. It was not the Pharisee's fasting twice in the week, but his fasting of it, that Christ condemned, Luke 18. They proscribed a laudable practice, and we have reason to lament it, that it is so generally neglected among Christians. Anna was much in fasting, Luke 2. 37. Cornelius fasted and prayed, Acts 10. 30. The primitive Christians were much in it, see Acts 13. 3.—14. 23. Private fasting is supposed, 1 Cor. 7. 5. It is an act of self-denial, and mortification of the flesh, a holy revenge upon ourselves, and humiliation under the hand of God. The most grown Christians must hereby own, they are so far from having anything to be proud of, that they are unworthy of their daily bread. It is a means to curb the flesh and the desires of it, and to make us more lively in religious exercises, as fulness of bread is apt to make us drowsy. Paul was in fasting often, and so he kept under his body, and brought it into subjection.

2. We are cautioned not to do this as the hypocrites did it, lest we lose the reward of it; and the more difficulty attends the duty, the greater loss it is to lose the reward of it.

Now, (1.) The hypocrites pretended fasting, when there was nothing of that contrition and humiliation of soul in them, which is the life and soul of the duty. theirs were mock-fasts, the show and shadow without the substance; they took on them to be more humbled than really they were, and so endeavoured to put a cheat upon God, than which they could not put a greater affront upon him. The fast that God has chosen, is a day to afflict the soul, not to hang down the head like a bratrush, nor for a man to spread sackcloth and ashes under him; we are quite mistaken, if we call this a fast, Isa. 58. 5. Bodily exercise, if that be all, profits little, since that is not fasting to God, even to him. Lay not up their fasting, and managed it so as that all who saw them might take notice that it was a fasting-day with them. Even on these days they appeared in the streets, whereas they should have been in their closets; and they affected a downcast look, a melancholy countenance, a slow and solemn pace; and perfectly disfigured themselves, that men might see how often they fasted, and extol them for devout, mortified men. Note, It is said that men, who have, in some measure, mastered their pleasure, which is sensual wickedness, should be ruined by their pride, which is spiritual wickedness, and no less dangerous. Here also they have their reward, that praise and applause of men which they court and covet so much; they have it, and it is their all.

3. We are directed how to manage a private fast; we must keep it private, v. 17, 18. He does not tell us how often we must fast; circumstances vary, and wisdom is profitable therein to direct; the Spirit in the word has left that to the Spirit in the heart, but take this for a rule, whenever you undertake this duty, study therein to approve yourselves to God, and not to recommend yourselves to the good opinion of men: humility must evermore attend upon our humiliation. Christ does not direct to abate any thing of the reality of the fast; he does not say, "take a little meat, or a little drink, or a little cordial," no, "let the body suffer, but lay aside the show and appearance of it; appear with thy ordinary countenance, guile, and dress; and while thou deniest thyself thy bodily refreshments, do it so as that it may not be taken notice of, no, not by the Pharisees; procure to them a look pleasing, and a holy thine head, and wash thy face, as thou dost in ordinary days, on purpose to conceal thy devotion; and then shalt be no loser in the praise of it at last; for though it be not of men, it shall be of God." Fasting is the humiliation of the soul, (Ps. 35. 13.) that is the inside of the duty; let that therefore be thy principal care, and as to the outside of it, covet not to let it be seen. If we be sincere in our solemn fasts, and humble, and trust in the providence of our witness, and his goodness for our reward, we shall find, both that he did see in secret and will reward openly. Religious fasts, if rightly kept, will shortly be recompensed with an everlasting peace. Our acceptance with God in our private fasts, should make us dead, both to the applause of men, (we must not do the duty in hopes of this,) and to the censures of men too: (we must not decline the duty in fear of them,) but whatsoever we do, we that fast, shall be recompensed, Ps. 69. 10. and yet, v. 13. As for me, let them say what they will of me, my prayer is unto thee in an acceptable time.

19. Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: 20. But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal: 21. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. 22. The light of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light: 23. But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness! 24. No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon.

Worldly-mindedness is as common and as fatal a symptom of hypocrisy as any other, for by no sin can Satan have a surer and faster hold of the soul, under the c ask of a visible and passable profession of religion, shew by this; and therefore Christ having warned us against coveting the praise of men, proceeds next to warn us against coveting the wealth of the world; in this also we must take heed, lest we be as the hypocrites are, and do as they do: the fundamental error that they are guilty of, is, that they choose the world for their reward; we must therefore take heed of hypocrisy and worldly-mindedness, in the choice we make of our treasure, our end, and our masters.

1. In choosing the treasure we lay up. Something other every man has which he makes his treasure, his portion which his heart is upon, to which he carries all he can get, and which he depends upon for futurity. It is that good, that chief good, which Solomon speaks of with such an emphasis, Eccl. 2. 3. Something the soul will have, which it looks upon as the best thing, which it has a complacency and confidence in above other things. Now Christ designs not to deprive us of our treasure, but to direct us in the choice of it; and here we have,

1. A good caution against making the things that are seen, that are temporal, our best things, and placing our happiness in them. Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth. Christ's disciples had left all to follow him, let them still keep in the same. Some have identified this caution with something that is in itself, at least in our opinion, precious and valuable, and likely to stand us in stead hereafter. Now we must not lay up our treasures on earth, that is, (1.) We must not count these things the best things, not the most valuable in themselves, nor the most serviceable to us: we must not call them glory, as Laban's sons did, but see and own that they have no way to be compared with the glory that is celestial. (2.) We must not covet an abundance of these things, nor be still grasping at more and more of them, and adding to them, as men do to that which is their treasure, as never knowing when we have enough. (3.) We must not confide in them for futurity; to be our security and supply in time to come; we must not say to the gold, Thou art my hope. (4.) We must not content ourselves with them, as all we need or desire was, nor be too wise to take our part of our passage, but not with all for our portion. These things must not be made our consolation, (Luke 6. 24.) our good things, Luke 16. 25. Let us consider we are laying up, not for our posterity in this world, but for ourselves in the other world. We are put to our choice, and made in a manner our own carvers; that is ours which we lay up for ourselves. It concerns thee to choose wisely, for thou art choosing for thyself, and shalt have as thou choosest. If we know and consider ourselves what we are, what we are made for, how large our capacities are, and how long our continuance, and that our souls are ourselves, we shall see it a foolish thing to lay up our treasure on earth.

Here is a good reason given why we should not look upon earthly things as our treasure, because it is liable to loss and decay: [1.] From corruption within. That which is treasure upon earth moth and rust doth corrupt. If the treasure be laid up in fine clothes, the moth frets them, and they are gone and spoiled insensibly, when we thought them most securely laid up. If it be in corn or other cattles, as his was who had his barn full, (Luke 12. 16. 17.) rust and frets shall make them corrupt. The very things eaten by men, for as goods are increased, they are increased that eat them; (Eccles. 5. 11.) eaten by mice or other vermin; manna itself bred worms; or if it grows moldy and musty; is struck, or smutted, or blasted; fruits soon rot. Or, if we understand it of silver and gold, they tarnish and cumber; they grow less with using, and grow worse with keeping; (Jam. 5. 2. 3.) the rust and the moth breed in the metal itself and in the garment itself. Note, Worldly riches have in themselves a principle of corruption and decay; they wither of themselves and make their possessors wretched. From the carnal spirit, Thieves break through and steal. Every hand of violence will be aiming at the house where the treasure is laid up; nor can any thing be laid up so safe, but we may be spoiled of it. Ninguam ego fortuna credidi, etiam si videterum facerem agere; omnia illa quae in me indigentissime conferatur, pecuniam, mercem,公然, gloria, co loco posuit, unde fossit ea, ine metu meo, refregit.— Never reposed confidence in fortune, even if she seemed propitious: whatever were the favours which her bounty bestowed, whether wealth, honours, or glory, I so disposed of them that it was in her power to recall them without occasioning me any alarm. Seneca Consol. ad Hetr. It is folly to make that our treasure which we may so easily be robbed of.

Good counsel, to make the joys and glories of the other world, those things not seen that are eternal, our best things, and to place our happiness in them. Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven. Note, (1.) There are treasures in heaven, as sure as there are on this earth; and those in heaven are the only true treasures, the riches and glories and pleasures that age at God's right hand, which those that are here have not nor see, and which no one is yet able to identify perfectly. (2.) It is our wisdom to lay up our treasure in those treasures; to give all diligence to make sure our title to eternal life through Jesus Christ, and to depend upon that as our happiness, and look upon all things here below with a holy contempt, as not worthy to be compared with it. We must firmly believe there is such a happiness, and resolve to lay our treasures where they will not lose their value, and that we will have to be free of all things earthly, and to live without them; and yet give none of our present possessions to be the price of it. We must not put these treasures under the hands of corruptible stewards, lest they be dissipated, or misused, or stolen away from us. (3.) It is a great encouragement to us to lay up our treasure in heaven, that there it is safe; it will not decay of itself, no moth nor rust will corrupt it: nor can we be by force or fraud deprived of it; thieves do not break through and steal. It is a happiness above and beyond the changes and chances of time, an inheritance incorruptible.

3. A good reason why we should thus choose, and an evidence that we have done so, (v. 21.) Where your treasure is, on earth or in heaven, there will your heart be. We are therefore concerned to be right and wise in the choice of our treasure, because the temper of our minds, and consequently the temper of our ways; the course and current of our lives, is affected by it. That which is our heart, is our treasure, our life, our joy, our comfort, our heart. The heart follows the treasure, as the needle follows the lodestone, or the sunflower the sun. Where the treasure is, there the value and esteem is; there the love and affection is, Col. 3. 2. That way the desires and pursuits go, thitherward the aims and intents are levelled, and all is done with that in view. Where the treasure is, there our labours and fears are lest we come short of it; about that we are more solicitous; there our hope and trust is; (Prov. 18. 10. 11.) there our joys and delights will be; (Ps. 119. 111.) and there our thoughts will be; there the inward thought will be, the first thought, the free thought, the fixed thought, the frequent, the familiar thought. The heart is God's due, (Prov. 23. 26.) and, that he may have it, our treasure must be laid up with him, and then our souls will be lifted up to him.

This direction about laying up our treasure, may very fitly be applied to the foregoing caution, of not doing what we do in religion to be seen of men. Our treasure is our alms, prayers, and fastings, and the reward of them; if we have done these only to gain the applause of men, and to avoid the reproach of the wicked, we have lodged it in the hands of men, and must never expect to hear any further of it. Now it is folly to do this, for the praise of men we covet so much, is liable to corruption; it will soon be rusted, and moth-eaten, and tarnished; a little folly, like a dead fly, will spoil it all, Eccl. 10. 1. Slander and calumny are thieves that break through and steal it away, and so lose all the treasure of our performances. We must rely upon God, and he will be there rewarded, and we shall meet them again with comfort on the other side death and the grave.

Hypocritical services lay up nothing in heaven; (Isa. 58. 3.) the gain of them is gone, when the soul is called for, Job 27. 8. But if we have prayed and fasted and given alms, in truth and uprightness, with an eye to God and to his acceptance, and have approved ourselves to him therein, we have laid up that treasure in heaven; a book of remembrance is written in heaven for them. If we have thus disposed of our income, and shall be there rewarded, and we shall meet them again with comfort on the other side death and the grave. Hypocrites are written in the earth, (Jer. 17. 13.) but God's faithful ones have their names written in heaven, Luke 10. 20. Acceptance with God is treasure in heaven, which can neither be corrupted nor stolen. His well done shall stand for ever; and if we have thus laid up our treasure with him, with him our hearts will be; and where can they be better?

II. We must take heed of hypocrisy and worldly-mindedness in choosing the end we look at. Our concern as to this is represented by two sorts of eyes which men have, a single eye and an evil eye, v. 22. 23. The expressions here are somewhat dark because concise; we shall therefore take them in some variety of interpretation. The light of the body is the eye, that is plain; the eye is discovering and directing; the light of the world would avail us little without this light of the body; it is the light of the eye that rejoiceth the heart, (Prov. 15. 30.) but what is that which is here compared to the eye in the body?

1. The eye, that is, the heart; (so some) if that be single— ἕνα μὲν ἐνοχὸν, (so the word is frequently rendered, as Rom. 12. 2. 2 Cor. 3. 2—9. 11. 1 Cor. 10. 1.) and we read of a bountiful eye, Prov. 32. 9.) If the heart be liberally affected and stand inclined to goodness and charity, it will direct the man to christian actions, the whole conversation will be full of light, full of the evidences and instances of true christianity, that pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, (Jam. 1. 27.) full of light, of good works, which are our light shining before men; but if the heart be evil, covetous, and hard, and envies, grudgings, and grudgings, (such a temper of mind is often expressed by an evil eye, Mark 7. 22. Prov. 23. 6, 7. ) the body will be full of darkness, the whole conversation will be heathenish and unchristian. The instruments of the churl are and always will be evil, but the liberal deviseth liberal things, Isa. 32. 5—8. If the light that is in us, those affections which should guide us to that which is good, be darkness, if these be corrupt and worldly, if there be not much as good nature in a man, not such a kind, with joy and good cheer, if the usurpation of the man, and the darkness in which he sits! This sense seems to agree with the context: we must lay up treasure in heaven by liberality in giving alms, and that not grudgingly but with cheerfulness, Luke 12. 33. 2 Cor. 9. 7. But these words in the parallel place do not come in upon any such occasion, Luke 11. 34. and therefore the coherence here does not determine that to be the sense of them.

3. The eye, that is, the understanding; (so some;) the practical judgment, the conscience, which is to the other faculties of the soul, as the eye is to the body, to guide and direct their motions; now if the eye be single, if it make a true and right judgment, and is disposed and determined to the due end, there will be no great concern of laying up the treasure so as to choose aright in that, it will rightly guide the affections and actions, which will all be full of the light of grace and comfort; but if this be evil and corrupt, and instead of leading the inferior powers, is led, and bribed, and biased by them, if this be erroneous and misinformed, the heart and life must needs be full of darkness, and the whole conversation corrupt. It is a concern of understanding, that the eye of the understanding be single, in darkness, Ps. 89. 5. It is said when the spirit of a man, that should be the candle of the Lord, is an ignis fatua; when the leaders of the people, the leaders of the faculties, cause them to err, for then they that are led of them are destroyed, Isa. 9. 16. An error in the practical judgment is fatal, it is that which calls evil good and good evil; (Isa. 5. 20.) therefore it concerns us to understand things aright, to order our actions as concerning things above to be without respect of persons, Col. 3. 23.

5. The eye, that is, the aims and intentions; by the eye we set our end before us, the mark we shoot at, the place we go to, we keep that in view, and direct our motion accordingly; in every thing we do in religion, there is something or other that we have in our eye; now if our eye be single, if we aim honestly, fix right ends, and move rightly towards them, if we aim purely and only at the glory of God, seek his honour and favour, and direct all entirely to him, then the eye is single: Paul's was so when he said To me to live is Christ; and if we be right here, the whole body will be full of light, all the actions will be regular and gracious, pleasing to God and comfortable to ourselves; but if this eye be evil, if, instead of aiming only at the glory of God, and our acceptance with him, we look aside at the applause of men, and while we profess to honour God, contrive to honour ourselves, and seek our own things under colour of seeking the things of Christ, this spoils all, the whole conversation will be perverse and unsteady, and the foundations being thus out of course, there can be nothing but confusion and every evil work in the superstructure. Draw the lines from the circumference to any other point but the centre, and they will cross. If the light that is in thee be not only dim, but darkness itself, it is a fundamental error, and destructive to all that follows. The end specified is the action. It is of the last importance in religion, that we be right in our aims, and make eternal things, not temporal, our scope, 2 Cor. 4. 18. The hypocrite is like the waterman, that looks one way and rows another; the true christian like the traveller, that has his journey's end in his eye. The hypocrite soars like the kite, with his eye upon the prey below, which he is ready to commence to when he has got it; the true christian soars like the lark, higher and higher, forgetting the things that are beneath.

III. We must take heed of hypocrisy and worldly-mindedness in choosing the master we serve, v. 24. No man can serve two masters. Serving two masters is contrary to the single eye; for the eye will be to the master's hand, Ps. 123. 1. 2. Our Lord Jesus here exposes the cheat with which the souls of men are to divide between God and the world, to have a treasure on earth and a treasure in heaven too; please God and please men too. Why not? says the hypocrite; it is good to have two strings to one's bow. They hope to make their religion serve their secular interest, and so turn to account both ways. The pretending mother was for dividing the child: the Samaritans will compound between God and idols. No, says Christ, this will not do; it is a supposition that gain is godliness. 1 Tim. 6. 5. He is 1. A general maxim laid down: it is likely it was a proverb among the Jews, No man can serve two masters, much less two gods; for their commands will some time or other cross or contradict one another, and their occasions interfere. While two masters go together, a servant may follow them both; but when they part, he will run to whichever he loves; he cannot love, and observe, and cleave to both as he should. If to the one, not to the other; either this or that must be comparatively hated and despised. This truth is plain enough in common cases.

2. The application of it to the business in hand. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. Mammon is a Syriac word, that signifies gain; so that whatever is this world is, or is accounted by us to be, gain, (Phil. 3. 7.) is mammon. Whatever is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, is mammon. To some their belly is their mammon, and they serve that; (Phil. 3. 19.) to others their case, their sleep, their sports and pastimes are their mammon; (Prov. 6. 9.) to others worldly riches; (James 4. 4.) to others honours. The application and applause of men was the Pharisees' mammon; in a word, self, the unity in which the world's trinity centres, sensual, secular self, is the mammon which cannot be served in conjunction with God; for if it be served, it is in competition with him and in contradiction to him. He does not say, We must not or we should not, but we cannot serve God and Mammon; we cannot love both; (1 John 5. 21.) hold both, or hold by both in observance, obedience, attendance, trust, and dependence, for they are contrary, the one to the other.

God says, My son, give me thy heart. Mammon says, "No, give it me." God says, Be content with such things as ye have. Mammon says, "Grasp at all that ever thou canst. Rent, rent, quaque unum modo rem-Money, money, by fair means or by foul, money." God says, Defraud not, never lie, be honest and just in all thy dealings. Mammon says, "Cheat thy own father, if thou canst gain by it." God says, Be charitable. Mammon says, "Hold thy own, this giving undeems us all." God says, Be careful for nothing. Mammon says, "Be careful for every thing." God says, Keep holy the Sabbath-day. Mammon says, Make use of that day as well as any other for the world. Thus inconsistent are the commands of God and Mammon, so that we cannot serve both. Let us not then halt between God and Baal, but choose ye this day whom ye will serve, and abide by your choice.

25. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? 26. Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? 27. Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature? 28. And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: 29. And yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. 30. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which today is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? 31. Therefore take no thought saying, What shall we eat? or, what shall we drink? or, wherewithal shall we be clothed? 32. (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. 33. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. 34. Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

There is scarcely any one sin against which our Lord Jesus more largely and earnestly warns his disciples, or against which he arms them with more variety of arguments, than the sin of disquieting, distracting, distrustful cares. He says, whatever it was that the Pharisees had said, that both the pressure and the heart are on the earth; and therefore he thuslargely insists upon it. Here is,

I. The prohibition laid down. It is the counsel and command of the Lord Jesus, that we take no thought about the things of this world; I say unto you. He says it as our Lawgiver, and the Sovereign of our hearts; he says it as our Comforter, and the Helper of our joy. What is it that he says? It is this, and he that has ears to hear, let him hear it. Take no thought for your life, nor yet for your bodies; (v. 25.) Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? (v. 31.) and again, (v. 34.) Take no thought, nor yet for your raiment. Be not in care. As against hypocrisy, so against worldly cares, the caution is thrice repeated, and yet no vain repetition: freeret must be upon freeret, and line upon line, to the same purpose. Enough is not little enough; it is a sin which doth excessively beset us. It intimates how pleasing it is to Christ, and of how much concern it is to ourselves, that we should live without carefulness. It is the repeated command of the Lord Jesus to his disciples, that they should not divide and pull in pieces their own minds with care about the world. There is a thought concerning the things of this life, Which is nothing less than such a care as he will have nothing to do with. It is not only lawful, but duty, such as is commended in the virtuous woman, Prov. 27. 23. The word is used concerning Paul's care of the churches, and Timothy's care for the state of souls, 2 Cor. 11. 28. Phil. 2. 20.

But the care here forbidden is, 1. A disquieting, tormenting care, which hurries the mind hither and thither, and hastes it in suspense; it is our joy in God, and a deep tap at our hope in him; while it batters the sleep, and hinders our enjoyment of ourselves, of our friends, and of what God has given us. 2. A distrustful, unbelieving thought. God has promised to provide for those that are his, all things needful for life as well as godliness, the life that now is, food and a covering; not dainties, but necessaries. He never said, They shall be fed. Now an increased time for care, and fear of wanting those supplies, spring from a disbelief of these promises, and of the wisdom and goodness of Divine Providence; and that is the evil of it. As to present sustenance, we may and must use lawful means to get it, else we tempt God; we must be diligent in our callings, and prudent in proportioning our expenses to what we have, and we must pray for daily not he do for us, who did that—what will we do? If we take care about our souls and eternity, which are more than the body, and its life, we may leave it to God to provide for us food and raiment, which are less. God has maintained our lives hitherto; if sometimes with pulse and water, that has answered the end; he has protected us and kept us alive. He that guards us against them who are opposed to us, and gives us all the good things we are in need of. If he had been pleased to kill us, to starve us, he would not so often have given his angels a charge concerning us to keep us.

2. Behold the fowls of the air, and consider the lives of the field. Here is an argument taken from God's common providence toward the inferior creatures, and their dependence, according to their capacities, upon that providence. A fine pass fallen man is come to, that he must be sent to school to the fowls of the air, and that they must teach him, Job 12. 7, 8.

1. Look upon the fowls; and learn to trust God for food, (v. 26.) and disquiet not yourselves with thoughts what you shall eat. (1.) Observe the providence of God concerning them. Look upon them, and receive instruction. There are various sorts of fowls; they are numerous, some of them ravenous, but they are all fed, and fed with food convenient for them; it is rare that any of them perish for want of food, even in winter, and there goes no little to feed them all the year round. The fowls, as they are least serviceable to man, so they are least within his care; nor, when fed upon them, do they know not how, and some of them fed best in the hardest weather; and it is your heavenly Father that feeds them; he knows all the wild fowls of the mountains, better than you know the tame ones at your own barn-door, Ps. 50. 11. Not a sparrow lights to the ground, to pick up a grain of corn, but by the providence of God, which extends itself to the meanest creatures. But that which is especially observed here is, that they are fed without any care or project of their own; they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns. The ant indeed does, and the bee, and they are set before us as examples of prudence and industry; but the fowls of the air do not; they make no provision for the future themselves, and yet every day, as truly as the day comes, provision is made for them, and their eyes wait on God, that great and good Housekeeper, who provides food for all fowls.

2. Improve this for your encouragement to trust in God. Are ye not much better than they? Yes, certainly you are. Note, The heirs of heaven are much better than the fowls of heaven; nobler and more excellent beings, and, by faith, they soar higher; they are of a better nature and nurture, wiser than the fowls of heaven: (Job 35. 11.) though the children of this world, that know not the judgment of the Lord, are not so wise as the stork, and the crane, and the swallow, (Jer. 8. 7.) you are dearer to God, and nearer, though the foolish man's frame is more beautiful than theirs; (Ps. 139. 14.) they are supplied by their Maker and Lord, (Ps. 17. 12.) Owner and Master; but beside all this, he is your Father, and in his account ye are of more value than many sparrows; you are his children, his first born; now he that feeds his birds surely will not starve his babies. They trust your Father's providence, and will not you trust it? In dependence upon that, they are careless for the morrow; and being so, they live the merriest lives, and all creatures, they are supplied with the branches, (Ps. 104. 12.) and, to the best of their power, they praise their Creator. If we were, by faith, as unconcerned about the morrow as they are, we should sing as cheerfully as they do; for it is worldly care that Miss our mirth, and damp our joy, and silences our praise, as much as any thing.

(2.) Look upon the lilies, and learn to trust God for their care. That is another part of our care, what we shall put on for decency yet to cover us; for defence, to keep us warm; yea, and, with many, for dignity and ornament to make them look great and fine; and so much concerned are they for gaiety and variety in their clothing, that this care returns almost as often as that for their daily bread. Now to ease of this our care, let us consider the lilies of the field; not only look upon them, (every eye does that with pleasure,) but let us consider the experience when he deal of good to be learned from what we see every day, if we would but consider it, Prov. 6. 6.—24. 32.

[1.] Consider how frail the lilies are; they are the grass of the field. Lilies, though distinguished by their colours, are still but grass. Thus all flesh is grass, though some in the endowments of body and mind are as lilies, much admired, still they are grass; the grass of the field in nature and constitution; they stand upon the same level with others. Man's days, at best, are as grass, as the flower of the grass. 1 Pet. 1. 24. This grass to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven; in a little while the place that knows us, will know us no more. The grass is the oven into which we shall be cast, and in which we shall be consumed as grass in the fire. Ps. 102. 7. Lilies are transitory matters; they not take thought for the morrow, what we shall put on, because perhaps, by to-morrow, we may have occasion for our grave-clothes.

[2.] Consider how free from care the lilies are; they toil not as men do, to earn clothing; as servants, to earn their livings; neither do they spin, as women do, to make clothing. It does not follow that we should neglect, or do carelessly, the proper business of this life; it is the praise of the virtuous woman, that she laughters hand to the spindle, makes fine linen, and sells it, Prov. 31. 19, 24. Idleness tempts God, instead of trusting him; but he that provides for the inferior creatures, without their labour, will much more provide for us, by blessing our labour, which he has made our duty. And if we should, through sickness, be unable to twist and spin, God can furnish us with what is necessary for us.

[3.] Consider how fair, how fine the lilies are; how they grow; what they grow from. The root of the lily or tulip, as other bulbous roots, is, in the winter, lost and buried under ground; yet, when spring returns, it appears, and starts up in a little time; hence it is promised to God's Israel, that they shall grow as the lily, Hos. 14. 5. Consider what they grow to. Out of that obscurity in a few weeks they come to be so very gay, that even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these. The array of Solomon was very splendid and magnificent; he that had the peculiar treasure of kings and provinces, and so studiously affected pomp and gal- lantry, did dwell in the richest clothing, and the best attire up, that could be in the world; and yet, not so he appeared in his glory on high days. And yet, let him dress himself as fine as he could, he comes far short of the beauty of the lilies, and a bed of tulips outshines him. Let us, therefore, be more ambitious of the wisdom of Solomon, in which he was outdone by none; wisdom to do our duty in our places, rather than of the riches of Solomon, in which he was outdone by the lilies. Knowledge is the perfection of man, not beauty, much less fine clothes. Now God is here said thus to clothe the grass of the field. Note, All the excellencies of the creature flow from God, the Fountain and Spring of them. It was he that gave the horse his strength, and the lily its beauty; every creature is in itself, as well as to us, what he makes it to be.

4. Consider how instructive all this is to us. v. 30.

First, to find clothing; this teaches us not to care for it at all, nor to covet it, nor to be proud of it, nor to make the putting on of apparel an ornament, for, after all our care in this the lilies will far outdo us; we cannot dress so fine as they do, why then should we attempt to vie with them? Then adorning will soon perish, and so will ours; they are to-day, and to-morrow are cast, as other rubbish, into the oven; and the clothes we are proud of are wearing out, the gloss is soon gone, the rococo fancy, that is, our finery, as good as grass, and the garment itself is worn out; such is man in all his pomp, (Isa. 46. 6, 7,) especially rich men; (Jam. 1. 10,) they fade away in their ways.

Secondly, As to necessary clothing; this teaches us to cast the care of it upon God—Jehovah-jireh; and trust him that clothes the lilies, to provide for you what you shall put on. If he give such fine clothes to the grass, much more will he give fitting clothes to his own children; clothes that shall be warm upon them, not only when he quieteth the earth with the south wind, but when he disquiets it with the north wind, Job 37. 17. He shall much more clothe you; for you are noble creatures, of a more excellent being; if so he clothes the short-lived grass, much more will he clothe you that are made for immortal beings. And shall not he, in whom the very air breathes? clothe the morning dress of decent beauty? (Hos. 14. 7.) He shall clothe you with his true glory, and you shall be clothed with a garment fit for a king. The lily, that is, the noblest and fairest of all flowers, is ever present in God's mind; yet not as the land is full with the multitude of his riches and occasions is there an end to the glory of God, Ps. 104. 4. He will clothe the sons of Zion, that are in covenant with God. Observe the title he gives them, (v. 31.) Caste of little fath. This may be taken, 1. As an encouragement to true faith, though it be but weak; it entitles us to the divine care and a promise of suitable supply. Great faith shall be encomiasted, and weak faith not despised, when we have seen what we have desired before the ground, (John 4. 10, 11.) much more the sons of Zion, that are in covenant with God. 2. As a call to give God the glory that is his due, and not to rest satisfied with less. The bases in the family are fed and clothed, as well as those that are grown up, and with a special care and tenderness; say not I am but a child, but a dry tree, (Isa. 56. 3, 5.) for though poor and needy, yet the Lord thinketh on the earth; Or. 2. It is rather a rebuke to weak faith, though it be true, ch. 14. 21. It intimates what is at the bottom of all our inordinate care and thoughtfulness; it is owing to the weakness of our faith, and the remains of unbelief in us. If we had but more faith, we should have less care. 3. Which of you, the wisest, the strongest of you, by taking thought, can add one cubit to his stature? (v. 27.) to his age, so some; but the measure of a cubit denotes it to be meant of the stature, and the age at longest is but a span, Ps. 39. 5. Let us consider, (1.) We did not arrive at the stature we are of, by our own care and thought, but by the providence of God. An infant of a span long is grown up to be a man of six feet, and how was one cubit after another added to his stature? Not by his own foresight or contrivance; he grew he knew not how, by the power and goodness of God. Solomon never thought of, or provided for, our bodies and made them of such a size, surely will take care to provide for them. Note, God is to be acknowledged in the increase of our bodily strength and stature, and to be trusted for all needful supplies, because he has made it to appear, that he is for the body. The growing age is the thoughtless, careless age, yet we grow; and shall not he whose power is infinite, and whose goodness is perfect, still make our children to grow, and so to account for their growth? (2.) We cannot alter the stature we are of; if we would: what a foolish and ridiculous thing would it be, for a man of low stature to perplex himself, to break his sleep, and beat his brains, about it, and to be continually taking thought how he might be a cubit higher; when; after all, he knows he cannot effect it, and therefore he had better be content and take it as it is? We are not all of a size, yet the difference in stature between one and another is not material, nor of any great account; a little man is ready to wish he were as tall as such a one, but he knows it is to no purpose, and therefore does as well as he can with it. Now as we do in reference to our bodily stature, so we should do in reference to our worldly estate. [1.] We should not covet an abnormal estate in this world, any more than we would covet the addition of a cubit to one's stature, which is a great deal in a man's height; it is enough to grow by inches; such an addition would but make one unwieldy, and a burden to one's self. [2.] We must reconcile ourselves to our state, as we do to our stature; we must set the conveniences against the inconveniences, and so make a virtue of necessity: what cannot be remedied must be made the best of. We have therefore to alter the dispositions of Providence, and therefore must acquiesce in them, accommodate ourselves to them, and relieve ourselves, as well as we can, against inconveniences, as Zachæus against the inconvenience of his stature, by climbing into the tree.

4. After all these things do the Gentiles seek, v. 32. Thoughtfulness about the world is a heathenish sin, and unbecoming Christians. The Gentiles seek these things with anxiety, and are eager for this world, because they are strangers to a better; they seek these things with care and anxiety, because they are without God in the world, and understand not his providence. They fear and worship their idols, but know not how to trust them for deliverance and supply; and, therefore, are themselves full of care; but it is a shame for Christians who build upon a nobler principle, and profess religion which teaches the contrary, not only that there is a Providence, but that there are promises made to the good of the life that now is, which teaches them a confidence in God and a contempt of the world, and gives such reasons for both; it is a shame for them to walk as Gentiles walk, and to fill their heads and hearts with these things.

5. Your heavenly Father knoweth ye have need of all these things; these necessary things, food and raiment; he knows our wants, he knows our poverty; though he be in heaven, and his children on earth, he observes what the least and poorest of them has occasion for, (Rev. 2. 9.) I know thy poverty. You think, if such a good friend did but know your wants and straits, you should soon have relief; your God knows them; and he is your Father that loves you and pities you, and is ready to help you. We cannot say, our heavenly Father, who has wherewith to supply all your needs: be not therefore so weak and vain as to have anything to do with all dissecting thoughts and cares; go to thy Father; tell him, he knows thou hast need of such and such things; he asks you, Children, have you any meat? John 21. 5. Tell him whether you have or not. Though he knows our wants, he will know them from us; and when we have opened them to him, let us cheerfully refer ourselves to his wisdom, providing for good, for our supply. Therefore, we should care ourselves, not the less of the burden of care, by casting it upon God, because it is he that careth for us, (1 Pet. 5. 7.) and what needs all this ado? If he care, why should we care?

6. Seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you, v. 33. Here is a double argument against the sin of thoughtfulness; take no thought for your life, the life of this world, the things of this world; for, (1.) You have greater and better things to trust to for your life, the life of the soul, your eternal happiness; that is the one thing needful, (Luke 10. 42.) about which you should employ your thoughts, and which is commonly neglected, in those hearts wherein worldly cares have the ascendant. If we were but more careful to please God, and to work out our own salvation, we should be less solicitous to please ourselves, and work out an estate in the world. Thoughtfulness for our souls, is the most effectual cure of thoughtfulness for the world. (2.) You have a surer and easier, a safer and a more compropensive way to obtain the necessaries of this life, than by barking, and caring, and fretting about them; and that is, by seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and, for that reason, let religion your business; say not that this is the way to starve, no, it is the way to be well provided for, even in this world. Observe here,

[1.] The great duty required; it is the sum and substance of our whole duty. "Seek first the kingdom of God; mind religion as your great and principal concern?" our duty is to seek; to desire, pursue, and aim at these things; it is a word that has in it much of the constitution of the new covenant, in favour of us; though we have not attained, but in many things fail, and come short, sincere seeking, a careful concern and earnest endeavour, are accepted.

Now observe, First, The object of this seeking; The kingdom of God, and his righteousness; we must mind heaven as our end, and holiness as our way. Seek the comforts of the kingdom of grace and glory as your felicity; aim at the kingdom and the heaven, and the glory of heaven, and make it sure; resolve not to take up short of it; seek for this glory, honour, and immortality; prefer heaven and heavenly blessings far before earth and earthly delights. We make nothing of our religion, if we do not make heaven of it. And with the happiness of this kingdom, seek the righteousness of it; God's righteousness, the righteousness which he requires to be wrought in us, and wrought in the world, such as regards that of the Scriptures and Pharisees; we must follow peace and holiness, Heb. 12. 14. Secondly, The order of it. Seek first the kingdom of God. Let your care for your souls and another world, take place of all other cares; and let all the concerns of this life be made subordinate to those of the life to come: we must seek the things of Christ more than our own things; and if ever they come in competition, we must remember to seek the things of Christ. You may have a larger concern for the things first; first in thy days, let the morning of youth be dedicated to God. Wisdom must be sought early; it is good beginning betimes to be religious. Seek this first every day; let waking thoughts be of God." Let this be our principle, to do that first which is most needful, and let him that is the first, have the first.

[2.] The gracious promise annexed; all these things, the necessary supports of life, shall be added unto you; shall be given over and above; so it is in the margin. You shall have what you seek, the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, for never any sought in vain, that sought in earnest; and besides that, you shall have food and raiment, by way of overplus; as he that buys goods has paper and packthread given him into the bargain. Godliness has the promise of the life that now is, 1 Tim. 4. 8. Besides, we asked wisdom, and find that and other things added to him, 2 Chron. 1. 11, 12. O what a blessed change would it make in our hearts and souls, did we but firmly believe this truth, that the best way to be comfortably provided for in this world, is to be most intent upon another world? We then begin at the right end of our work, when we begin with God. If we give diligence to make sure to ourselves the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, the things of this life, Jehovah of hosts, the Lord will provide as much, and as well, as he sees good for us, and more we would not wish for. Have we trusted him for the portion of our inheritance at our end, and shall we not trust him for the portion of our cup, in the way to it? God's Israel were not only brought to Canaan at last, but had their charges borne through the wilderness. Of that we were more thoughtfull about the things that are not seen, that are eternal, and the less the thoughtful we should be, and the less thoughtfull we should need to be, about the things that are seen, that are temporal! Also regard not your stuff, Gen. 45. 20, 23.

7. The morrow shall take thought for the things of itself; sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof, v. 34. We must not perplex ourselves inordinate about future events, because every day brings along with it its own burden of cares and grievances, as if we look about us, and suffer not our fears to betray the succours which grace and reason offer, it brings along with it its own strength and supply too. So that we are hereby told,

(1.) That thoughtfulness for the morrow is needless; let the morrow take thought for the things of itself. If wants and troubles be renewed with the day, there are aids and provisions renewed likewise; compassion's, that are new every morning, Lam. 3. 22. The saints have a Friend that is their arm every morning, and gives out fresh supply daily, instead of looking up, the unfitness of their day requires; (Ezra 3. 4.) and so he keeps his people in a constant dependence upon him. Let us re-fer it therefore to the morrow's strength, to do the morrow's work, and bear the morrow's burden. To-morrow, and the things of it, will be provided for without us; why need we thus anxiously care for that which is so wisely cared for already? This does not forbid a prudent foresight, and preparation accordingly, but a perplexing solicitude, and a prepossession of difficulties and calamities, which may perhaps never come, or if they do, may be easily borne, and the evil of them guarded against. The meaning is, let us mind present duty, and then leave events to God; do the work of the day in its day, and then let to-morrow bring its work along with it.

(2.) That thoughtfulness for the morrow is one of those foolish and hurtful lusts, which they that will be rich fall into, and one of the many sorrows, wherewith they pierce themselves through. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. This present day has trouble enough attending it, we need not accumulate burdens by anticipating our trouble, nor borrow perplexities from to-morrow's evils to add to those of this day. It is uncertain what to-morrow's God does, let what they do, it is sufficient enough to take thought about them when they come. What a folly is it to take that trouble upon ourselves this day by care and fear, which belongs to another day, and will be never the lighter when it comes? Let us not pull that upon ourselves all together at once, which Providence has wisely ordered to be borne by parcels. The conclusion of this whole matter then is, that it is the will and command of the Lord, to order the things in this dispensation not by their own tormentors, nor make their passage through this world more dark and unpleasant, by their apprehensions of troubles, than God has made it, by the troubles themselves. By our daily prayers we may procure strength to bear us up under our daily troubles, and to arm us against the temptations that attend them, and then let none of these things move us.

CHAP. VII.

This chapter continues and concludes Christ's sermon on the mount, which is purely practical, directing us to order our conversation aright, both toward God and man; for the design of the christian religion is to make men good, every way good. We have, I. Some rules concerning censure and reproof, v. 1. 2. II. Encouragements given us to pray to God for what we need, v. 7. 11. III. The necessity of strictness in conversation urged upon us, v. 13, 14. IV. A caution given us to take heed of false prophets, v. 15, 20. V. The conclusion of the whole sermon, showing the necessity of universal obedience to Christ's commands, without which we cannot expect to be happy, v. 27. VI. The impression which Christ's doctrine made upon his hearers, v. 28, 29.

1. JUDGE not, that ye be not judged.

2. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. 3. And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? 4. Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye? 5. Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye. 6. Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.

Our Saviour is here directing us how to conduct ourselves in reference to the faults of others; and his expressions seem intended as a reproof to the Scribes and Pharisees, who were very rigid and severe, very magisterial and supercilious, in condemning all about them, as those commonly are, that are proud and conceited in justifying themselves. We have here,

I. A caution against judging, v. 1. 2. There are those whose office it is to judge—magistrates and ministers. Christ, though he made not himself a Judge, yet came not to unmakethem, for by him prince decrees justice; but this is directed to private persons, to his disciples, who shall hereafter sit in thrones judging, but not now. Now observe, 1. The prohibition; Judge not: We must judge ourselves, and judge of our own acts, but we must not judge our brother, not magisterially assume such an authority over others, as we allow not them over us; since our rule is, to be subject to one another. Be not many masters, Jam. 3. 1. We must not sit in the judgment-seat, to make our word a law to others, until we must not judge others. But what is that is, we must not speak evil of him, so it is explained, Jam. 4. 11. We must not defile him, nor set him at naught, Rom. 14. 10. We must not judge rashly, nor pass such a judgment upon our brother as has no ground, but is only the product of our own jealousy and ill nature. We must not make the worst of people, nor infer such injudicious things from their words and actions as they will not bear. We must use mankind not judgmental, nor with a spirit of revenge, and a desire to do mischief. We must not judge of a man's state by a single act, nor of what he is in himself by what he is to us, because in our own cause we are apt to be partial. We must not judge the hearts of others, nor their intentions, it is God's prerogative to try the heart, and we must not step into his throne; nor must we judge of their eternal state by the same conscience, that is stretching beyond our line; what have we to do, thus to judge another man's servant? Counsel him, and help him, but do not judge him.

2. The reason to enforce this prohibition; that ye be not judged. This intimates, (1.) That if we presume to judge others, we may expect to be ourselves judged. He who usurps the bench, shall be called to the bar; he shall be judged of men; commonly none are more censured, than those who are most censorious; every one will have a stone to throw at them; he who, like Ishmael, has his hand, his tongue, against every man, shall, like him, have every man's hand and tongue against him; (Gen. 16. 12.) and no mercy shall be shown to the reputation of those that show no mercy to the reputation of others. Yet that is not the worst of it; they shall be judged of God; from him they shall receive the great sentence. (Rev. 20.) Both parties must appear before him, (Rom. 14. 10.) who, as he will relieve the humble sufferer, will also resist the haughty slanderer, and give him enough of judging.

(2.) That if we be modest and charitable in our censures of others, and decline judging them, and judge ourselves rather, we shall not be judged of the Lord. As God will forgive those that forgive their brethren, so he will not judge those that will not judge their brethren; (Matt. 5.) It is an evidence of humility, charity, and deference to God, and shall be owned and rewarded by him accordingly. See Rom. 14. 10.

The judging of those that judge others, is according to the law of retaliation; With what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged. v. 2. The righteous God, in his judgments, often observes a rule of proportion; in the case of Atanazbeck, Judg. 1. 7. See also Rev. 13. 10. You will find that all who are unjustly and unrighteously judged and magnified in his judgments, and all flesh will be silenced before him. With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again; perhaps in this world, so that men may read their sin in their punishment. Let this deter us from all severity in dealing with our brother. What then shall we do when God rises up? Job 31. 4. What would be the case with God, if he were as exact and severe in judging us, as we are in judging the breach of others? If we should weigh us in the same balance? We may justly expect it, if we be extreme to mark what our brethren do amiss. In this, as in other things, the violent dealings of men return upon their own heads.

II. Some cautions about reproving. Because we must not judge others, which is a great sin, it does not therefore follow, that we must not reprove others, which is a great duty, and may be a means of saving a soul from death; however, it will be a means of saving our souls from sharing in their guilt.

Now observe here, I. It is not every one who is fit to reprove. Those who are themselves guilty of the faults of which they accuse others, or of worse, bring shame upon themselves, and are not likely to do good to those whom they reproving. v. 5. Here is,

(1.) A just reproof to the censorious who quarrel with their brother for small faults, while they allow themselves in great ones; who are quick-sighted to spy a mote in his eye, but are not sensible of a beam in their own; nay, and will be very officious to pull out the mote out of his eye, when they are as unfit to do it as if they were themselves quite blind. Note, [1.] There are degrees in sin: some sins are common to all men, and therefore may be neglected; some are more frequent than others; some are a great sin, and may be a means of saving a soul from death; however, it will be a means of saving our souls from sharing in their guilt. [2.] There are degrees in sin: some sins are common to all men, and therefore may be neglected; some are a great sin, and may be a means of saving a soul from death; however, it will be a means of saving our souls from sharing in their guilt. [3.] There are many that have beams in their own eyes, and yet do not consider it. They are under the guilt and dominion of very great sins, and yet are not aware of it, but justly themselves, as if they needed no repentance nor reformation; it is as strange that a man can be in such a sinful, miserable condition, and not be aware of it, as that a man should have a beam in his eye, and not consider it; but the god of this world so artfully blinds their minds, that notwithstanding, with great assurance, they say, We see. [4.] It is common for those that are most sinful themselves, and least sensible of it, to be most forward and free in judging and censoring others: the Pharisees, who were so much proud of it, and so much vain in justifying themselves, were most scornful in condemning others. They were severe upon Christ's disciples for eating with unwashed hands, which was scarcely a mote, while they encouraged men in a contempt of their parents, which was a beam. Pride and charitableness are commonly beamed in the eyes of those that pretend to be critical and nice in their censures of others. Nay, many of them judge of that in secret, which they have the face to punish in others when it is discovered.

Coegi tecum, forte sit viatum de quo quereris, si te diligentem exerceris, in sinu invenies; iniquo judeo irascisti crimini tu?—Reflect that perhaps the fault of which you complain, might, on a strict examination, be discovered in yourself; and that it would be unjust publicly to express indignation against your own crime. Seneca, de Benefic. But, [5.] Many seem to be severely censured who are indulgent of their own, is a mark of hypocrisy. Thou hyprocrite, v. 5. Whatever such a one may pretend, it is certain that he is no enemy to sin, (if he were, he would be an enemy to his own sin,) and therefore he is not worthy of praise; nay, that it appears he is an enemy to his brother, and therefore worthy of blame. This spiritual charity must begin at home; "For how canst thou say, when thou hast sinned before thy comrade, Let me help to reform thee, when thou takest no care to reform thyself? Thy own heart will upbraid thee with the absurdity of it; thou wilt do it with an ill grace, and thou wilt expect every one to tell thee, that vice correctis sin: physician, heal thyself;" if free, sequar—Go you before, and I will follow." See Rom. 2. 21. [6.] The consideration of what is amiss in ourselves, though it ought not to keep us from administering freely reproving others in their faults, to bring them to repentance, and to make us very candid and charitable in judging others. Therefore restore with the spirit of meekness, considering thyself; (Gal. 6. 1.) what thou hast been, what thou art, and what thou wouldst be, if God should leave thee to thyself.

(2.) Here is a good rule for reprovers, v. 5. Go in the right method, first cast the beam out of thine own eye. Our own badness is so far from excusing us from reproving, that our being it rendered unfit to reprove, is an aggravation of our badness; I must not say, "I have a beam in my own eye, and therefore I will not help my brother with the mote out of his." A man's offence will never be his defence: but I must first reform myself, that I may thereby help to reform my brother, and may qualify myself to reprove him. Note, Those who blame others, ought to be blameless and harmless themselves. Those who are reprovers in the gate, reprovers by office, magistrates and ministers, are concerned to walk circumspectly, and to be very regular in their conversation; an elder must have a good report, 1 Tim. 3. 2, 7. The smudgers of the sanctuary were to be of pure gold. 2. It is not every one that is fit to be reproved: Give not that which is holy unto dogs, v. 6. This be considered, either, (1.) As a reason why the disciples in preaching the gospel should not preach it to any who were wicked and profane, (Christ himself preached to publicans and sinners,) but the reference is to such as they found obstinate after the gospel was preached to them, such as blas-phemed it, and persecuted the preachers of it: let them not spend much time among such, for it would be lost labour, but let them turn to others, Acts 13. 41. So Dr. Whitby, Or, (2.) As if the Zeal of the spirit, for the glory of God, against sin, must be guided by discretion, and we must not go about to give instructions, counsels, and rebukes, much less comforts, to hardened sinners, to whom it will certainly do no good, but who will be exasperated and enraged at us. Throw a pearl to a swine, and he will resent it, as if you threw a stone at him: reproofs will be called reproaches, as they were, (Luke 11. 43. Jer. 6. 19.) therefore give not to dogs and swine, (unclean creatures) holy things. Note, [1.] Good counsel and reproach are a holy thing, and a pearl: they are ordinances of God, they are precious; as an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is the wise reprover, (Prov. 25. 12.) and a wise reprover is like an excellent oil; (Ps. 141. 5.) it is a tree of life, Prov. 3. 18. [2.] Among the generation of the wicked, there are some that are arrived at such a pitch of wickedness, that they are looked upon as dogs and swine; they are impudently and notoriously vile; they have so long walked in the way of sinners, that they are sat down in the seat of the scornful; they professedly hate and despise instruction, and set at it in defiance, that they are irrecoverably and irreclaimably wicked; they return with the dog to his vomit, and with the sow to her wallowing; (Jer. 8. 7.) and there are some that are arrived at such a pitch of hardness as to be hardened in their sin, and hardened in their wickedness, (Jer. 5. 29.) 3.] Reproofs of instruction are all bestowed upon such, and expose the reprover to all the contempt and mischief that may be expected from dogs and swine. One can expect no other than that they will trample the reproves under their feet, in scorn of them, and rage against them; for they are impatient of control and contradiction; and they will turn again and rend the reproves; rend their good words, which with their revellings, return them woundings words for their healing ones; rend them with persecution; Herod rent John Baptist for his faithfulness. See here what is the evidence of men's being dogs and swine. They are to be reckoned such, who hate reproofs and reprovers, and fly in the face of those who, in kindness to their souls, show them their sin and danger. These sin against the remonstrance; who shall not know that will not be worse dealt with, and helped? It is plain that God has determined to destroy such, 2 Chron. 25. 16. The rule here given is applicable to the distinguishing, sealing ordinances of the gospel; which must not be prostituted to those who are openly wicked and profane, lest holy things be thereby rendered contemptible, and unholy persons be thereby hardened. It is not meet to take the children's bread, and cast it to the dogs. Yet we must be very cautious whom we condemn as dogs and swine, and not do it till after trial, and upon full evidence. Many a patient is lost, by being thought to be so, who, if means had been used, might have been saved. As we must take heed of calling the good, bad, by judging all professors to be hypocrites; so we must take heed of calling the bad, despicable, by laying all the worst to the door of sinners. [4.] Our Lord Jesus is very tender of the safety of his people, and would not have them needlessly to expose themselves to the fury of those that will turn again and rend them. Let them not be righteous over much, so as to destroy themselves. Christ makes the law of self-preservation one of his own laws, and previours is the blood of his subjects to him.

7. And, it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: 8. For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened. 9. Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? 10. Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? 11. If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?

Our Saviour, in the foregoing chapter, had spoken of prayer as a commanded duty, by which God is honoured, and which, if done aright, shall be rewarded; here he speaks of it as the appointed means of obtaining what we need, especially grace to obey the precepts he had given, some of which are so displeasing to flesh and blood.

I. Here is a precept in three words to the same purport, Ask, Seek, Knock; (v. 7.) that is, in one word, "Pray; pray often, pray with sincerity and seriousness; pray, and pray again; make conscience of prayer, and be constant in it; make a business of prayer, and be earnest in it." Ask, as a beggar asks alms. They that would be rich in grace, must betake themselves to the poor trade of begging, and they shall find it a thriving trade. "Ask; represent your wants and burdens to God, and refer yourselves and your affairs to God for your support and succour, and be in the habit of prayer in all your ways. Ask, as a traveller asks the way; to pray is to inquire of God, Ezek. 36. 37. Seek, as for a thing of value that we have lost; or as the merchantman that seeks goodly pearls. Seek by prayer; (Dan. 9. 3.) Knock, as he that desires to enter into the house knocks at the door. We would be admitted to converse with God, we must be taken into his love, and favour, and kingdom; sin has shut and barred the way to us; we must knock; Lord, Lord, open to us. Christ knocks at our doors, (Rev. 3. 20. Cant. 5. 2.) and allows us to knock at his, which is a favour we do not allow to common beggars. Seeking and knocking imply something more than asking and praying. I. We must not only ask; but seek; we must second our prayers with our endeavours; we must in the use of our gifts, and means, and opportunities, and do what we may to fetch him, and to bring him to us. We may not only ask, but knock; we must come to God's door; we must knock, as a poor man, who asks for, else he is tempted God. When the dresser of the vineyard asked for a year's respite for the barren fig-tree, he added, I will dig about it, Luke 13. 7, 8. God gives knowledge and grace to those that search the scriptures, and wait at Wisdom's gates; and power against sin to those that avoid the occasions of it. 2. We must not only ask, but knock; we must come to God's door; we must ask, if we would be heard; we must ask, if we would be saved; we must ask for, else we are tempted God.

II. Here is a promise annexed: our labour in prayer, if indeed we do labour in it, shall not be in vain: where God finds a praying heart, he will be found; if prayer be heard, God will be found; he shall give them an answer of peace. The precept is threefold, ask, seek, knock; there is precept upon precept; but the promise is sixfold, line upon line, for our encouragement; because a firm belief of the promise would make us cheerful and constant in our obedience. Now here,

1. The promise is made, and made so as exactly to answer the precept, v. 7. God will meet those that attend on him: Ask, and it shall be given you; not lent you, not sold you, but given you; and what is more than free from gift? Whatever you pray for, according to the promise, whatever you ask, shall be given you, if God see it fit for you, and what would you have more? It is but ask and have; ye have not, because ye ask not, or ask not aright: what is not worth asking, is not worth having, and then it is worth nothing. Seek, and ye shall find, and then you do not lose your labour; God is himself found of those that seek him, and if we find him we have enough. Knock, and it shall be opened; the door of mercy and grace shall no longer be shut against you as enemies and intruders, but opened to you as friends and children. It will be asked, Who is at the door? Hy, a friend, or a servant ticket of the promise ready to produce in the hand of faith, doubt not of admission. If the door be not opened at the first knock, continue instant in prayer; it is an affront to a friend to knock at his door, and then go away; though he tarry, yet wait.

2. It is repeated, v. 8. It is to the same purpose, yet with some addition. (1.) It is made to extend to all that pray aright; Not only you my disciples shall receive what you ask for, but every one that asketh, receiveth, whether Jew or Gentile, young or old, rich or poor, high or low, master or servant, learned or unlearned, they are all alike welcome to the throne of grace, if they come in faith; for God is no respecter of persons. (2.) It is made so as to amount to a grant, in words of the present tense, which is more than a promise for the future. Every one that asketh receiveth, they must from faith, applying and appropriating the promise, we are actually interested and invested in the good promised; so sure and inviolable are the promises of God, that they do, in effect, give present possession; an active believer enters immediately, and makes the blessings promised his own. What we have in hope, according to the promise, is as sure, and should be as sweet, as what we have in hand. God hath spoken in his holiness, and then Gilead is mine, Manasseh is mine; (Ps. 108. 7. 8.) it is all mine own, if I can but make it so by believing it so. Conditional grants become absolute upon the performance of the condition; so here, he that asketh, receiveth. Christ hereby puts his flat to the petition; and he having all power, that is enough.

3. It is illustrated, by a similitude taken from earthly parents, and their innate readiness to give their children what they ask. Christ appeals to his hearers, What man is there of you, though never so morose and ill-humoured, whom, if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? v. 9. 10. Whence he infers, v. 11. If we then being evil, yet grant your children's requests, much more will your heavenly Father give you the good things you ask. Now this is of use.

(1.) To direct our prayers and expectations. [1.] We must come to God, as children to a Father in heaven, with reverence and confidence. How naturally does the child in want or distress run to the father with its complaints; My head, my head; thus should the new nature send us to God for supports and supplies. [2.] We must come to him for good things, for those he gives to them that ask him; which teaches us to refer ourselves to him: we know not what is good for ourselves, (Ecc. 6. 12.) but he knows what is good for us, we must therefore leave it with him; Father, thy will be done. The child is here supposed to ask bread, that is necessary, and a fish, that is wholesome; but if the child should foolishly ask for a stone, or a serpent, for unripe fruit to eat, or a sharp knife to play with, the father, though kind, is so wise as to deny him. We often ask that of God which would do us hurt if we had it; he knows it, and therefore does not give it us. The children of Pharisees, Matt. 6. 5. who had been undone ere this, if we had had all we desired; this is admirably well expressed by a heathen, Junelal, Sat. 10.

\[\text{Caritatem illius home, quam alii: nos annorum} \]
\[\text{Impetus, et cava magnificae eumiziad uerti.} \]
\[\text{Conjugium petimus, partumque uidere: at illis} \]
\[\text{Natum est, qui tum, quantunque futura sit uxor.} \]

Intrust thy fortune to the pow'rs above,
Leave them to manage for thee, and to grant
What their unerring wisdom sees thee want:
In goodness, as in greatness, they excel;
Ah, that we lov'd ourselves but half so well!
We, blindly by our headstrong passions led,
Seek a companion, and desire to wed.
Then wish as we must: but to the gods alone
Our future offspring, and our wives, are known.

(2.) To encourage our prayers and expectations. We may hope that we shall not be denied and disappointed, if all we ask have a stone for bread, break our teeth, (though we have a hard crust to employ our teeth,) nor a serfent for a fish, to sting us; we have reason indeed to fear it, because we deserve it, but God will be better to us than the desert of our sins. The world often gives stones for bread, and serfents for fish, but God never does; nay, we shall be heard and answered, for children are especially defended by their parents. [1.] God has put into the hearts of parents compassion to children, to succour and supply their children, according to their need. Even they that have had little conscience of duty, yet have done it, as it were by instinct. No law was ever thought necessary to oblige parents to maintain their legitimate children, nor, in Solomon's time, their illegitimate ones. [2.] He has assumed the relation of a Father to us, and owns us for his children; that from the readiness we find in ourselves to relieve our children, because of our desire to apply ourselves to him for relief. What love and tenderness fathers have, are from him; not from nature, but from the God of nature; and therefore they must needs be infinitely greater in himself. He compares his concern for his people to that of a father for his children, (Ps. 103. 13.) nay, to that of a mother, which is usually more tender, Isa. 66. 15.—19. 14. 15. But here it is supposed, that his love, and tenderness, and goodness, far exceed that of any earthly parent; and therefore it is argued with a much more, and it is ground upon this un doubted truth, that God is a better Father, infinitely better than any earthly parents are; his thoughts are above theirs. Our earthly fathers have taken care of us; we have taken care of our children; much more will God take care of his; for they are evil, orphans, that not yet have a stone for bread. Adam; they have lost much of the good nature that belonged to humanity, and among other corruptions, have that of crossness and unkindness in them; yet they give good things to their children, and they know how to give, suitably and seasonably; much more will God, for he takes up when they forsake. Ps. 27. 10. And, First, God is more knowing; parents are often foolishly fond, but God is wise, infinitely so; he knows what we need, and what is fit for us. Secondly, God is more kind. If all the compassions of all the tender fathers in the world were crowded into the bowls of one, yet compared with the tender mercies of our God, they would be but as a candle to the sun, or a drop to the ocean. God is more rich, and more ready, to his children, than the fathers of our flesh can be; for he is the Father of our spirits, an ever-loving, ever living Father; the heads of fathers yearn even towards undutiful children, towards prodigals, as David's toward Absalom, and will not all this seize to silence unbelief?

12. Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets. 13. Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: 14. Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life; and few there be that find it.

Our Lord Jesus here presseth upon us that righteousness toward men which is an essential branch of true religion, and that religion toward God, which is an essential branch of universal righteousness.

I. We must make righteousness our rule, and be ruled by it, v. 12. Therefore, lay this down for your principle, to do as you would be done by; therefore, that you may conform to the foregoing precepts, which are particular, that you may not judge and censure others, go by this rule in general; you would not be censured, therefore do not censure. Or, that you may have the benefit of the foregoing promises, fitly is the law of justice subjoined to the law of prayer, for unless we be honest in our conversation, God will not hear our prayers, Isa. 1. 15.—17. 38. 6, 9. Zech. 7. 9. 13. We cannot expect to receive good things from God, if we do not fair things, and that which is honest, and lovely, and of good report, among men. We must not only be devout, but honest, else our devotion is but hypocrisy. Now here we have, 1. The rule of justice laid down: Whatever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them. Christ came to teach us, not only what we are to know and believe, but what we are to do; what we are to do, not only toward God, but toward men; not only towards our fellow-disciples, those of our party and persuasion, but toward men in general, all with whom we have to do. The golden rule of equity is, to do to others, as we would they should do to us. Alexander Severus, a heathen emperor, was a great admirer of this rule, had it written upon the walls of his closet, often quoted it in giving judgement, honoured Christians and his own canons, for the sake of it. Quod tibi, hoc alteri—do to others as you would they should do to you. Take it negatively, (Quod tibi fieri non vis, ne alteri feeceris;) or positively, it comes all to the same. We must not do to others the evil they have done to us, nor the evil which they would do to us, if it were in their power; nor may we do that which we think, if it were done to us, we could bear contentedly, but what we desire should be done to us. This is grounded upon that great commandment, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. As we must bear the same affection to our neighbour, that we would have borne to ourselves, so we must do the same good offices. The meaning of this rule lies in three things. (1.) We must do to our neighbour, not much more evil than we would have been suffered; that is, much reasonable; the appeal is made to our own judgment, and the discovery of our judgment is referred to that which is our own will and expectation, when it is our own case. (2.) We must put other people upon the level with ourselves, and reckon we are as much obliged to them, as they to us. We are as much bound to the duty of justice as they, and they as much bound to be benefited as we. (3.) We must, in our dealings with men, act towards ourselves in the same particular case and circumstances with those we have to do with, and deal accordingly. If I were making such a one’s bargain, labouring under such a one’s infirmity and affliction, how would I desire and expect to be treated? And this is a just supposition, because we know not how soon their case may really be ours: indeed we may fear, lest

God by his judgments should do to us as we have done to others, if we have not done as we would be done by.

A reason given to enforce this rule: This is the law and the prophets. It is the summary of that second great commandment, which is one of the two, on which hang all the law and the prophets, ch. 22. 40. We have not this in so many words, either in the law or the prophets, but it is the concurring language of the whole. All that is there said concerning our duty towards our neighbour, (and that is no less,) may be reduced to this rule. Christ has here adopted it into this law; so that both the Old Testament, and the New, agree in prescribing this to us, to do as we would be done by. By this rule the law of Christ is commanded, but the lives of christians are enjoined by it. Aut hic non evangelium, aut in non evangelism—Either this is not the gospel, or these are not christians.
godliness; out of a state of sin into a state of grace, we must pass, by the new birth, 1 John 3. 3, 5. This is a strait gate, hard to find, and hard to get through; like a passage between two rocks, 1 Sam. 14. 4. There must be a new heart, and a new spirit, and old things must pass away. The bent of the soul must be changed, corrupt habits and customs broken off; what is left must be all one must be undone again. We must swim against the stream; much opposition must be struggled with, and broken through, from without, and from within. It is easier to set a man against all the world than against himself, and yet this must be in conversion. It is a strait gate, for we must stoop, or we cannot go in at it; we must become as little children; high thoughts must be brought down. By way, we must, deep down, put off the world, put off the old man; we must be willing to forsake all for our interest in Christ. The gate is strait to all, but to some stricter than to others; as to the rich, to some that have been long prejudiced against religion. The gate is strait; blessed be God, it is not shut up, nor locked against us, nor kept with a flaming sword, as it will be shortly, ch. 25. 10.

Secondly, That it is very narrow. We are not in heaven, as soon as we are got through the strait gate; not in Canaan as soon as we are got through the Red sea; no, we must go through a wilderness, must travel a narrow way, hedged in by the divine law, which is exceeding broad, and that makes the way narrow; self must be denied, the body kept under, corruptions mortified, that are as a right eye and a right hand; daily temptations must be resisted; duties must be done that are against our will; we must endure hardness, must wrestle and be in an agony; must watch in all things, and walk with care and circumspection; we must go through many tribulations. It is ἐξερήμων, an afflicted way, a way hedged about with thorns; blessed be God, it is not hedged up. The bodies we carry about with us, and the corruptions remaining in us, make the way of our duty difficult; but as the understanding and will grow more and more sound, it will open and enlarge, and grow more and more pleasant.

Thirdly, The gate being so strait and the way so narrow, it is not strange that there are but few that find it and choose it. Many pass it by, through carelessness; they will not be at the pains to find it; they are as well as they are, and see no need to change their way. Others look upon it; but shun it; they like it not; they find it too limited and restrained. They that are going to heaven are but few, compared to those that are going to hell; a remnant, a little flock, like the grape-tings of the vintage; as the eight that were saved in the ark, 1 Kings 20. 27. In vita alter alterum tradimus; Quomodo ad salutem reevocari potest quam nullo retrahit, et populus impellit—in the ways of wise men urge each other onward: how shall any one be restored to the path of safety, when impelled forward by the multitude, without any countering influence? Seneca, Epist. 29. This discourages many, they are loth to be singular, to be solitary; but instead of stumbling at this, say rather if so few are going to heaven, there shall be one the more for me.

[2.] Let us see what there is in this way, which, notwithstanding this, should invite us all to it; it leads to life, to present comfort in the favour of God, with all the joys that are there; to eternal life, to the hope of which at the end of our way, should reconcile us to all the difficulties and inconveniences of the road. Life and godliness are put together; (2 Pet. 1. 3.) The gate is strait and the way narrow, and up hill, but one hour in heaven will make amends for all.

2. The great concern and duty of every one of us, in consideration of all this; Enter ye in at the strait gate. The matter is fairly stated; life and death, good and evil, are set before us, both the ways, and both the ends: now let the matter be taken entire, and considered impartially, and then choose you this way which will work the matter determines itself, and will not admit of a debate. No man, in his wits, would choose to go to the gallows, because it is a smooth, pleasant way to it, nor refuse the offer of a palace and a throne, because it is a rough, dirty way to it; yet such absurdities as these are men guilty of, in the concerns of their souls. Delay not, therefore; deliberate not any longer, but enter ye in at the strait gate; knock at it by single and constant prayers and endeavours, and it shall be opened; nay, a wide door shall be opened, and an effectual one. It is true, we can neither go in, nor go on, without the assistance of divine grace; but it is as true, that grace is freely offered, and shall not be wanting to those that seek it, and submit to it. Conversion is hard work, but it is needful, and, blessed be God, it is not impossible if we strive, Luke 13. 24.

15. Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep’s clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves: Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them.

We have here a caution against false prophets, to take heed that we be not deceived and imposed upon by them. Prophets are properly such as foretell things to come; there are some mentioned in the Old Testament, who pretended to that without warrant, and the event disproved their pretensions, as Zedekiah, 1 Kings 52. 11. and another Zedekiah, Jer. 29. 22. But false prophets did then and since the days of the church, both in and out of the church, as they did in apostasy, and as they are now. Even such as are called false prophets, and are called so by good men, are not; (Rev. 2. 2.) such are false prophets. "Take heed of those who pretend to revelation, and admit them not without sufficient proof; lest that one absurdity being admitted, a thousand follow." We who preach false doctrine in that form, and adverse to that, which is contrary to the truth as it is in Jesus, to the truth which is according to godliness. The former seems to be the proper notion, of pseudoprophetas, a false or pretending prophet, but commonly the latter falls in with it; for who would hang out false colours, but with design, under pretence of them, the more successfully to attack the truth. "Well, beware of them, as it may happen that they try them, and when you have discovered their falsehood, avoid them, have nothing to do with them.
Stand upon your guard against this temptation, which commonly attends the days of reformation, and the breathings out of divine light in more than ordinary streams both high and splendid. When God's work is revived, Satan and his agents are most busy. Here is, 1. A good reason for this caution; Beware of them, for they are wolves in sheep's clothing, v. 15. 1. We have need to be very cautious, because their pretences are very fair and plausible, and such as will deceive us, if we be not upon our guard. They come in sheep's clothing, in the habit of professed publicans, and consummate, which they wear a rough garment to deceive, Zeol. 13. 4. Elijah's mantle the Septuagint calls μεταχ.—a sheep-skin mantle. We must take heed of being imposed upon by men's dress and garb, as by that of the Scribes, who desire to walk in long robes, Luke 20. 46. Or it may be taken figuratively; they pretend to be sheep, and outwardly appear so innocent, harmless, meek, useful, and all that is good, as to be excelled by none; they feign themselves to be just men, and for the sake of their clothing are admitted among the sheep, which gives them an opportunity of doing them a mischief ere they are aware. They and their errors are girded with the specious pretences of sanctity and devotion. Satan turns himself into an angel of light, 2 Cor. 11. 13, 14. 2. The enemy has horns like a lamb; (Rev. 13. 11.) for the number, Rev. 9, 7, 8. Seducers in language and carriage are soft as wool. Rom. 16. 18. Isa. 30. 10. 2. Because under these pretensions their designs are very malicious and mischievous; inwardly they are ravening wolves. Every hypocrite is a goat in sheep's clothing, but a false prophet is a wolf in sheep's clothing; not only not a sheep, but the worst creature; for that creature, but to tear and devour, to scatter the sheep, (John 10. 12.) to drive them from God, and from one another, into crooked paths. They that would cheat us of any truth, and possess us with error, whatever they pretend, design mischief to our souls. Paul calls them grievous wolves, Acts 20. 29. They raven for themselves, serve their own belly, (Rom. 16. 18.) make a prey of us, make a gain of us. New. Now since it is an easy thing, and withal so dangerous, to be cheated, Beware of false prophets. II. Here is a good rule to go by in this caution; we must prove all things; (1 Thess. 5. 21.) try the spirits; (1 John 4. 1.) and here we have a touchstone; ye shall know them by their fruits, v. 16—20. Observe, 1. The illustration of this comparison, of the fruit being the discovery of the tree. You cannot always distinguish them by their bark and leaves, nor by the spreading of their boughs, but by their fruits ye shall know them. The fruit is according to the tree. Men may, in their professions, put a force upon their nature, and contradict their inward principles, but the stream and bent of their practices will agree with them. Christ insists upon this, the agreeableness of outward expression to inward affections. For as that, (1.) If you know what the tree is, you may know what fruit to expect. Never look to gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles; it is not in their nature to produce such fruits. An apple may be stuck, or a bunch of grapes may hang, upon a thorn; so may a good truth, a good word or action, be found in an ill man, but you may be sure it never grew there. Nor, (2.) If these be true, that certified hearts are like thorns and thistles, which came in with sin, are worthless, vexing, and for the fire at last. [2.] Good works are good fruit, like grapes and figs, pleasing to God and profitable to men. [3.] This good fruit is never to be expected from bad men, any more than a clean thing out of an unclean: they want an influencing, acceptable principle: out of an evil treasure will be brought forth evil things. (2.) On the other hand, if you know what the fruit is, you may, by that, perceive what the tree is. If you know the fruit of figs, you may know the tree; if the fruit of grapes, you may know the tree; if a corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit; nay, it cannot but bring forth evil fruit; but then that must be reckoned the fruit of the tree, which it brings forth naturally, and which is its genuine product, and which it brings forth plentifully and constantly, and is its usual product. Men are known, not by their seditious, profane, unholy, and defaming words, and the frequent practice of such, but by their regular and constant use, and the frequent practice of the frequent frequent practice, especially those that appear to be free, and most their own, and least under the influence of external motives and inducements. 2. The application of this to the false prophets. (1.) By way of terror and threatening; (v. 19.) every tree that brings not forth good fruit is hewn down. The very saying John the Baptist had used, ch. 3. 10. Christ could have spoken the same sense in other words; could have altered it, or given it a new turn; but he thought it no disparagement to him to say the same that John had said before him: let not ministers be ambitious of coming new expressions, nor people's ears itch for novelties; to write and speak the same things must not be grievous, for it is safe. Here is, [1.] The description of barren trees, and of their ordinary fruits, which they are, for fruit; figs: though there be fruit, if it be not good fruit, though that be done, which for the matter of it is good, if it be not done well, in a right manner, and for a right end, the tree is accounted barren. [2.] The doom of barren trees; they are, that is, certainly they shall be, hewn down, and cast into the fire: God will deal with them as men use to deal with dry trees that cumber the ground: he will mark them by some signal tokens of his displeasure; he will bar them by stripping them of their parts and gifts, will cut them down by death, and cast them into the fire of hell, a fire blown with the bellows of God's wrath, and fed with the wood of barren trees. Compare this with Ezek. 31. 12, 13. Dan. 4. 14. John 15. 6. 2. By way of trial; by their fruits ye shall know them. [1.] By the fruits of their persons, their words and actions, and the course of their conversation. If you would know whether they be right or not, observe how they live; their works will testify for them or against them. The Scribes and Pharisees sat in Moses's chair, and taught the law, but they were proud, and covetous, and false, and oppressive, and therefore Christ warned his disciples to beware of them and of their leaven, Mark 12. 38. If men pretend to be prophets and are immoral, that disapproves their pretensions; they are no true friends to the cross of Christ, whatever they profess, whose God is their belly, and who mind earthly things, Phil. 3. 18, 19. They are not taught nor sent of the holy God, whose lives evidence that they are led by the unclean spirit. God puts the treasure into earth men's hands, to bless not rich men, but men of God. It will tend to promote serious piety, humility, charity, holiness, and love, with other Christian graces; but if, on the contrary, the doctrines these prophets preach have a manifest tendency to make people proud, worldly, and contentious, to make them loose and careless in their conversations, unjust or uncharitable, factious or disturbers of the public peace; if it indulge carnal liberty, and take people off from governing themselves and their families by the strict rules of the narrow way, we may conclude, that this persuasion comes not of him that calleth us, Gal. 5. 8. This wisdom is not from above, James 3. 15. Faith and a good conscience are held together, 1 Tim. 1. 19.—3. 9. Note, Doctrines of doubtful disputation must be tried by graces and duties of confessed certainty: those opinions come not from God that lead; sin: but if we cannot know them by their fruits, we must have recourse to the great touchstone, to the law, and to the testimony: do they speak according to that rule?

21. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. 22. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord; have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? 23. And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity. 24. Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock: 25. And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock: 26. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand: 27. And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it. 28. And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine: 29. For he taught them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes.

We have here the conclusion of this long and excellent sermon, the scope of which is to show the indispensable necessity of obedience to the commands of Christ; this is designed to clench the nail, that it might fix in a sure place: he speaks this to his disciples that sat at his feet, wherever he preached, and followed him wherever he went. Had he sought his own praise among men, he would have said, that was enough; but the religion he came to establish, is in power, not in word only, (1 Cor. 4. 20.) and therefore something more is necessary.

I. He shows, by a plain remonstrance, that an outward profession of religion, however remarkable, will not bring us to heaven, unless there be a correspondent conversation, v. 21—23. All judgment is committed to our Lord Jesus: the keys are put into his hand; he has power to prescribe new terms of life and death, and to judge men according to them: now this is a solemn declaration pursuant to that power. Observe here, 1. Christ's law laid down, v. 21. Not every one that saith, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, into the kingdom of grace and glory. It is an answer to that question, Psal. 15. 1. Who shall sojourn in thy tabernacle?—the church militant, and who shall dwell in thy holy hill?—the church triumphant.

Christ here shows, (1.) That it will not suffice to say, Lord, Lord; in word and tongue to own Christ for our Master, and to make addresses to him, and professions of him accordingly; in prayer to God, in discourse with men, we must call Christ, Lord, Lord; we say well, for so he is; (John 13. 13.) but can we imagine that by such shows, that piece of formality as this should be so recom- pensed, or that he who knows and requires the heart, should be so put off with shows for substance? Compliments among men are pieces of civility that are returned with compliments, but they are never paid as real services; and can they then be of any account with Christ? There may be a seeming im- portunity in prayer, Lord, Lord; such as it is, is answerable to outward expressions, we are but as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. This is not to take us off from saying, Lord, Lord; from praying, and being earnest in prayer, from professing Christ's name, and being bold in professing it, but from resting in these, in the form of godliness, without the power.

(2.) That it is necessary to our happiness that we do both. He who says, Lord, Lord, but doth not the will of his Father in heaven. The will of God, as Christ's Father, is his will in the gospel, for there he is made known, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ: and in him our Father. Now this is his will, that we believe in Christ, that we repent of sin, that we live a holy life, that we love one another. This is his will, even our sanctification. If we comply not with the will of God, we mock Christ in calling him Lord, as other did, who put on him a gorgeous robe, and said, Hail, King of the Jews. Saying and doing are two things, often parted in the conversation of men: he that said, I go, sir, stirred never a step; (ch. 21. 30.) but these two things God has joined in his command, and let no man that puts them asunder think to enter into the kingdom of heaven.

2. The hypocrite's plea against the strictness of this law, offering other things in lieu of obedience, v. 22. The plea is supposed to be in that day, that great day, when every man shall appear in his own colours; when the secrets of all hearts shall be mani- fest, and among the rest, the secret pretences with which sinners now support their vain hopes. Christ knows the strength of their cause, and it is but weakness: what they now harbour in their bosoms, they will then produce in arrest of judgment to stay the doom, but it will be in vain. They put their hope with great importunity, Lord, Lord; and yet with great confidence, appealing to Christ concerning it; Lord, dost thou know, (1.) That we have prophesied in thy name? Yes, it may be so, Balaam and Caiaphas were overruled to prophesy, and Saul was against his will among the prophets, yet that did not save them. These prophesied in his name, but he did not send them: they only made use of his name to serve a turn. Note, A man may be a preacher, no have the name for the ministry, and an external call to it, and perhaps some success in it, and yet be a wicked man; may help others to heaven, and yet come short himself. (2.) That in thy name we have cast out devils? That may be so; Judas cast out devils, and yet a son of perdition. Origen says, that in his time so prevalent was the name of Christ to cast out devils, that sometimes it availed when named by wicked Christians. A man may seek the help of others, and in their name cry, Hail, devil, nay, and be a devil himself. (3.) That in thy name we have done many wonderful works. There may be a faith of miracles, where there is no justifying faith; none of that faith which works by love and obedience. Gifts of tongues and healing would recommend men to the world, but it is only real holiness and sanctification that is accepted of God. Grace and love are a more excellent way than removing mountains, or speaking with the tongues of men and angels, 1 Cor. 13. 1, 2. Grace will bring a man to heaven without working miracles, but working miracles will never bring a man to heaven without grace. Observe, the heart of prophet was used in doing these works, and which they confided in, was the wonderfulness of them. Simon Magus wondered at the miracles, (Acts 8. 13.) and therefore would give any money for power to do the like. Observe, They had not many good works to plead: they could not pretend to have done many gracious works of piety and charity; one such would have been a better specimen of the multitude of wondrous works, which availed not at all, while they persisted in disobedience. Miracles have now ceased, and with them this plea; but do not carnal hearts still encourage themselves in their groundless hopes, with the like vain supports? They think they shall go to heaven, because they have been of good repute among professors of religion, have kept fasts and given alms, and have been pres- fered of the people, and have been regarded with reigning pride, worldliness and sensuality, and want of love to God and man. Bethel is their confidence, (Jer. 48. 13.) they are haughty because of the holy mountain; (Zeph. 3. 11.) and boast that they are the temple of the Lord, Jer. 7. 4. Let us take heed of resting in external privileges and performances, lest we deceive ourselves, and perish eternally as multitudes do. Why lies the life of the wicked, he re- fects them and their plea—because they were work- ers of iniquity. Note, It is possible for men to have a great name for piety, and yet to be workers of iniquity; and those that are so will receive the greater damnation. Secret haunts of sin, kept up under the cloak of a visible profession, will be the ruin of hy- pocrites. Living in known sin nullifies men's pre- tensions, be they ever so specious. (2.) How it is exchangeable to be wiser than he that is wise, (5.) and haughtier than he that is haughty, (14.) than he who commands us, as our servants, no, not when you prophesied in my name, when you were in the height of your profes- sion, and were most extolled. This intimates, that if he had ever known them, as the Lord knew them that are his, had ever owned them and loved them as his, he would have known them, and owned them, and loved them, to the end: but he never did know them, for he always knew them to be hypocrites, and revetted at heart, as he did Judas, therefore, shall he, depart from me. Has Christ need of such guests? When he came in the flesh, he called sin- ners to him, (ch. 9. 13.) but when he shall come again in glory, he will drive sinners from him. They that would not come to him to be saved, must depart from him to be damned. To depart from Christ is the very hell of hell; it is the foundation of all the misery of the damned, to be cut off from all hope of benefit from Christ and his mediation. Those that go no further in Christ's service than a bare profes- sion, he does not accept, nor will he own them in the great day. See from what a height of hope men may fall into the depth of misery! How they may go to hell, by the gates of heaven! This should be an awakening word to all christians. If a preacher, one of God's chosen, be publicly disowned by Christ for working iniquity; what will become of us, if we be found such? And if we be such, we shall certainly be found such. At God's bar, a profession of religion will not bear out any man in the practice and indulgence of sin; there fore let every one that names the name of Christ, depart from all iniquity.

II. He shows, by a parable, that hearing these sayings of Christ will not make us happy, if we do not put them into practice. Observe, 1. The hearers of Christ's word are here divided into two sorts; some that hear, and do what they hear; others that hear, and do not. Christ preach- ed now to a mixed multitude, and he thus separates them one from the other, as he will at the great day, when all who have heard shall be gathered before him. Christ is still speaking from heaven, and the holy word of God speaks by ministers, by providences, and of those that hear him there are two sorts.

1. Some that hear his sayings and do them: blessed be God that there are any such, though comparatively few. To hear Christ, is not barely to give him the hearing, but to obey him. Note, It highly concerns us all to do what we hear of the say- ings of Christ. There is no more evidence that we believe his sayings, Blessed are these ears, ch. 13. 16, 17. But if we practise not what we hear we receive that grace in vain. To do Christ's sayings is conscientiously to abstain from the sins that he forbids, and to perform the duties that he requires. Our thoughts and affec- tions, our words and actions, the temper of our minds, and the tenor of our lives, must be conformable to Christ's sayings, and he that is the doer of his sayings, thereby doth require.

2. Those who only hear, and do not, are not his. The sayings of Christ are the direct manner in which he has enacted, but the truths he has revealed, must be done by us. They are a light, not only to our eyes, but to our feet, and are designed not only to inform our judgments, but to reform our hearts and lives; nor do we indeed believe them, if we do not live up to them. Observe, It is not enough to hear Christ's sayings, or Christ that is the doer of his say- ings, but it is not enough to hear them, and no more. We must hear, and understand them, hear them, and remember them, and hear them, and think of them, repeat them, dispute for them; but we must hear, and do them. This do and thou shalt live. Those only that hear, and do, are blessed, (Luke 11. 28.) John 13. 17.) and are akin to Christ, ch. 12. 50.

2. There are others who hear Christ's sayings and do them not; their religion rests in bare hear- ing, and goes no further; like children that have heard stories and read fables. They are full of mere notions, and indigested opinions, but their joints are weak, and they heavy and listless; they neither can stir, nor care to stir, in any good duty; they hear God's words, as if they desired to know his ways, like a people that did righteousness, but they will not do it. Ezek. 33. 30, 31. Isa. 58. 2. Thus they deceive themselves, as Micah, who thought himself happy, because he had a Levite to be his priest, though he had not the Lord to be his God. The seed is sown, but it never comes up; they see their spots in the glass of the word, but wash them not off, Jam. 1. 22, 24. Thus they put a cheat upon their own souls; for it is certain, if our hearing be not the means of our obedience, it will be the aggravation of our disobedience. Those who only hear Christ's sayings, and do them not, sit down in the midway to heaven, and that will never bring them to God's journey's end. They are akin to Christ only by the half-blood, and our law allows not such to inherit. 2. Two sorts of hearers are here represented in their true characters, and the state of their case, under the comparison of two builders; one was wise, and built upon a rock, and his building stood in a storm; the other foolish, and built upon the same foundation, and his building was taken in a

Now, (1.) The general scope of this parable teaches us that the only way to make sure work for our souls and eternity is, to hear and do the sayings of the Lord Jesus; these sayings of his in this sermon upon the mount, which is wholly practical; some of them seem hard sayings to flesh and blood, but they must be done; and thus we lay up in store a good foundation for the time to come; (1 Tim. 6. 19.) a good bond, so some read it; a bond of God's making, which secures salvation upon gospel-terms, that is a good bond; not one of our own devising, which brings salvation to our own fancies. They make sure the good part, who, like Mary, when they hear the word of Christ, sit at his feet in subjection to it: Speak, Lord, thy servant hears. (2.) The particular parts of it teach us divers good lessons.

[1.] That we have every one of us a house to build, and that house is our hope for heaven. It ought to be our chief and constant care, to make our calling and election sure, and see that we may get to heaven, and have the comfortable evidence of it; to make it sure, and sure to ourselves, that when we fail, we shall be received into everlasting habitations. Many never mind this, it is the farthest thing from their thoughts; they are building for this world, as if they were to be here always, but take no care to build for another world. All who take upon them a profession of religion, profess to inquire, what there is in them; and if it be secure, then, that they may get to heaven at last, and may have a well-grounded hope of it in the mean time.

[2.] That there is a rock provided for us to build this house upon, and that rock is Christ. He is laid for a Foundation, and other foundation can no man lay, Isa. 28. 16. 1 Cor. 3. 11. He is our hope, 1 Tim. 1. 1. Christ in us is so; we must ground our hopes of heaven upon the fulness of Christ's merit, for the pardon of sin, the power of his Spirit, for the sanctification of our nature, and the prevalency of his intercession, for the conveyance of all that good which he has purchased for us. There is that in him, as he is made known, and made over, to us in the gospel, which is sufficient to redress all our grievances, and to answer all the necessities of our case, so that he is a Saviour to the utmost. The church is built upon this Rock, and so is every believer. He is strong and immoveable as a rock; we may venture our all upon him, and shall not be made ashamed of our hope.

[3.] That there is a remnant, who by hearing and doing the sayings of Christ, build their hopes upon this Rock; and it is their wisdom. Christ is our only Way to the Father, and the obedience of faith is our only way to Christ; for to them that obey him, and to them only, he becomes the Author of eternal salvation. Those build upon Christ, who, having sincerely consented to him, as their Prince and Saviour, make it their constant care to conform to all the rules of his holy religion, and therein depend entirely upon him for assistance from God, and acceptance with him, and count every thing but loss and dung that they may win Christ, and be found in him. Building upon a rock requires care and pains; they that would make sure of salvation sure, must give diligence. They are wise builders who begin to build so, as they may be able to finish, (Luke 14. 30.) and therefore lay a firm foundation.

[4.] That there are many who profess that they hope to go to heaven, but despise this Rock, and build their hopes upon the sand; which is done without much pains, but it is their folly. Every thing besides Christ is sand. Some build their hopes upon their worldly prosperity, as if that were a sure token of God's favour, Hos. 12. 8. Others upon their external profession of religion, the privileges they enjoy, and the performances they go through in that profession, and the reputation they have got by it. They are called christians, were baptized, go to church, hear Christ's word, say their prayers, and do nobody any harm, and, if they perish, God help a great many. This is the light of their own fire, which they walk in; this is that, upon which, with a great deal of assurance, they venture; but it is all sand, too weak to bear such a fabric as our hopes of heaven.

[5.] That there is a storm coming, that will try whether our hopes are bound on will try every man's work; (1 Cor. 3. 13.) will discover the foundation, Hab. 3. 13. Rain, and floods, and wind, will beat upon the house; the trial is sometimes in this world; when tribulation and persecution arise because of the word, then it will be seen, who only heard the word, and who heard and practised it; then when we have occasion to use our hopes, it will be then whether they were right, and well grounded, or not. However, when death and judgment come, then the storm comes, and it will undoubtedly come, how calm soever things may be with us now. Then every thing else will fail us but these hopes, and then, if ever, they will be turned into everlasting fruition.

[6.] That these hopes which are built upon Christ, the Rock, shall stand, and will stand the proof of the time; when the storm comes; they will be his preservation, both from desertion, and from prevailing disquiet. His profession will not wither; his comforts will not fail; they will be his strength and song, as an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast. When he comes to the last encounter, those hopes will take off the terror of death and the grave; will carry him cheerfully through that dark valley; will be approved by the Judge; will stand the test of the great day; and will be crowned with endless glory, 2 Cor. 1. 12. 2 Tim. 4. 7, 8. Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord, when he comes, finds so doing, so hoping.

[7.] That those hopes which foolish builders ground upon any thing but Christ, will certainly fail them in a stormy day; will yield them no true comfort and satisfaction in trouble, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment; will be no fence against temptations to apostasy, in a time of persecution. When God takes away the soul, where is the hope of the hypocrite? Job 27. 8. It is as the spider's web, and as the giving up of the ghost. He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand, Job 8. 14. 15. It fell in the storm, when the builder had most need of it, and expected it would be a shelter to him. It fell when it was too late to build another; when a wicked man dies, his iniquity shall pursue him; when he thought it would have been turned into fruitation, it fell, and great was the fall of it. It was a great disappointment to the builder; the shame and loss were great. The higher men's hopes have been raised, the lower they fall. It is the sorest ruin of all that attends formal professors; witness Capernaum's doom.

III. In the two last verses, we are told what impressions Christ's discourse made upon the auditory. It made an impression on his disciples, and it is probable that he said more than is here recorded; and doubtless the delivery of it from the mouth of him, into whose lips grace was poured, did mightily set it off. Now, 1. They were astonished at his doctrine; it is to be feared that few of them were brought to follow him; but for the present, they were filled with wonder. Note, It is possible for people to admire good preaching, and yet to remain in ignorance of the power of it; to be affected with a sermon, yet be sanctified. 2. The reason was because he taught them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes. The Scribes pretended to as much authority as any teachers whatsoever, and were supported by all the external advantages that could be obtained, but their preaching was mean, and flat, and jejune; they spake as those that were not themselves masters of what they preached: the word did not come from them with any life or force; they delivered it as a school-boy says his lesson; but Christ delivered his discourse, as a judge gives his charge. He did indeed, dominion in connection—deliver his discourse with a tone of authority; his lesson, and his words, were words of Christ; upon the mountain, shown more true authority, than the Scribes in Moses's seat. Thus when Christ teaches by his Spirit in the soul, he teaches with authority. He says, Let there be light, and there is light.

CHAP. VIII.

The evangelist having in the foregoing chapters, given us a specimen of our Lord's preaching, proceeds now to give some instances of the miracles he wrought, which gain him a teacher come from God, and the great Healer of a diseased world. In this chapter we have, I. Christ's cleansing of a leper, v. 1—4. II. His curing a palsied man, v. 5—18. III. His commending two that were disposed to follow him, v. 19—22. IV. His controlling the tempest, v. 23—27. V. His casting out devils, v. 28—34.

1. WHEN he was come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him. 2. And, behold, there came a leper and worshipped him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. 3. And Jesus put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean: And immediately his leprosy was cleansed. 4. And Jesus saith unto him, See thou tell no man; but go thy way, show thyself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded for a testimony unto them.

The first verse refers to the close of the foregoing sermon: the people that heard him were astonished at his doctrine; and the effect was, that when he came down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him; though he was so strict a Lawgiver, and so faithful a Reformer, they diligently attended him, and were leath to disperse, and go from him. Note, They to whom Christ has manifested himself, cannot but desire to be more acquainted with him. They who know much of Christ should covet to know more; and then shall we know, if we thus follow on to know the Lord. It is pleasing to see people so well affected to Christ, as to think they can never hear enough of him; so well affected to the best things, as thus to flock after good preaching, and to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. Now was Jacob's prophecy concerning the Messiah fulfilled, that shall the God be; yet they who gathered to him did not cleave to him. They who followed him closely and constantly were but few, compared with the multitudes that were but followers at large.

In these verses we have an account of Christ's cleansing a leper. It should seem by comparing Mark 1. 40, and Luke 5. 12, that this passage, though placed, by St. Mark, after the discourse on the mount, because he would give account of his doctrines first, and then of his miracles, happened some time before; but that is not at all material. This is fitly recorded with the first of Christ's miracles. 1. Because the leprosy was looked upon, among the Jews, as a particular mark of God's displeasure: hence we find Miriam, Gehazi, and Uzziah, smitten with leprosy for one particular sin; and therefore Christ, to show that he came to turn away the wrath of God, by taking away sin, began with the cure of a leper. 2. Because this disease, as it was supposed to come immediately from the hand of God, so also it was supposed to be removed immediately by his hand, and therefore it was not attempted to be cured by physicians, but was put under the inspection of the priests, the Lord's ministers, who waited to see what God would do. And it is a common way, in the walls of a house, was altogether supernatural; and it should seem to be a disease of a quite different nature from what we now call the leprosy. The king of Israel said, Am I God, that I am sent to, to recover a man of a leprosy? 2 Kings 5. 7. Christ proved himself God, by recovering many from the leprosy, and authorizing his disciples, in his name, to do so too, (ch. 10. 7.) and it is put among the powers of the Messiah's reign. Matt. 11. 5. He also showed himself to be the Saviour of his people from their sins; for though every disease is both the fruit of sin, and a figure of it, as the disorder of the soul, yet the leprosy was in a special manner so; for it contracted such a pollution, and obliged to such a separation from holy things, as no other disease did; and therefore in the laws concerning it, (Lev. 13. and 14.) it is distinguished from other diseases, as a sicknessiness; the priest was to pronounce the party clean or unclean, according to the indications; but the honour of making the lepers clean was reserved for Christ, who was to do it as the High-Priest of our profession: he comes to do that which the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, Rom. 8. 3. The law discovered sin, (for by the law is the knowledge of sin,) and promised the pardon of it to him that believed (Gal. 3. 23.) as the priest did the leper, but could go no further; it could not make the comers therein perfect. But Christ takes away sin, cleanses us from it, and so perfecteth for them that are sanctified. Now here we have, I. The leper's address to Christ. If this happened, as it is here placed, after the sermon on the mount, we may suppose that the leper, though cured of his disease, it cut by his disease from the cities of Israel, yet got within hearing of Christ's sermon, and was encouraged by it, to make his application to him; for he that taught as one having authority, could heal so; and therefore he came and worshipped him, as one clothed with a divine power. His address is, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. The cleansing of him may be considered, 1. As a temporal mercy, to the body, delivered from a disease, which, though it did not threaten life, imbeddered it. And so it directs us, not only to apply ourselves to Christ, who has power over bodily diseases, for the cure of them, but it also teaches us in what manner to apply ourselves to him; with an assurance of his power, believing that he is as able to cure diseases now, as he was when on earth, but with a submission to his will: Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst, and therefore, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. 2. As a typical mercy. Sin is the leprosy of the soul; it shuts us out from communion with God; to which that we may be restored, it is necessary that we be cleansed from this leprosy, and this ought to be our great concern. Now observe, It is our comfort when we apply ourselves to Christ, as the great Physician, that if he will, he can take sin out of his heart, and we should, with an humble, believing boldness, go to him and tell him so. That is, (1.) We must rest ourselves upon his power; we must be confident of this, that Christ can make us clean. No guilt is so great but that there is a sufficiency in his righteousness to atone for it; no corruption so strong, but there is a sufficiency in his grace to subdue it. God would not appear a physician in his hospital that is not for more—every man qualified for the undertaking. (3.) We must recommend ourselves to his pity; we cannot demand it as a debt, but we must humbly request it as a favour; "Lord, if thou wilt, I throw myself at thy feet, and if I perish, I will perish there."

II. Christ's answer to this address, which was very kind.

1. He put forth his hand and touched him. The leprosy was a noisome, loathsome disease, yet Christ touched him; for he did not disdain to converse with publicans and sinners, to do them good. There was a ceremonial pollution contracted by the touch of a leper; but Christ would show, that when he conversed with sinners, he was in no danger of being infected from them, the presence of the world had nothing in him. If we touch pitch, we are defiled; but Christ was separate from sinners, even when he lived among them.

2. He said, I will, be thou clean. He did not say as Elisha to Naaman, Go, wash in Jordan; did not put him upon a tedious, troublesome, chargeable course of physic, but spake the word and healed him. (1.) Here is a word of kindness, I will. I am as able to help thee, as thou art to be helped. Note, They who by faith apply themselves to Christ for mercy and grace, may be sure that he is willing, freely willing, to give them the mercy and grace they come to him for. Christ is a Physician, that does not need to be sought for, he is always in the way; does not need to be urged, while we are yet speaking he hears; does not need to be fed, he heals freely, not for price or reward. He has given all power to him, that he may work, the same as he is able to save sinners. (2.) A word of power, Be thou clean. Both a word of authority, and a power of energy, are exerted in this word. Christ heals by a word of command to us; Be thou clean; "Be willing to be clean, and use the means; cleanse thyself from all filthiness?" but there goes along with this a word of command concerning us, a word that doth the work, I will that thou be clean. Such a word as this is necessary to the moral; it is a means, a condition; it is necessary for it; and the almighty grace which speaks it, shall not be wanting to those that truly desire it.

III. The happy change hereby wrought. Immediately his leprosy was cleansed. Nature works gradually, but the God of nature works immediately; he speaks, it is done: and yet he works effectually; he commands, and it stands fast. One of the first miracles Moses wrought was of leprosy. "Thou shalt not suffer a leper" (Exod. 23. 25.) for the priests under the law offered sacrifice first for their own sin, but one of Christ's first miracles was curing another of leprosy, for he had no sin of his own to atone for.

IV. The after-directions Christ gave him. It was fit that they who are cured by Christ should ever after be ruled by him.

1. See thou tell no man; "Tell no man till thou hast showed thyself to the priest, and he has pronounced thee clean; and so thou hast a legal proof, both that thou wast before a leper, and art now thoroughly cleansed." Christ would have his miracles to appear in their full light and evidence, and not to be published till they could appear so. Note, They that preach the truths of Christ should be able to prove them; to defend what they preach, and convince gainsayers. "Tell no man, till that thou hast showed thyself to the priest, lest if he hear who cured thee, he should out of spite deny to give thee a certificate of the cure, and so keep thee under confinement." Such were the priests in Christ's time, that they who had any thing to do with them had need to have been as wise as serpents.

2. Go show thyself to the priest, according to the law, Lev. 14. 2. Christ took care to have the law observed, lest he should give offence, and to show that he will have order kept up, and good discipline and respect paid to those that are in office. It may be of use to those that are cleansed of their spiritual leprosy, to have recourse to Christ's ministers, and to open their case to them, that they may assist them in their inquiries into their spiritual state, and advise, and comfort, and pray for them.

3. Offer the gift that Moses commanded, in token of thankfulness to God, and recompense to the priest for his pains; and this for a testimony unto them; either, (1.) Which Moses commanded for a testimony: the ceremonial laws were testimonies of God's authority over them, care of them, and the grace which should afterwards be revealed. Or, (2.) "Do thou offer it for a testimony, and let the priest know who cleansed thee, and how; and it shall be a testimony, that there is one among them, who does that which the high-priest cannot do. Let it remain upon record as a witness of my power, and a testimony for me to them, if they will use it and improve it; but against them, if they will not." for so Christ's word and works are testimonies.

5. And when Jesus was entered into Capernaum, there came unto him a centurion, beseeching him, 6. And saying, Lord, my servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, grievously tormented. 7. And Jesus saith unto him, I will come and heal him. 8. The centurion answered and said, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof: but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed. 9. For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me: and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. 10. When Jesus heard it, he marvelled, and said to them that followed, Verily I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. 11. And I say unto you, that many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven: 12. But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. 13. And Jesus said unto the centurion, Go thy way: and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. And his servant was healed in the selfsame hour.

We have here an account of Christ's curing the centurion's servant of a palsy. This was done at Capernaum, where Christ now dwelt, ch. 4. 13. Christ went about doing good, and came home to do good too; every place he came to was the better for him. The persons Christ had now to do with were:

1. A centurion; he was a supplicant, a Gentile, a Roman, an officer of the army; probably commander in chief of that part of the Roman army which was quartered at Capernaum, and kept garrison there. (1.) Though he was a soldier, (and a little piety commonly goes a great way with men of that profession; yet he was a godly man; he was eminently so. Note, God has his remnant among all sorts of people. No man's calling or place in the world will be an excuse for his unbelief and impiety; none shall say in the great day, I had been religious, and I was the best thing among a bad set of men. Three things are among the reasons of the Lord. And sometimes where grace conquers the unlikelihood, it is more than a conqueror; this soldier that was good, was very good. (2.) Though he was a Roman soldier, and his very dwelling among the Jews was a badge of their subjection to the Roman yoke, yet Christ, who was King of the Jews, favoured him; and therein it is to be observed we may not needlessly to interest ourselves in national enmities. (3.) Though he was a Gentile, yet Christ countenanced him. It is true, he went not to any of the Gentile towns, (it was the land of Canaan that was Immanuel's land, Isa. 8. 8.) yet he received addresses from Gentiles; now good old Simeon's word began to be fulfilled, that he should be a light to lighten to the Gentiles, as well as the glory of his people Israel. Matthew, in annexing this cure to that of the leper, who was a Jew, intimates this; the leprous Jews Christ touched and cured, for he preached personally to them; but the paralytic Gentiles he cured at a distance; for to them he did not go in person, but sent his word and healed them; yet in them he was more magnified.

2. The centurion's servant; he was the patient. In this also it appears, that there is no respect of persons with God; for in Christ Jesus, as there is neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, so there is neither bond nor free. He is as ready to heal the poorest servant, as the richest master; for himself took upon him the form of a servant, to show his regard to the meanest.

Now in the story of the cure of this servant, we may observe an interchange of graces, very remarkable between Christ and the centurion. See here,

I. The grace of the centurion working towards Christ. Can any good thing come out of a Roman soldier? any thing tolerable, much less any thing laudable? Come and see, and you will find abundance of good coming out of this centurion that was eminently bad and exemplary. Observe, our enemies redress our affections. (1.) His affectionate address to Jesus Christ, which speaks.

(1.) A pious regard to our great Master, as one able and willing to succour and relieve poor petitioners. He came to him beseeching him, not as Naaman the Syrian (a centurion too,) came to Eli- sha, demanding a cure, taking state and standing upon points of honour; but with cap in hand, as an humble sufferer. By this it seems, that he saw more in Christ than appeared at first view; saw that which commanded respect, though to those who looked no further, his visage was marred more than any man's. The officers of the army being controllers of the town, no doubt made a great figure, yet he lays by the thoughts of his post of honour, when he presses himself to Christ, and comes beseeching him. Note, the greatest of men must turn beggars, when they have to do with Christ. He owns Christ's sovereignty, in calling him Lord, and referring the case to him, and to his will, and wisdom, by a modest remonstrance, without any formal and express petition. He knew he had to do with a wise and gracious physician, to whom the opening of the eyes and the cure of the palsy, was as a matter of course. The centurion's request. A humble confession of our spiritual wants and diseases shall not fail of an answer of peace. Pour out thy complaint, and mercy shall be poured out.

(2.) A charitable regard to his poor servant. We read of many that came to Christ for their children, but this is the only instance of one that came to him for a servant: Lord, my servant lies at home sick. Note, It is the duty of masters to concern themselves for their servants, when they are in affliction.—The palsy disabled the servant for his work, and made him useless to his master. The officer, in his turn, was much more disabled, he could not even take care of himself, yet he did not turn him away when he was sick, (as that Amalekite did his servant, 1 Sam. 30. 13.) did not send him to his friends, nor let him lie by neglected, but sought out the best relief he could for him; the servant could not have done more for the master, than the master did here for the servant. The centurion's servants were very dutiful to him, (2.) and being very indifferent to himself; he was very kind to them, and that made them the more cheerfully obedient to him. As we must not despise the cause of our servants, when they contend with us, (Job 31. 13. 15.) so we must not despise their case when God contends with them; for we are made in the same mould, by the same hand, and stand upon the same level with them before God, and must not set them with the dogs of our flock. The centurion applies not to witches or wizards for his servant, but to Christ. The palsy is a disease in which the physician's skill commonly fails; it was therefore a great evidence of his faith in the power of Christ, to come to him for a cure, which was above the power of natural means to effect. Observe, how pathetically he represents his servant's case as very sad; he is sick of the palsy, (It was not paralysis simplex, but scorbutica.) We should thus concern ourselves for the souls of our children, and servants, that are spiritually sick of the palsy, the dead-palsy, that is, he is sick of that spiritual palsy which commonly makes the patient senseless of pain, but this person was grievously tormented; being young, nature was strong to struggle with the stroke, which made it painful. (It was not paralysis simplex, but scorbutica.) We should thus concern ourselves for the souls of our children, and servants, that are spiritually sick of the palsy, the dead-palsy, that is, he is sick of the palsy, which is spiritual insensibility, in that which is spiritually good; and bring them to Christ by faith and prayer, bring them to the means of healing and health.

2. Observe his great humility and self-abasement. After Christ had intimated his readiness to come and heal his servant, (v. 7.) he expressed himself with the more humbleness of mind. Note, Humble souls are made more humble, by Christ's gracious concerns and dealings with them. Observe the language of his humility; Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof; (v. 8.) which speaks mean thoughts of himself, and high thoughts of our Lord Jesus. He does not say, "My servant is not worthy that thou shouldst come into his chamber, because it is in the garret?" but, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come into my house. The centurion was a great man, yet he owned his unworthiness before God. Note, Humility very well becomes persons of quality. Christ now made but a mean figure in the world, yet the centurion, looking upon him as a prophet, yea, more than a prophet, paid him this respect. Note, We should have a value and veneration for what we see of God, even in those who, in outward condition, are every way our inferiors, if we regard them as in Christ with a petition, and therefore expressed himself thus humbly. Note, In all our approaches to Christ, and to God through Christ, it becomes us to abase ourselves, and to lie low in a sense of our own unworthiness, as mean creatures and as vile sinners, to do any thing for God, to receive any good from him, or to have any thing to do with him. Observe, the more we come in faith. The more humility, the more faith; the more diffident we are of ourselves, the stronger will be our confidence in Jesus Christ. He had an assurance of faith not only that Christ could cure his servant, but, needed not any physical contact, as in natural operations, nor any application to the part affected; but the cure, he believed, might be wrought, without bringing the physician and patient together. We read afterwards of those, who brought him sick unto him of their faith, and he believed, and set him before him, and Christ commended their faith for a working faith. This centurion did not bring his man sick of the palsy, and Christ commend- ed his faith for a trusting faith: true faith is accept ed of Christ, though variously appearing: Christ puts the best construction upon the different methods of religion that people take, and thereby has taught us to be so too. This centurion believed, and it is undoubtedly true, that the power of Christ knows no limits, and therefore nearness and distance are alike to him. Distance of place cannot obstruct either the knowing, or working, of him that fills all places."—Am I a God at hand, says the Lord, and not a God afar off? Jer. 23. 23.

(1.) That he could cure him at a distance. There

(2.) That he could cure him with a word, not send him a medicine, much less a charm; but speak the word, and it shall be done. He did not question but my servant shall be healed. Herein he owns him to have a divine power, an authority to command all the creatures and powers of nature, which enables him to do whatsoever he pleases in the kingdom of nature; as at first he raised that kingdom by an almighty word, when he said, Let there be light. With men, saying and doing are two things; but not so with Christ, who is therefore the Arm of the Lord, because he is the eternal Word. His saying, He ye warned, and filled, (Jam. 2. 16.) and healed, warms, and fills, and heals.

The centurion’s faith in the power of Christ he here illustrates by the dominion he had, as a centurion, over his soldiers, as a master over his servants: he says to one, Go, and he goes, &c. They were all at his beck and command, so that as he could bring things near or far at a distance; his word was a law to them—hence, for well disciplined soldiers know that the commands of their officers are not to be disputed, but obeyed. Thus could Christ speak, and it is done; such a power had he over all bodily diseases. The centurion had this command over his soldiers, though he was himself a man under authority; not a commander in chief, but a sub-al tern officer; much more had Christ this power, who is the great and sovereign Lord of all. The centurion’s servants were very obsequious, would go and come at every the least intimation of their master’s mind. Now, [1.] Such servants we all should be to God: we must go and come at his bidding, according to the directions of his word, and the disposals of his providence; run where he sends us, return when he reminds us, and do what he appoints. What saith my Lord unto his servant? When his will is published, his must take place, and our own be set aside. [2.] Such devotion is due from all diseases are to Christ. They seize us when he sends them, they leave us when he calls them back; they have that effect upon us, upon our bodies, upon our souls, that he orders. It is a matter of comfort to all that belong to Christ, for whose good his power is exerted and engaged, that every disease has his centurion, who executes his command, is under his control, and is made to do his bidding. They have no selfish intentions of his grace. They need not fear sickness, nor must we; who can do, who see it in the hand of so good a Friend.

II. Here is the grace of Christ appearing toward this centurion; for to the gracious he will show himself gracious.

1. He complies with his address at the first word. He did but tell him his servant’s case, and was going on to beg a cure, when Christ prevented him, with this good word, and comfortable word, I will come and heal him; (v. 7.) not, I will come and see him—that had evinced him a kind Saviour; but, I will come and heal him—that shows him a mighty, an almighty Saviour; it was a great word, but no more than he could make good; for he healed him. They who wrought miracles by a derived power, did not speak thus positively, as Christ did, who wrought them by his own power, as one that had authority. When a minister is sent for to a sick friend, he can but say, I will come and pray for him; but Christ says, I will come and heal him; it is well that Christ can do more for us than our ministers can. The centurion desired he would heal his servant; he says, I will come and heal him; thus expressing more favour than he did either ask or think of. Note, Christ often outdoes the expectations of poor suppliants. See an instance of Christ’s humility, that he would make a visit to a poor soldier. He would not go down to see a noduleman’s sick child, who insisted upon his coming down, (John 4. 47—49.) but he proffers to go down to see a sick servant; thus does he regard the low estate of his people, and give more abundant honour to that part which lacked. Christ’s humility, in being willing to come, gave an example to him, and occasioned his humility, in owning himself unworthy to have him come. Note, Christ’s gracious condescensions to us, should make us the more humble and self-abasing before him.

2. He commends his faith, and takes occasion from it to speak a kind word of the poor Gentile centurion. See 10—12. See what great things a strong but self-denying faith can obtain from Jesus Christ, even of general and public concern.

(1.) As to the centurion himself; he not only approved him and accepted him, (that honour have all true believers,) but he admired him and applauded him; that honour great believers have, as Job; there is none like him in the earth.

[1.] Christ admired him for his greatness, but for his greatness. When Jesus heard it, he marvelled; not as if it were to him new and surprising, he knew the centurion’s faith, for he wrought it; but it was great and excellent, rare and uncommon, and Christ spoke of it as wonderful, to teach us what to admire; not worldly pomp and decorations, but the beauty of holiness, and the ornaments which are in the sight of God of great price. Note, the wonders of grace should affect us so that we value not only the spiritual, but the spiritual attainments more than any achievements in this world. Of those that are rich in faith, not of those that are rich in gold and silver, we should say that they have gotten all this glory, Gen. 31. 1. But whatever there is admirable in the faith of any, it must redound to the glory of Christ, who will shortly be himself admired in all them that believe, as having done in and for them marvellous things.

[2.] He commended him in what he said to them that followed. All believers shall be, in the other world, but some believers are, in this world, confessed and acknowledged by Christ before men, in his eminent appearances for them and with them. Verily, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. Now this speaks, First, Honour to the centurion; who, though not a son of Abraham’s loins, was an heir of Abraham’s faith, and of the promise. Note, That Christ seeks is faith, and wherever it is, he finds it, though but as a grain of mustard-seed. He had not found so great faith, all things considered, and in proportion to the means; as the poor widow is said to cast in more than they all, Luke 21. 3. Though the centurion was a Gentile, yet he was thus commended. Note, we must be so far from grudging, that we must be forward, to give those their due praise, that are not within our denomination or pale. Secondly, It speaks shame to Israel, to whom pertained the adoption, the glory, the covenants, and all the assistance and encouragements of faith. Note, When the Son of Man comes, he finds little faith, and, therefore, he finds so little fruit. Note, The attainments of some, who have had but little helps for their souls, will aggravate the sin and ruin of many, that have had great plenty of the means of grace, and have not made a good improvement of them. Christ saith, These his faithless followers by any means he might provoke them to a holy emulation, as Paul speaks, Rom. 11.
14. They were Abraham's seed; in jealousy for that honour, let them not suffer themselves to be oustripped by a Gentile, especially in that grace for which Abraham was eminent.
(2.) As to others, Christ takes occasion from hence, to make a comparison between Jews and Gentiles, and tells them two things, which could not but be very surprising to them who had been taught that salvation was of the Jews.
[1.] That a great many of the Gentiles should be saved, v. 11. The faith of the centurion was but a specimen of the conversion of the Gentiles, and a preface to their adoption into the church. This was a topic our Lord Jesus took to speak of, with a spaciousness of discourse: I say unto you, "I that know all men;" and he could not say any thing more pleasing to himself, or more displeasing to the Jews;
an intimation of this kind enraged the Nazarenes against him, Luke 4. 27. Christ gives us here an idea, First, Of the persons that shall be saved; many from the east and the west: he had said, (ch. 7. 14.)
Few there be that find the way to life; and yet here many, from the east, and from the west; stand in one place; yet, when they come all together, they will be a great many. We now see but here and there one brought to grace; but we shall shortly see the Captain of our salvation bringing many sons to glory.
Heb. 2. 10. He will come with ten thousands of his saints; (Jude 14.) with such a company as no man can number; (Rev. 7. 9.) with nations of them that are saved. Rev. 21. 24. They shall come from the east, and from the west; places far distant from each other; yet they shall all meet at the right hand of Christ, the centre of their unity. Note, God has his remnant in all places; from the rising of the sun, to the going down of the same, Mal. 1. 11. The elect will be gathered from the four winds, ch. 24. 31.
They are sown in the earth, some scattered in every country, and some in the Gentiles; that God should propagate his religion, and be glorified amongst them; and they are especially meant here; though they were strangers to the covenant of promise now, and had been long, yet who knows what hidden ones God had among them then? As in Elijah's time in Israel, (1 Kings 19. 14.) soon after which they flocked into the church in great multitudes, Isa.
60. 3, 4. Note, When we come to heaven, as we shall miss a great many there, that we thought had been going thither, so we must meet a great many there, that we did not expect. Secondly, Christ gives us an idea of the salvation itself. They shall come, shall come together, shall come together to Christ, 2 Thess. 2. 1. 1. They shall be admitted into the kingdom of grace on earth, into the covenant of grace made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; they shall be met with favours from God, such as he bestows upon the Gentiles, Gal. 3. 14. This makes Zaccheus a son of Abraham, Luke 19. 9. 2. They shall be admitted into the kingdom of glory in heaven.
They shall come cheerfully, flying as doves to their windows; they shall sit down to rest from their labours, as having done their day's work; sitting de-etes continuance; while we stand, we are going, when we sit down, we are resting. But this is a remaining rest, it is a continuing city; they shall sit down, as upon a throne; (Rev. 3. 21.) as at a table; that is the metaphor here; they shall sit down to be feasted; which denotes both fulness of communication, and freedom and familiarity of communion, Luke 22. 30. They shall sit down with Abraham.
They who in this world were ever so far distant from each other in time, place, or outward condition, shall all meet together in heaven; ancient and moderns, Jews and Gentiles, rich and poor. The rich man in hell sees Abraham, but Lazarus sits beside him. Note, The Christian society is a portra of the felicity of Heaven; and they on whom the ends of the world are come, and who are most obscure, shall share in glory with the renewed patriarchs.
[2.] That a great many of the Jews should perish,
v. 12. Observe,
First, A strange sentence passed: The children of the stock shall be cut off; the Jews that persist in unbelief, though they were by birth children of the kingdom, yet shall be cut off from being members of the visible church: the kingdom of God, of which they boasted that they were the children, shall be taken from them, and they shall become not a people, not obtaining mercy, Rom. 11. 20.— 9. 31. In the great day it will not avail men to have been Jews, nor Jews in name, whilst they remain unconverted. Judas said, he was a child of the Jews; for men will then be judged, not by what they were called, but by what they were. If children indeed, then heirs; but many are children in profession, in the family, but not of it, that will come short of the inheritance. Being born of professing parents denominates us children of the kingdom;
but if we rest in that, and have nothing else to shew for heaven but that, we shall be cast out.
Secondly, A strange punishment for the workers of iniquity described: They shall be cast into outer darkness, the darkness of those that are without,
of the Gentiles that were out of the church: into that the Jews were cast, and into worse: they were blinded, and hardened, and filled with terrors, as the apostle shews, Rom. 11. 8—10. A people so unchurched, and given up to spiritual judgments, are in utter darkness already; but it looks further,
to the state of damned sinners in hell, to which the other is a dismal preface. They shall be cast out from God, and all true comfort, and cast into darkness. In hell there is fire, but no light; it is utter darkness; darkness in extremity; the highest degree of darkness, without any remainder, or mixture, or hope, of light; nor the least gleam or glimpse of light. Many people are shut out of heaven, the land of light; they who are without, are in the regions of darkness; yet this is not the worst of it, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. 1. In hell there will be great grief.
"Floods of tears shed to no purpose; anguish of spiritual praying eternally upon the vitals, in the sense of the wrath of God, is the torment of the damned.
"Great indignation; the damned sinners will gnash their teeth for spite and vexation, full of the fury of the Lord; seeing with envy the happiness of others, and reflecting with horror upon the former possibility of their own being happy, which is now past.
3. He cures his servant. He not only commends his application to him, but grants him that for which he applied, which was a real answer, v. 13. Observes,
(1.) What Christ said to him: he said that which made the cure as great a favour to him as it was to his servant, and much greater; as thou hast behaved, so be it done to thee. The servant get a cure of his disease, but the master got the confirmation and approbation of his faith. Note, Christ often gives encouraging answers to his praying people, when they apply to him for saving grace for others. It is kind of our God to be heard for others. God turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends, Job 42. 10. It was a great honour which Christ put upon this centurion, when he gave him a blank, as it were;
And when Jesus was come into Peter's house, he saw his wife's mother lie sick, and sick of a fever. And he touched her hand, and the fever left her: and she arose, and ministered unto them. 16. When the even was come, they brought unto him many that were possessed with devils: and he cast out the spirits with his word, and healed all that were sick: 17. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses.

They that are cured of fevers are truly cured, as cannot but be, since they are both the effect and cause of a general distemper, which is in the spirits and humors in the body; and it is a sure proof of the power of Christ, as many of them are immediately healed by his word, and the rest speedily recover by it.

II. Here is a general account of the many cures that Christ wrought. This cure of Peter's mother-in-law brought him abundance of patients. "He healed such a one; why not me? Such a one's friend, why not mine?" Now we are here told,

1. What he did, v. 16. (1.) He cast out devils; cast out the evil spirits with his word. There may be much of Satan's agency, by their power and their desiring, in these cures of disease; and several causes may be assigned, as in Job's boils, especially in the diseases of the mind; but, about the time of Christ's being in the world, there seems to have been more than an ordinary letting loose of the devil, to possess and vex the bodies of people; he came, having great wrath, for he knew that his time was short; and God wisely ordered it so, that Christ might have the fairer and more frequent opportunities of shewing his power, and of showing the purpose and design of his coming into the world, which was to disarm and dispossess Satan, to break his power, and to destroy his works; and his success was as glorious as his design was gracious. (2.) He healed all that were sick; all without exception, though the patient was ever so mean, and the case ever so bad.

2. How the scripture was herein fulfilled, v. 17. The accomplishment of the dispensation proprely was about the thing Christ had in his eye, and the great proof of his being the Messiah: among other things, it was written of him, (Isa. 53. 4.) Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: it is referred to, 1 Pet. 2. 24. and there it is construed, he hath borne our sins; here it is referred to, and is construed, he hath borne our sicknesses: our sins make our sicknesses, our griefs: Christ bore away sin by the merit of his death, and bore away sickness by the miracles of his life; nay, though those miracles are ceased, we may say, that he bore our sicknesses then, when he bore our sins in his own body upon the tree; for sin is both the cause and the sting of sickness. Many are the diseases and calamities to which we are liable in the body; and there is more, in this one line of the gospels, support and comfort under them, than in all the writings of the philosophers—that Jesus Christ bore our sicknesses, and carried our sorrows; he bore them before us; though he was never sick, yet he was hungry, and thirsty, and weary, and troubled in spirit, sorrowful and very heavy: he bore them for us in his passion, and bears them with us in comparison, he is touched with the feeling of our infirmities: and thus he bears them off from us, and makes them sit light, if it be not our own fault. Observe how emphatically it is expressed here: Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses; he was both able and willing to interpose in that matter, and concerned to deal with our infirmities and sicknesses, as our Physician; that part of the calamity of the human nature was his particular care, which he evidenced by his great readiness to cure diseases; and he is no less powerful, no less tender now, for we are sure that never were any the worse for going to heaven.

18. Now when Jesus saw great multitudes about him, he gave commandment to depart unto the other side. 19. And a certain Scribe came, and said unto him, Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. 20. And Jesus saith unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath nowhere to lay his head. 21. And another of his disciples said unto him, Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. 22. But Jesus said unto him, Follow me; and let the dead bury their dead.

1. Christ’s removing to the other side of the sea of Tiberias, and his ordering his disciples, whose boats attended him, to get their transport-vessels ready, in order to it, v. 18. The influences of this Sun of righteousness were not to be confined to one place, but diffused all the country over; he must go about to do good; the necessities of souls called to him, Come over, and help us; (Acts 16. 9.) he removed when he saw great multitudes about him. Though by this it appeared that they were desirous to have him there, he knew there were others as desirous to have him with them, and they must have their share of him: his being acceptable and useful in one place, was no objection against, but a reason for, his going to another. Thus he would try the multitudes that were about him, whether their zeal would carry them to follow him, and attend on him, when his preaching was removed to some distance. Many would be glad of such steps, if they could have them at next door, who will not be at the pains to follow them to the other side; and thus Christ shook off those who were less zealous, and the perfect were made manifest.
2. Christ’s communication with two, who, upon his remove to the other side, were loth to stay behind, and had a mind to follow him, not as others, who were his followers of an large, but to come into close discipleship, which the rest were not able of; and it carried such a face of strictness as they could not like, nor be well reconciled to; but here is an account of two who seemed desirous to come into communion, and yet were not right; which is here given, as a specimen of the hindrances by which many are kept from closing with Christ, and cleaving to him; and a warning to us, to set out in following Christ, so as that we may not come short; to lay such a foundation, as that our building may stand.
We have the Christ, managing with two different tempers, one quick and desirous of the other dull and heavy; and his instructions are adapted to each of them, and designed for our use.
1. Here is one that was too hasty in promising; and he was a certain scribe, (v. 12.) a scholar, a learned man, one of those that studied and expound-ed the law; generally we find them in the gospels to be persons of no good character; usually coupled with the Pharisees, as enemies to Christ and his doctrine. Where is the scribe? 1 Cor. 1. 20. He is very sel-dom following Christ; yet here was one that bid pretty fair for discipleship, a Saul among the pharisees. Now observe,
1. How he expressed his forwardness; Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. I know not how any man could have spoken better. His profession of a self-dedication to Christ, is, [1.] Very ready, and seems to be ex nemo moveri—from his unbiassed inclination; he is not called to it by Christ, nor urged by any of the disciples, but, of his own accord, he proffers himself to be a close follower of Christ; he is not a pressed man, but a volunteer. [2.] Very resolute; he seems to be at a point in this matter; he does not say, I have a mind to follow thee; but, I will do it. [3.] It was unlimited and without reserve; I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest; not only to the other side of the country, but if it were to the utmost regions of the world. Now we should think ourselves sure of such a man as this; and yet it appears, by Christ’s answer, that his resolution was rash, his ends low and carnal: either he did not consider at all, or not the way which was to be travelled; he saw the mysteries Christ wrought, and hoped he would set up a temporal kingdom, and he wished to apply betimes for a share in it. Note, There are many resolutions for religion, produced by some sudden pangs of conviction, and taken up without due consideration, that prove abortive, and come to nothing: soon ripe, soon rotten.
2. How Christ tried his forwardness, whether it was true or not, v. 19. He let him know that this Son of man, whom he is so eager to follow, has no where to lay his head, v. 20. Now from this account of Christ’s deep poverty, we observe,
1. That it is strange in itself, that the Son of God, when he came into the world, should put himself into such a very low condition, as to want the convenience of a certain resting-place, which the meaner of the creatures have. If he would take our nature upon him, one would think, he should have taken it in its best estate and circumstances: no, he takes it in its worst. See here, First, How well provided for the inferior creatures are: The foxes have holes; though they are not only not useful, but hurtful, to man, yet God provides holes for them, in which they are earthed: man endeavours to destroy them, but they thus are sheltered by the wisdom of God. The birds of the air, though they take no care for themselves, yet are taken care of, and have nests; (Ps. 104. 17.) nests in the field; some of them nests in the house; in God’s courts, Ps. 84. 3. Secondly, How poorly the Lord Jesus was provided for. It may encourage us to trust God for necessa-ries, that the beasts and birds have such good provision; and may comfort us, if we want what we need, and are burdened. Note, Our Lord Jesus, when he was here in the world, submitted to the disgraces and distresses of extreme poverty; for our sakes he became poor, very poor. He had not a settlement, had not a place of repose, not a house of his own, to put his head in, not a pillow of his ten, to lay his head on. He and his disciples lived upon the charity of well-disposed people, that ministered to him of their substance, Luke 8. 2. Christ submitted to this, not only that he might in all respects humble himself, and fulfill the scriptures, which spake of him as poor and needy, but that he might shew us the vanity of worldly wealth, and teach us to look upon it with a holy contempt; that he might teach us better things for us, and so make us rich, 2 Cor. 8. 9.

[2.] It is strange that such a declaration should be made on this occasion. When a Scribe offered to follow Christ, one would think he would have encouraged him, and said, Come, and I will take care of thee; one Scribe might be capable of doing him more credit and service than twelve fishermen: but Christ saw his heart, and answered to the thoughts of them, which were tend to do to-day; it is come to Christ. First, The Scribe's resolve seems to have been sudden; and Christ would have us, when we take upon us a profession of religion, to sit down, and count the cost, (Luke 14. 28.) to do it intelligently, and with consideration, and choose the way of godliness, not because we know no other, but because we know no better. It is no advantage to take up a profession of religion, ere they are aware: They that take up a profession of religion, and then, off again, in a fret; let them, therefore, take time, and they will have done the sooner; let him that will follow Christ know the worst of it, and expect to lie hard, and fare hard. Secondly, His resolve seems to have been from a worldly, covetous principle. He saw what abundance of cures Christ wrought, and concluded that he had large fees, and would get an estate quickly, and therefore, he would follow him in hopes of being made rich with him; but Christ rectifies his mistake, and tells him, he was so far from growing rich, that he had not a place to lay his head on; and that if he follow him, he cannot expect to fare better than he fared. Note, Christ will accept none for his followers that aim at worldly advantages in following him, or design to make any thing but heaven of their religion. We have reason to think that this Scribe, hereupon, went away sorrowful, being disappointed of the gain which he thought would turn to account; he is not for following Christ, unless he can get by him.

1. Here is another that was too slow in performing. Delay in execution is as bad on the one hand, as precipitancy in resolution is on the other; when we have taken time to consider, and then have determined, let it never be said, we left that to be done to-morrow, which we should do to-day. This candidate for the ministry was one of Christ's disciples already, (v. 21.) a follower of him at large. Clemens Alexandrinus tells us, from an ancient tradition, that this was Philip; he seems to be better qualified and disposed than the former, because not so confident and presumptuous: a bold, eager, over-forward temper is not the most promising in religious things; the last are first, and the first last. Now observe here.

(1.) The excuse that this disciple made, to defer an immediate attendance on Christ; (v. 21.) Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. Before I come to be a close and constant follower of thee, let me be allowed to perform this last office of respect to my father; and in the mean time, let it suffice to be a hearer of thee now and then, when I can spare time. His father (some think) was sick, or dying, or dead; other things, he was only aged, and not likely in a course of nature to continue long; for he desired leave to attend upon him in his sickness, at his death, and to his grave, and then he would be at Christ's service. This seemed a reasonable request, and yet it was not right. He had not the zeal he should have had for the work, and therefore pleaded this, because it seemed a plausible plea. Note, An unwilling mind never wants an excuse. The meaning of Non vacat, is, Non placeat—The want of leisure is the want of inclination. We will suppose it to come from a true filial affection and respect for his father, yet still the preference should have been given to Christ. Note, Many are hindered from and in the way of serious godliness, by an over-concern for their families and relations; these lawful things they are above all, as if God is neglected and postponed, under colour of discharging our debts to the world; here therefore we have need to double our guard.

(2.) Christ's disallowing of this excuse; (v. 22.) Jesus said unto him, Follow me; and, no doubt, power accompanied this word to him, as to others, and he did follow Christ, and cleaved to him, as Ruth to Naomi, when the Scribe, in the verses before, like Orpah, took leave of him. That said, I will follow thee; to this Christ said, Follow me; comparing them together, it is intimated that we are brought to Christ by the force of his call to us, not of our promise to him; it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that willeth; he calls whom he will, Rom. 9. 16. And farther, Note, Though chosen vessels may make excuses, and decline to follow Christ; divinity calls a great while, yet Christ will at length answer their excuses, conquer their unwillingness, and bring them to his feet; when Christ calls, he will overcome, and make the call effectual, 1 Sam. 3. 10. His excuse is laid aside as insufficient; Let the dead bury their dead. It is a proverbial expression; Let one dead man bury another; rather let them lie unburied, than that the service of Christ should be neglected. Let the dead spiritually bury the dead corporally; let worldly offices be left to worldly people; do not thou encumber thyself with them. Burying the dead, and especially a dead father, is a good work, but it is not thy work at this time; it may be done as well by others, that are not called and qualified, as thou art, to be employed for Christ; thou hast something else to do, and must not defer that. Note, Piety to God must be preferred before preferment, not so much, though, that a great and needful part of our religion. The New-Testament under the law, were not to mourn for their own parents, because they were holy to the Lord; (Num. 6. 6—8.) nor was the High-Priest to defile himself for the dead, no, not for his own father, Lev. 21. 11, 12. And Christ requires of those who would follow him, that they hate father and mother; (Luke 14. 26.) love them less than God; we must compare the negled of and disesteem our nearest relations, when they come in competition with Christ, and either our doing for him, or our suffering for him.

23. And when he was entered into a ship, his disciples followed him. 24. And behold, there arose a great tempest in the sea, insomuch that the ship was covered with the waves: but he was asleep. 25. And his disciples came to him, and awoke him, saying, Lord, save us: we perish. 26. And he saith unto them, Why are ye fearful? Where be thy faith? Then he arose, and rebuked the winds and the sea; and there was a great calm. 27. But the men marvelled, saying, What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him!

Christ had given sailing orders to his disciples, (v. 18.) that they should depart to the other side;
the sea of Tiberias, into the country of Gadara, in the tribe of Gad, which lay east of Jordan; thither he would go to rescue a poor creature that was possessed with a legion of devils, though he foresaw how he should be affronted there. Now, 1. he chose to go by water. It had not been much about, if he had gone by land; but he chose to cross the lake, that he might have occasion to manifest himself the God of the sea as well as of the dry land, and to show that there is life and strength in devils, as well as on earth. It is a comfort to those who go down to the sea in ships, and are often in perils there, to reflect that they have a Saviour to trust in, and pray to, who knows what it is to be at sea, and to be in storms there. But observe, when he went to sea, he had no yacht or pleasure-boat to attend him, but made use of his disciples' fishing-boats; so poorly was he used upon this occasion, and his disciples so little thought of those that would rest with Christ hereafter must follow him now wherever he leads them, into a ship or into a prison, as well as into a palace. Now observe, 1. The peril and perplexity of the disciples in this voyage; and in this appeared the truth of what Christ had just now said, that those who follow him must be content upon calamities, v. 20.

1. There arose a very great storm, v. 24. Christ could have prevented this storm, and have ordered them a pleasant passage, but that would not have been so much for his glory and the confirmation of their faith as their deliverance was: this storm was for their sakes, as John 11. 4. One would have expected, that having Christ with them, they should have had a very favourable gale, but it is quite otherwise; for Christ would show that they who were passing with him over the ocean of this world to the other side, must expect storms by the way. The church is tossed with tempests; (Isa. 54. 11.) it is the only upper region that enjoys a perpetual calm, this lower one is ever and anon disturbed and disturbing.

2. This storm was as little in this storm. We never read of Christ's sleeping, but at this time; he was in watchings often, and continued all night in prayer to God: this was a sleep, not of security, like Jonah's in a storm, but of holy serenity, and dependence upon his Father: he slept, to shew that he was really and truly man, and subject to the sinless infirmities of our nature: his work made him weary and sleepy, and he had no guilt, no fear within, to disturb his repose. Trough that can any their heads upon the pillow of a clear conscience, may sleep quietly and sweetly in a storm, (Ps. 4. 8.) as Peter, Acts 12. 6. He slept at this time, to try the faith of his disciples, whether they could trust him when he seemed to slight them. He slept not so much with a desire to be refreshed, as with a design to be awakened.

3. The poor disciples, though used to the sea, were afraid: though that can any their heads upon the pillow of a clear conscience, may sleep quietly and sweetly in a storm, (Ps. 4. 8.) as Peter, Acts 12. 6. He slept at this time, to try the faith of his disciples, whether they could trust him when he seemed to slight them. He slept not so much with a desire to be refreshed, as with a design to be awakened. The poor disciples, though used to the sea, were afraid: though that can any their heads upon the pillow of a clear conscience, may sleep quietly and sweetly in a storm, (Ps. 4. 8.) as Peter, Acts 12. 6. He slept at this time, to try the faith of his disciples, whether they could trust him when he seemed to slight them. He slept not so much with a desire to be refreshed, as with a design to be awakened. Their prayer has life in it, Lord, save us, we perish. (1.) He believed he could save them; they begged he would. Christ's errand into the world was to save, but those only shall be saved, that call on the name of the Lord. Acts 2. 21. They who by faith are interested in the eternal salvation wrought out by Christ, may with a humble confidence apply themselves to him for temporal deliverances. Observe, They call him Lord, and then pray, Save us. Note, Christ will save none but those that are willing to take him for their Lord; for he is a Prince and a Saviour. (2.) Their plea is, He perish; which was, [1.] The language of their fervency; they pray as men in earnest, that beg for their lives; it becomes us thus to strive and wrestle in prayer; therefore Christ says, Reckless of our security, make haste to the throne of grace. [2.] It was the language of their perplexity; they pray as men that are afraid, that want for their lives, it becomes us thus to strive and wrestle in prayer; therefore Christ says, Reckless of our security, make haste to the throne of grace.

II. The power and grace of Jesus Christ put forth for their succour; then the Lord Jesus awaked, as one refreshed, Ps. 78. 65. Christ may sleep when his church is in a storm, but he will not out-sleep himself; the time, the set time to favour his disturbed church, will come, Ps. 102. 13. He rebuked the disciples; and they were immediately calm. He rebuked the disciples, and they were immediately calm. He rebuked the disciples, and they were immediately calm. He rebuked the disciples, and they were immediately calm. He rebuked the disciples, and they were immediately calm.

1. He rebuked the disciples; (v. 25.) Why are ye so little faith? Take heart, and be of good courage. He did not chide them for disturbing him with their prayers, but for disturbing themselves with their fears. Christ reproved them first, and then delivered them; this is his method, to prepare us for a mercy, and then to give it us. Observe, (1.) His dislike of their fears; Why are ye so fearful? Ye, my disciples? Let the sinners in Zion be afraid, let heathen mariners tremble in their ships, but you shall not be so. Inquire into the reasons of your fear, and weigh them. (2.) His discovery of the cause and spring of their fears; O ye of little faith. Many that have true faith are weak in it, and it does but little. Note, [1.] Christ's disciples are apt to be disquieted with fears in a stormy day, to torment themselves with jealousies that things are bad with them, and dismal conclusions that they will be worse. [2.] The prevalence of our inordinate fears in a stormy day is owing to the weakness of our faith, which would be as an anchor to the soul, and would ply the ear of prayer.

By faith we might see through the storm to the quiet shore, and encourage ourselves with hope that we shall weather our point. (3.) The fearfulness of Christ's disciples in a storm, and their unbelief, the cause of it, are very displeasing to the Lord Jesus, who will not suffer dishonour upon him, and create disturbance to themselves.

2. He rebuked the wind; the former he did as the God of grace, and the Sovereign of the heart, who can do what he pleases in us; this he did as the God of nature, the Sovereign of the world, who can do what he pleases for us. It is the same power that stills the noise of the sea, and the tempest of fear. Ps. 63. 7. Suddenly he rebuked the wind, and there was a stillness, a calm, a rest, a peace, a sleep of the storm, a quietness of the waves, and a stillness of the spirits of the disciples; for it is God that maketh all the winds to blow, and the angel of death to march; and when he will he makes the storm to cease, and the tempest to be no more, and the wind to be still. This excited their astonishment; (v. 27.) The men marvelled. They had been long acquainted with the sea, and never saw a storm so immediately
28. And when he was come to the other side, into the country of the Gergesenes, there met him two possessed with devils, coming out of the tombs, exceeding fierce, so that no man might pass by that way.

29. And, behold, they cried out, saying, What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?

30. And there was a good way off from them an herd of many swine feeding.

31. And the devils besought him, saying, If thou cast us out, suffer us to go away into the herd of swine.

32. And he said unto them, Go. And when they were come out, they went into the herd of swine: and, behold, the whole herd of swine ran violently down a steep place into the sea, and perished in the waters:

33. And they that kept them fled, and went their ways into the city, and told every thing, and what was befallen to the possessed of the devils.

34. And, behold, the whole city came out to meet Jesus: and when they saw him, they besought him that he would depart out of their coasts.

We have here the story of Christ's casting the devils out of two men that were possessed. The scope of this chapter is to show the divine power of Christ, by the instances of his dominion over bodily diseases, which to us are irresistible; over winds and waves, which to us are yet more uncontrollable; and lastly, over devils, which to us are most formidable of all. Christ has not only all power in heaven and earth and all deep places, but has the keys of hell too.

Principalities and powers were made subject to him, even while he was in his estate of humiliation, as an earnest of what should be at his entrance into his glory; (Eph. 1. 21.) he spoiled them, Col. 2. 13. It was observed in general, (c. 8.) that Christ cast out the spirits into a herd of swine; here we have a particular instance of it, which had some circumstances more remarkable than the rest. This miracle wrought in the country of the Gergesenes; some think, they were the remains of the old Gogmashites, Deut. 7. 1. Though Christ was sent chiefly to the lost sheaf of the house of Israel, yet some sallies he made among the borderers, as here, to gain this victory over Satan, which was a specimen of the conquest of his legions in the Gentile world. The general instance which this gives us of Christ's power over Satan, and his designs against him to disarm and dispossess him, we have here especially discovered to us the way and manner of evil spirits in their enmity to man. Observe, concerning this legion of devils, What work they made where they were, and where they went.

1. They dwelt among the tombs; thence they came when they met Christ. The Devil having the power of death, not as judge, but as executioner, he delighted to converse among the trophies of his victory, the dead bodies of men; but there, where he thought himself in his greatest triumph and elevation, as afterwards in Golgotha, the place of a skull, did Christ conquer and subdue him. Conversing among the graves increased the melancholy and frown of the poor possessed creatures, and so strengthened the hold he had of them: by their bodily distemper, and also made them more formidable to other people, who generally startle at anything that athirst among them.

2. They were exceeding fierce; not only ungovernable themselves, but mischievous to others, frightening many, having hurt some; so that no man durst pass that way. Note, The Devil bears malice to mankind, and shows it, by making men spiritue and malicious one to another. Mutual enmities, where there should be mutual endearments and assistance, are effects and evidences of Satan's enmity to the whole race: he casts one into a wolf, a bear, a devil, to another—Homo homini lupus. Where Satan rules in a man spiritually, by those lusts that war in the members, pride, envy, malice, revenge, they make him unfit for human society, as unworthy of it, and as much an enemy to the comfort of it, as these poor possessed creatures were.

3. They bid defiance to Jesus Christ, and discountenanced all interest in him, v. 29. Nor was this overcome by any of the power of God. Here was a combination of the devils, that notwithstanding the mischief they studied to do by and to these poor creatures, yet they could not keep them from meeting Jesus Christ, who ordered the matter so as to meet them. It was his overpowering hand that dragged these unclean spirits into his presence, which they dreaded more than anything else: his chains could hold them, when the chains men made for them could not. But, being brought before him, they protested against his jurisdiction, and broke out into a rage. What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? Here is,

(1.) One word the Devil spoke like a saint; he addressed himself to Christ as Jesus the Son of God; a good word, and at this time, when it was a truth but in the proving, it was a great word too, what flesh and blood did not reveal to Peter, ch. 16. 16. Even the devil the devilish and believe, and confess Christ to be the Son of God, and yet they are devils still, which makes their enmity to Christ so much the more wicked, and indeed a perfect torment to themselves; for how can it be otherwise, to oppose one they know to, the be Son of God? Note, It is not knowledge, but love, that distinguishes saints from devils. He is the first-born of hell, that knows Christ, and yet hates him, and will not be subject to him by his love. Here the Devil made a doubt whether Christs were the Son of God or not, and would have persuaded him to question it, (ch. 4. 3.) but now he readily owns it,
Note, Though God's children may be much disquieted in an hour of temptation, by Satan's questioning their relation to God as a Father, yet the Spirit of adoption shall at length clear it up to them so much to their satisfaction, as to set it even above the Devil's contradiction.

(2.) Two words that he said like a devil, like himself.

[1.] A word of defiance; "What have we to do with thee?" Now, First, It is true, that the devils have nothing to do with Christ as a Saviour, for he took not on him the nature of the angels that fell, nor did he lay hold on them; (Heb. 2. 16.) they are in no relation to him, they neither have, nor hope for, any benefit by him. O the depth of this mystery of divine love, that fallen man hath so much to do with Christ, when fallen angels have nothing to do with him! Surely here was torment enough before the time, to be forced to own the excellency that is in Christ, and yet that he has no interest in him. Note, It is possible for men to call Jesus the Son of God, and yet have nothing to do with him. Secondly, It is as true, that the devils desire not to have any thing to do with Christ as a Ruler; they hate him, they are filled with enmity against him, they stand in opposition to him, and are in open rebellion against his crown and sceptre. See whose language they speak, that will have nothing to do with the gospel of Christ, with his laws and ordinances, that throw off his yoke, that break his bands in sunder, and will not have him to reign over them; that say to the Almighty Jesus, Depart from us: they are of their father the Devil, they do his lusts, and speak his language. Thirdly, It is not true, that the devils have nothing to do with Christ as a Judge; for they have, and they know it. These devils could not say, What hast thou to do with us? could not deny that the Son of God is the Judge of devils; to his judgment they are bound over in chains of darkness, which they would shake off, and shake off the thought of.

[2.] A word of dread and depreciation; "Art thou come hither, to torment us—to cast us out from these men, and to restrain us from doing the hurt we would do?" Note, To be turned out, and tied up, from doing mischief, is a torment to the Devil, all whose comfort and satisfaction are man's misery and destruction. Should not we then count it our heaven to be doing well, and reckon that our torment, whether within or without, that hinders us from well-doing? Now must we be tormented by thee before the time? Note, First, There is a time in which devils must be restrained, but not permitted to act in their proper strength, and no further; they will then be made close prisoners; they have now some ease; they will then be in torment without ease. This they here take for granted, and ask not never to be tormented, (despair of relief is the misery of their case,) but they beg that they may not be tormented before the time; for though they knew not when the day of judgment should be, they knew it was near; and the more they knew it, the more they have a certain fearful looking for of that judgment, and fiery indignation, upon every approach of Christ, and every check that is given to their power and rage. The very sight of Christ, and his word of command to come out of the man, made them thus apprehensive of their torment. Thus the devils believe, and tremble, Jam. 2. 19. It is their own enmity to God and man that puts them upon the rack, and tortures them before the time. The most desperate sinners, whose damnation is sealed, yet can not quite harden their hearts against the surprise of fearfulness, when they see the day approaching.

II. Let us now see what work they made where they went, when they were turned out of the men possessed, and that was into a herd of swine, which was a good way off; v. 56. These Gergesenes, though living on the other side Jordan, were Jews. What reason could there be, that, instead of cattle, which were unclean, and not to be eaten nor touched? Probably, lying in the outskirts of the land, there were many Gentiles among them, to whom this herd of swine belonged: or they kept them to be sold, or bartered, to the Romans, with whom they had now great dealings, and who were admirers of swine's flesh. Now observe, 1. How the devils seized the swine. Though they were a good way off, and, one would think, out of danger, yet the devils had an eye upon them, to do them a mischief: for they go up and down, seeking to devour, seeking an opportunity, and they seek not long but they find. Now here, (1.) They asked leave to enter into the swine; (v. 31.) they brought him, with all earnestness, If thou canst cast us out, command we to depart into the herd of swine. Hereby, [1.] They discover their desire of inclination to do mischief, and what a pleasure it is to them: those, therefore, are their children, and resemble them, whose sleep departed from them, except they cause some to fall, Prov. 4. 16. "Let us go into the herd of swine, any where rather than into the place of torment, any where to do mischief." If they might not be suffered to hurt men in their bodies, they would hurt them in their goods, and in that too they intend hurt to their souls, by making Christ a burthen to them: such malicious devices hath that old subtle serpent! [2.] They own Christ's power over them; that, without his sufferance and permission, they could not so much as hurt a swine. This is comfortable to all the Lord's people, that, though the Devil's power be very great, yet it is limited, and not equal to his malice; (what would become of us, if it were?) especially that it is under the control of our Lord Jesus, our most faithful, powerful Friend and Saviour; that Satan and his instruments can go no further than he is pleased to permit; here shall their proud waves be stayed.

(2.) They had leave, Christ said unto them, Go, (v. 32.) as God did to Satan, when he desired leave to afflict Job. Note, God does often, for wise and holy reasons, permit Satan to do mischief. He may not be permitted to do all he would and can, but he may be permitted to do what he would, if it be for some good. They might not be permitted to harm the people, but he might be permitted to make them the means of Satan's service, to do mischief as he would. When one set them to do the mischief he would, and even by it serve his own purposes. The devils are not only Christ's captives, but his vassals; his dominion over them appears in the harm they do, as well as in the hindrance of them from doing more. Thus even their wrath is made to praise Christ, and the remainder of it he does and will restrain. Christ permitted this, [1.] For the conviction of the Sdulencies that were in the earth, of the power of demons, and of the influence of spirits, and would not own that there were such beings, because they could not see them. Now Christ would, by this, bring it as near as might be to an ocular demonstration of the being, multitude, power, and malice, of evil spirits, that, if they were not hereby convinced, they might be left inexcusable in their infidelity. We see not the wind, but it is moved; (Joel 2. 30.) that we may say, when we see the earth and houses blown down by it. [2.] For the punishment of the Gadarenes, who perhaps, though Jews, took a liberty to eat swine's flesh, contrary to the law: however, their keeping swine bordered upon evil; and Christ would also shew what a hellish crew they were delivered from, which, if he had permitted it, would soon have choked them, as they did their swine. The devils, in obedience to Christ's command, came out of the men, and, having permission, when they were come out, immediately they went into the herd of swine. See what an industrious enemy Satan is, and how expeditions; he will lose no time in doing mischief. Observe, 2. Whether they hurried them, where they had seized them. They were not bid to save their lives, and, therefore, they were made to run violently down a steep place into the sea, where they all perished, to the number of about two thousand, Mark 5. 13. Note, The possession which the Devil gets is for destruction. Thus the Devil hurry's people to hurries them, in that which they have resolved against, which they know will be short and griev to them; with what a force doth the evil spirit work in the children of disobedience, when by so many foolish and hurtful lusts they are brought to act in direct contradiction, not only to religion, but to right reason, and their interest in this world! Thus, likewise, he hurry's them to ruin, for he is Apollon and Abaddon, the great destroyer. By his lists what men do, they are drowned in destruction and heredon. This is Satan's will, to scatter up and to devour; miserable then is the condition of those that are led captive by his will. They are hurried into a worse lake than this, a lake that burns with fire and brimstone. Observe, 3. What effect had this upon the owners. The report of it was soon brought them by the swineherds; what was done seemed to be more concerning for the loss of the swine than of the servants, for they went not to tell what was befallen to the possession of the devil till the swine were lost, v. 33. Christ went not into the city, but the news of his being there did, by which he was willing to feel how their pulse beat, and what influence it had upon them, and then act accordingly. Now, (1.) Their curiosity brought them out to see Jesus. The whole city came out to meet him, that they might be able to say, they had seen a man who did such wonderful works. Thus they go out, in profession, to meet Christ for compassion, for he has no real affection for him, nor desire to know him. (2.) Their covetousness made them willing to be rid of him. Instead of inviting him into their city, or bringing their sick to him to be healed, they desired him to depart out their coasts, as if they had borne the words of the devils, What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou son of God? And now the devils had what they aimed at in drowning the swine; they did it, and then made them believe that Christ had done it, and so prejudiced them against him. He seduced our first parents, by possessing them with hard thoughts of God, and kept the Gadarenes from Christ, by suggesting that he came into their country to destroy their cattle, and that he would do more hurt than good; for though he had cured two men, yet he had drowned two thousand swine. Thus the Devil makes tares in God's field, does mischief in the christian church, and then lays the blame upon Christianity, and incenses men against that. They besought him that he would depart, lest, like Moses in Egypt, he should proceed to some other plague. Note, There are a great many who prefer their swine before their selves, and are soon short of Christ, and salvation by him. They desire Christ to depart out of their hearts, and will not suffer his name to be a place in them, because he and his word will be the destruction of their brutish lusts—those swine which they give up themselves to feed. And justly will Christ forsake those that are weary of him, and say to them hereafter, Depart, ye cursed, who now say to the Almighty, Depart from us.

is both able to save to the uttermost all that come to God by him, and as willing as he is able. His power and pity appear here in the good offices he did, 1. To the bodies of people, in curing the palsy, (v. 26.) and rhoealer's daughter, and healing the bloody issue; (v. 18., 19.) giving sight to two blind men; (v. 27., 31.) casting the Devil out of one possessed; (v. 32., 34.) and healing all manner of sickness and plagues. 2. To the souls of people in forgiving sins; (v. 2.) calling Matthew, and conversing freely with publicans and sinners; (v. 9., 13.) considering the frame of his disciples, with a reference to the duty of teaching; (v. 14., 15.) selecting the gospel, and in compassion to the multitude, providing preaching for them; (v. 35., 38.) Thus did he prove himself to be, as undoubtedly he is, the skilful, faithful Physician, both of soul and body, who heals them, and for all the maladies of both; for which we must, therefore, cleave unto him, and glorify him both with our bodies, and with our spirits, which are his, in return to him for his kindness to both.

1. And he entered into a ship, and passed over, and came into his own city. 2. And beheld, they brought to him a man sick of the palsy, lying on a bed: and Jesus, seeing their faith, said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee. 3. And, behold, certain of the Scribes said within themselves, This man blasphemeth. 4. And Jesus, knowing their thoughts, said, Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts? 5. For whether is easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee? Or to say, Arise, and walk? 6. But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith he to the sick of the palsy,) Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house. 7. And he arose, and departed to his house. 8. But when the multitudes saw it, they marvelled, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men.

The first words of this chapter oblige us to look back to the close of that which precedes it, where we find the Gadarenes so resenting the less of their swine, that they were disgusted with Christ's company, and besought him to depart out of their coasts. Now here it is, He entered into a ship, and passed over. They bid him never to come again, took them at their word, and we never read that he came into their coasts again. Now here observe, 1. His justice—that he left them. Note, Christ will not tarry where he is not welcome. In righteous judgment, he forsakes those places and persons that are weary of him, but abides with those that covet and court his stay. If the unbeliever will depart from Christ, let the unbeliever depart: Isa. 33. 23. His peril, 1 Cor. 7. 15. 2. His patience—that he did not depart from the destroying judgment behind him, to punish them, as they deserved, for their contempt and contumacy. How easily, how justly, might we have sent them after their swine, who were already so much under the Devil's power. The provocation, indeed, was very great; but he put it up, and passed it by, and without any resentment or upbraiding, he entered into a ship, and passed over. This was the day of his patience; he came not to destroy the lives, but to save them; not to kill, but to cure. Spiritual judgments agree more with the constitution of gospel-times; yet some observe, that in these bloody wars which the Romans made upon the Jews, which began not many years after this, they first besieged the town of Gadara, where these Gadarenes dwelt. Note, Those that drive Christ from

CHAP. IX.

We have, in this chapter, remarkable instances of the power and pity of the Lord Jesus, sufficient to convince us that he

them, draw all miseries upon them. Wo unto us, if God depart from us.

He came into his own city, Capernaum, the principal place of his residence at present (Mark 2: 1.) and therefore called his own city. He had himself testified, that a prophet is least honoured in his own country and city, yet thither he came; for he sought not his own honour; but, being in a state of humiliation, he was content to be despised of the people. At Capernaum all the circumstances recorded in this chapter happened, and are, therefore, put together here, though, in the narrative of but Christ, other events are intercalated. When the Gadarees desired Christ to depart, they of Capernaum received him. If Christ be affronted by some, there are others in whom he will be glorious; if one will not, another will.

Now the first occurrence, after Christ's return to Capernaum, as recorded in these verses, was the case of the man sick of the palsy. In which we may observe,

I. The faith of his friends in bringing him to Christ. His distemper was such, that he could not come to Christ himself, but as he was carried. Note, Even the halt and the lame may be brought to Christ, and they shall not be rejected by him. If we do as well as we can, he will accept of us. Christ heals not only the bodies of sick men, but the souls of sick minds. Little faith brings but little to Christ himself, but he will have an eye to the faith of those that bring them, and it shall not be in vain. Jesus saw their faith, the faith of the palsyman's friends; and, as he acted upon their faith, so he was pleased to act upon their faith. His act was to take necessity, Christ had a divine mission. His miracles, especially his miraculous cures, confirm what he said of himself, that he was the Son of God; the cure, which appeared in his curés proved him sent of God; and the faith that appeared in them proved him sent of God, to heal and save. The God of truth would not set his seal to a lie. [2.] It had a particular cagery in this case. The palsy was but a symptom of the disease of sin; now he made it to appear, that he could effectually cure the original disease, by the immediate removal of that symptom; so it was between that and the sickness, that he had power to remove the punishment, no doubt, had power to remit sin. The Scribes stood much upon a legal righteousness, and placed their confidence in that, and made no great matter of the forgiveness of sins, the doctrine upon which Christ hereby designed to put honour, and to show that his great errand to the world was, to save him from their sins.

V. The immediate cure of the sick man. Christ turned from disputing with them, and spoke healing to him. The most necessary arguments must not divert us from doing the good that our hand finds to do. He saith to the sick of the palsy, Arise, take up thy bed, and go to thine house; and a healing, quickening, strengthening power accompanied this word; [v. 7.] he arose and departed to his house. Now, 1. Christ fulfilled his commission. He is God, and he powerfully did it himself. 2. He showed all the power to be carried upon his head, and that he had strength to carry it. 2. He sent him to his house, to be a blessing to his family, where he had been so long a burden; and did not take him along with him for a show, which those would do in such a case, who seek the honour that comes from men.

VI. The immediate cure of the sick man, which this made upon the multitude, (v. 8.) they marvelled and glorified God. Note, All our wonder should help to enlarge our hearts in glorifying God, who alone does marvellous things. They glorified God for what he had done for this poor man. Note, Others' mercies should be our praises, and we should give him thanks for them, for we are members one of another. Though few of this multitude were so convinced, as to be brought to believe in Christ, and to follow him, yet they admired him, ministers, and followed him. Contrast this with the man to whom God had given such power. Note, God must be glorified in all the power that is given men to do good. For all power is originally his; it is in him, as the Fountain, in men, as the cisterns.

9. And as Jesus passed forth from thence, he saw a man, named Matthew, sitting at the receipt of custom; and he saith unto him, Follow me. And he arose, and followed him. 10. And it came to pass, as Jesus sat at meat in the house, behold, many publicans and sinners came and sat down with him and his disciples. 11. And when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto his disciples, Why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners? 12. But when Jesus heard that, he said unto them, They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. 13. But go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice; for I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

In these verses we have an account of the grace and favour of Christ to poor publicans, particularly to Matthew. What he did to the bodies of people was to make way for a kind design he had upon their souls. Now observe,

I. The call of Matthew, the penman of this gospel. Mark and Luke call him Levi; it was ordinary for the same persons to have two names; perhaps Matthew was the name he was most known by as a publican, and, therefore, in his humility, he called himself by that name, rather than by the more honourable name of Levi. Some think Christ gave them the name of Matthew when he called them to be his apostles; as Simon, he summoned Peter. Matthew signifies, the gift of God. Ministers are God's gifts to the church; their ministry, and their ability for it, are God's gifts to them. Now observe,

1. The posture that Christ's call found Matthew in. He was sitting at the receipt of custom, for he was a publican, Luke 5. 27. He was a custom-house officer at the port of Capernaum, or an exciseman, collector of the land-tax. Now, (1.) He was in his calling, as the rest of them whom Christ called, ch. 4. 18. Note, As Satan chooses to come, with his temptations, to those that are idle, so Christ chooses to come, with his calls, to those that are employed. But, (2.) It was a calling of ill fame among serious people; because it was attended with so much corruption and temptation, and there were so few in that business that were honest men. Matthew himself himself shows who those were that were not. Matthew himself himself shows how this calling was ill estimated by the world. St. Paul, (1 Tim. 1. 13.) that the grace of Christ in calling him might be the more magnified, and to show, that God has his remnant among all sorts of people. None can justify themselves in their unbelief, by their calling in the world; for there is no sinful calling, but some have been saved out of it, and no lawful calling, but some have been saved in it.

II. The preventing power of this call. We find not that Matthew looked after Christ, or had any inclination to follow him, though some of his kindred were already disciples of Christ, but Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness. He is found of those that seek him not. Christ spoke first; we have not chosen him, but he hath chosen us. He said, Follow me; and the same divine, almighty power accomplished this work, to convert Matthew, which attended that, where two or three were gathered together, (v. 6.) and was accompanied with the man sick of the palsy. Note, A saving change is wrought in the soul by Christ as the Author, and his word as the means. His gospel is the power of God unto salvation, Rom. 1. 16. The call was effectual, for he came at the call; he arose, and followed him immediately; neither denied, nor deferred his obedience. The power of divine grace soon answers and overcomes all objections. Neither his commission for his place, nor his gains by it, could detain him, when Christ called him. He conferreth not with flesh and blood, Gal. 1. 15, 16. He quitted his post, and his hopes of preferment in that way; and through we find the disciples that were fishers, occasionally fishing again afterwards, we never find Matthew at the receipt of custom again.

II. Christ's converse with publicans and sinners upon this occasion; Christ called Matthew, and introduce himself into an acquaintance with the people of that profession. Jesus sat at meat in the house, v. 10. The other evangelists tell us, that Matthew made a great feast, which the poor fishermen, when they were called, were not able to do. But when he comes to speak of this himself, he neither tells us that it was his own house, nor that it was a feast, but only that he sat at meat in the house; preserving the remembrance of the magnificent favour to the publicans rather than of the respect he had paid to Christ. Note, It will becomes us to speak sparingly of our good deeds. Now observe, 1. When Matthew invited Christ,
ST. MATTHEW, IX.

he invited his disciples to come along with him. Note, That they welcome Christ, must welcome all that are his, for his sake, and let them have a room in their hearts. 2. He invited many publicans and sinners. This was a most extraordinary thing. This was the aim at this treat, that he might have a opportunity of bringing his old associates acquainted with Christ. He knew by experience, what their temptations were, and pitted them; knew by experience what the grace of Christ could do, and would not despair concerning them. Note, They who are effectually brought to Christ themselves, cannot but be desirous, that others also may be brought to him, and ambitious of contributing something towards it. True grace will not contentedly eat its morsels alone, but will invite others. When by the conversion of Matthew the fraternity was broken, presently his house was filled with publicans, and surely some of them will follow him, as he followed Christ. Thus did Andrew and Philip, John 1., 41, 43. — See Judg. 14, 9.

III. The displeasure of the Pharisees at this, v. 11. They cavilled at it; why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners? Here observe, 1. That Christ was quarrelled with. It was not the least of his sufferings, that he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself. None was more quarrelled with by men, than he that came to take up the great quarrel of the world, and divide it between himself and himself the honour due to an incarnate Deity, which was to be justified in what he spake, and to have all he said readily subscribed to; for though he never spoke or did any thing amiss, every thing he said and did was found fault with. Thus he taught us to expect and prepare for reproach, and so bear it patiently. 2. They that quarrelled with him were the Pharisees; a proud generation of men, conceited of themselves, and censorious of others; of the same temper with those in the prophet's time, who said, Stand by thyself, come not near me; I am holier than thou; they were very strict in avoiding sinners, but not in avoiding sin; none greater zealots than they, for the form of godliness, nor greater enemies to the power of it. They were for keeping up the traditions of the elders to a nicety, and so propagating the form and letter of religion, while they were so far from the spirit. They wished, as the Pharisees, to have a law, and a law-keeper. 3. They brought their cavil, not to Christ himself; they had not the courage to face it him, but to his disciples. The disciples were in the same company, but the quarrel is with the master; for they would not have done it, if he had not; and they thought it worse in him who was a prophet, than in them; his dignity, they thought, should set him at a greater distance from such company than others. Being offended at the master, they quarrel with the disciples. Note, It concerns christians to be able to vindicate and justify Christ, and his doctrines and laws, and to be ready always to give an answer to those that ask them a reason of the hope that is in them, 1 Pet. 3., 15. While he is an advocate for us in heaven, let us be advocates for him on earth, and make his reproach our own. 4. The complaint was against Christ himself, not against his associates, with wicked people is against the law of God; (Ps. 119, 115. — 1.) and perhaps by accusing Christ of this to his disciples, they hoped to tempt them from him, to put them out of concet with him, and so to bring them over to themselves to be their disciples, who kept better company; for they compassed sea and land to make disciples. To be intimate with publicans, was against the tradition of the elders; and therefore, they looked upon it as a heinous thing. They were angry with Christ for this, (1.) Because they wished ill to him, and sought occasion to misrepresent him. Note, It is an easy and very common thing to put the worst constructions upon the best words and actions. (2.) Because they wished no good to publicans and sinners, but envied Christ's favour to them, and were grieved to see them brought to repentance. Note, It may justly be suspected, that they have not the grace of God themselves, who grudge others a share in that grace, who are not possessed of it.

IV. The defence that Christ made for himself and his disciples, in justification of their converse with publicans and sinners. The disciples, it should seem, being yet weak, were to seek for an answer to the Pharisees' cavil, and, therefore, bring it to Christ, and he heard it. (v. 12.) or perhaps overheard them reproaching him and his disciples. Let him alone to vindicate himself and to plead his own cause, to answer for himself and for us too. Two things he urges in his defence.

1. The necessity and exigence of the case of the publicans, which called aloud for his help, and therefore justified him in conversing with them for their good. It was the extreme necessity of poor, lost sinners, that brought Christ from the pure regions above, to these impure ones; and the same was it, that brought him into this company which was thought impure. Now, 1.) He proves the necessity of the case of the publicans: they that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. The publicans are sick, and they need one to help and heal them, which the Pharisees think they are not. 2.) He explains the sickness of the soul: sinners are spiritually sick. Original corruptions are the diseases of the soul, actual transgressions are its wounds, or the eruptions of the disease. It is deforming, weakening, disquieting, wasting, killing, but, blessed be God, not incurable. 2.) Jesus Christ is the great Physician of souls. His curing of bodily diseases signified this, that he averse with healing under his fingers. He is a skilful, faith, communicative physician, and it is his office and business to heal the sick. Wise and good men should be as physicians to all about them; Christ was so. Hunc accipient versus on ones habet sapientem, quem versus Verga suas medicus.—A wise man cherishes towards all around him, the feelings of a physician for his patient. Seneca de Const. [3.] Sin-sick souls have need of this Physician. Pharisees care not for sick publicans; they were grieved, of course the publicans were; they were not sick; the publicans were; the Pharisees were, they were sick; they were sick. The Pharisees desired not the knowledge of Christ's word and ways, not because they had no need of him, but because they thought they had none. See John 9., 40, 41.

2.) He proves, that their necessity did sufficiently justify his conduct, in conversing familiarly with them, and that he ought not to be blamed for it; for that necessity made it an act of charity, which ought always to be entered on before the formalities of a religious profession, in which benediction and munificence are far better than magnificence, as much as substance is, than shows or shadows. Those duties, which are of moral and natural obligation, are to take place even of those divine laws, which are positive and ritual, much more of those impositions of men, and traditions of the elders, which make God's laws heavy and burdensome unto men. This he proves (v. 3.) by a passage quoted out of Hos. 6., 6. I will have mercy and not sacrifice. That morose separation from the society of publicans, which the Pharisees enjoined, was less than sacrifice; but Christ's conversing with them was more than an act of common mercy, and therefore to be preferred before it.
It to do well ourselves is better than sacrifice, as Samuel shows, (1 Sam. 15. 22, 23.) much more to do good to others. Christ's conversing with sinners is here called mercy: to promote the conversion of souls is the greatest act of mercy imaginable; it is saving a soul from death, Jam. 5. 20. Observe how Christ prizes this, Go ye and learn what that meaneth. Note, It is not enough to be acquainted with the letter of scripture, but we must learn to understand the meaning of it. And they have best learned the meaning of the scriptures, that have learned how to apply them as a reproof to their own faults, and a rule for their own practice. This scripture which Christ quoted, shewed not only to, and to him, but, [1.] To show wherein true religion consists; not in external observances; not in meats and drinks and shows of sactity; not in little particular opinions and doubtful disputations, but in doing all the good we can to the bodies and souls of others; in righteousness and peace; in visiting the fatherless and widows, [2.] To condemn the Pharisaical hypocrisy of those who place religion in rituals, more than in morals, ch. 23. They espouse those forms of godliness which may be made consistent with, and perhaps subservient to, their pride, covetousness, ambition, and malice, while they hate that power of it which is mortifying to those lusts.

2. He urges the nature and end of his own commission. He must keep to his orders, and prosecute that for which he was appointed to be the great Teacher; now says he, righteous but sinners to repentance, and therefore must converse with publicans. Observe, (1.) What his errand was; it was to call to repentance. This was his first text, (ch. 4. 17.) and it was the tendency of all his sermons. Note, The gospel-call is a call to repentance; a call to us to change our mind and to change our way. (2.) With whom his errand lay; not with the righteous, but with sinners. That is, [1.] If the children of men had not been sinners, there had been no occasion for Christ's coming among them. He is the Saviour, not of man as man, but of man as fallen. Had the first Adam continued in his original righteousness, we had not needed a second Adam. [2.] Therefore his greatest business lies with the greatest sinners; the more dangerous the sick man's case is, the more occasion there is for the physician's help. Christ came into the world to save sinners, but especially to the chief; (1 Tim. 1. 15.) to call not those so much, who, though sinners, are comparatively righteous, but the worst of sinners. [3.] The more sensible any sinners are of their sinfulness, the more welcome will Christ and his gospel be to them; and every one chooses to go where his company is desired, not to those who would rather have his room. Christ came not with an expectation of succeeding among the righteous, who cannot entertain to, and therefore there will sooner he sick of their Saviour, than sick of their sins, but among the convinced, humble sinners; to them Christ will come, for to them he will be welcome.

14. Then came to him the disciples of John, saying, Why do we and the Pharisees fast often, but thy disciples fast not? 15. And Jesus said unto them, Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? But the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast. 16. No man putteth a piece of new cloth unto an old garment: for that which is put in to fill it up, taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worse. 17. Neither do men put new wine into old bottles: else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved.

The objections which were made against Christ and his disciples, gave occasion to some of the most profitable of his discourses; thus are the interests of truth often served, even by the opposition it meets with from gain-sayers, and thus the wisdom of Christ brings good out of evil. This is the third instance of it in this chapter; his discourse of his power to forgive sin, and his readiness to receive sinners, was occasioned by the cavils of Scribes and Pharisees; so here, from a reflection upon the conduct of his family, arose a discourse concerning a tenderness for it. Observe, I. The objection which the disciples of John made against Christ's disciples, for not fasting so often as they did; which they are charged with, as another instance of the looseness of their profession, besides that of eating with publicans and sinners; and it is therefore suggested to them, that they should change that profession for another more strict. It appears by the other evangelists, (Mark 2. 18. and Luke 5. 33.) that the disciples of the Pharisees joined with them, and we have reason to suspect that they imitated them, making use of John's disciples as their spokesmen, because they, being more in favour with Christ and his disciples, could do it more plausibly. Note, It is no new thing for bad men to set good men together by the ears: if the people of God differ in their sentiments, designing men will take that occasion to sow discord, and to incense them one against another, and alienate them one from another; and so make a division between John and of Jesus clash, we have reason to suspect the Pharisees have been at work underhand blowing the coals. Now the complaint is, Why do we and the Pharisees fast often, but thy disciples fast not? It is pity the duties of religion, which ought to be the confirmations of holy love, should be made the occasion of strife and contention; but they often are so, as here; where we may observe, How they boasted of their own fasting. He and the Pharisees fast often. Fasting has in all ages of the church been consecrated, upon special occasions, to the service of religion; the Pharisees were much in it; many of them kept two fast-days in a week, and yet the generality of them were hypocrites and bad men. Note, False and formal professors often excite others in outward acts of devotion, and even of mortification. The disciples of John fasted often, partly in compliance with their master's practice, for he came neither eating nor drinking; (ch. 11. 18.) and people are apt to imitate their leaders, though not always from the same inward principle; partly in compliance with their master's doctrine of repentance. Note, The severer part of religion is often most minded by those that are yet under the discipline of the spirit, as a spirit of bondage, whereas these are in their place, we must pass through them to that life of delight in God and dependence on him, to which these should lead. Now they come to Christ to tell him that they fasted often, at least they thought it often. Note, Most men will proclaim every one his own goodness, Prov. 20. 6. There is a proneness in professors to brag of their own performances in religion, especially if there be any thing extraordinary in them; nay, and not only to boast of them before men, but to lead them before God, and confide in them as a righteousness.
2. How they blamed Christ's disciples for not fasting on an occasion as they did. Thy disciples fast not. They could not but know, that Christ had instructed his disciples to keep their fasts private, and to manage themselves so as that they might not appear unto men to fast; and, therefore, it was very uncharitable in them to conclude they did not fast, because they did not proclaim their fasts. Note, We must not judge of people's religion, by that which falls under the public eye, but by what we ourselves observe. But suppose it was so, that Christ's disciples did not fast so often or so long as they did, why truly they would therefore have it thought, that they had more religion in them than Christ's disciples had. Note, It is common for vain professors to make themselves a standard in religion, by which to try and measure persons and things, as if all who differed from them were in an equal or inferior state. But this diffe red, that they, did too little, and all that did more than they, did too much; which is a plain evidence of their want of humility and charity.

3. How they brought this complaint to Christ. Note, If Christ's disciples, either by omission or commission, give offence, Christ himself will be sure to hear of it, and be reflected upon for it. O Jesus, are these thy disciples? Therefore, for the sake of Christ, we are concerned to conduct ourselves well. Observe, The quarrel with Christ was brought to the disciples, (v. 11.) the quarrel with the disciples was brought to Christ; (v. 14.) this is the way of sowing discord and killing love, to set people against ministers, ministers against people, and one friend against another.

II. The apology which Christ made for his disciples in this matter. Christ might have upbraided John's disciples with the former part of their question, Why do ye fast often? "Nay, you know best why you do it; but the truth is, many abound in external instances of devotion, that scarcely do themselves know why and wherefore." But he only vindicates the practice of his disciples; when they had nothing to say for themselves, he had something ready to say for them. Note, As it is wisdom's honour to be justified of all her children, so it is her children's happiness to be all justified of wisdom.

What do we according to the precept and pattern of Christ, he will be sure to hear us out in, and we may with confidence leave it to him to clear up our integrity.

But thou shalt answer, Lord, for me. Herbert.

The things Christ pleads in defence of their not fasting.

1. That it was not a season proper for that duty: (v. 13.) Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? Observe, Christ's answer is so framed, as that it might sufficiently justify the practice of his own disciples, and yet not condemn the institution of John, or the practice of his disciples. When the Pharisees fomented this dispute, they hoped Christ would cast blame, either on his own disciples, or on John's, but he did neither. Note, When at any time we are unjustly censured, our care must be only to clear ourselves, not to recriminate, or throw dirt upon others; and such a variety may there be of circumstances, as may justify us in our practice, without hardening our hearts, for the sake of the body, rather than of their other work.

Now his argument is taken from the common usage of joy and rejoicing during the continuance of marriage solemnities; when all instances of melancholy and sorrow are looked upon as improper and absurd, as it was at Samson's wedding, Judges 14. 17. Note, (1.) The disciples of Christ were the children of the bride-chamber, invited to the wedding-feast, and welcomed there; the disciples of the Pharisees were not so, but children of the bond-woman, (Gal. 4. 25, 31.) continuing under a dispensation of darkness and terror. Note, The faithful followers of Christ, who have the Spirit of adoption, have the spirit of bondage no more, and cannot any longer feel the spirit of bondage and fear, cannot rejoice for joy, as other people, Hos. 9. 1. (2.) The disciples of Christ had the bridegroom with them, which the disciples of John had not; their master was now cast into prison, and lay there in continual danger of his life, and therefore it was seasonable for them to fast of grief. Such a day would come upon the disciples of Christ, in which they might be taken from them, when they should be deprived of his bodily presence, and then should they fast. The thoughts of parting grieved them when he was going, John 16. 6. Tribulation and affliction befall them when he was gone, and gave them occasion of mourning and praying, that is, of religious fasting.

Note, [1.] Jesus Christ is the Bridegroom of a great number of children of the bride-chamber. Christ speaks of himself to John's disciples under this similitude, because that John had used it, when he called himself a friend of the bridegroom, John 3. 29. And if they would by this hint call to mind what their master then said, they would answer themselves. [2.] The condition of those who are the children of the bride-chamber is so circuitous, and so various, as it may be the man of however high degree, they may reach this world; they sing of mercy and judgment. [3.] It is mercy or melancholy with the children of the bride-chamber, according as they have more or less of the bridegroom's presence. When he is with them, the candle of God shines upon their head, and all is well; but when he is withdrawn, though but for a small moment, they are troubled, and walk heavily; the presence and nearness of the sun makes day spring, the summer, his absence and distance, night and winter. Christ is all in all to the church's joy. [4.] Every duty is to be done in its proper season. See Eccles. 7. 14. Jam. 5. 13. There is a time to mourn and a time to laugh, to each of which we should accommodate ourselves, and bring forth fruit in due season. In fasts, regard is to be had to the methods of God's grace towards us; when he mourns to us, we must lament; and also to the dispensations of his providence concerning us; there are times when the Lord God calls to weeping and mourning; regard is likewise to be had to any special work before us, ch. 17. 21. Acts 13. 2. 2. That they had not strength sufficient for that duty. This is set forth in two similitudes, one, of putting new wine into old bottles, which does but burst the bottles, v. 17. Christ's disciples were not able to bear these severe exercises so well as those of John and of the Pharisees, which the learned Dr. Whitby gives this reason for: There were among the Jews not only sects of the Pharisees and Essenes, who led an austere life, but also schools of the samie pharisees, who frequently lived in mountains and deserts, and were many of them Nazarites; they had also private academies to train men up in a strict discipline; and possibly from these many of John's disciples might come, and many of the Pharisees; whereas Christ's disciples, being taken immediately from their callings, had not been used to such religious austerities, or other things, as were required by the bridegroom, rather unfit for their other work.

Note, (1.) Some duties of religion are harder and more difficult than others, like new cloth, and new wine, which require most intemperance of mind, and are most displeasing to flesh and blood; such are religious fasting and the duties that attend it. (2.) The best of Christ's disciples pass through a state of infancy; all the trees in Christ's garden must bear fruit, or all his scholars in the same form; there are babes in Christ and grown men. (3.) In
18. While he spake these things unto them, behold, there came a certain ruler and worshipped him, saying, My daughter is even now dead: but come and lay thy hand upon her, and she shall live. 19. And Jesus arose and followed him, and so did his disciples. 20. (And, behold, a woman, which was diseased with an issue of blood twelve years, came behind him, and touched the hem of his garment: 21. For she said within herself, If I may but touch his garment, I shall be whole. 22. But Jesus turned him about, and when he saw her, he said, Daughter, be of good comfort: thy faith hath made thee whole. And the woman was made whole from that hour.) 23. And when Jesus came into the ruler’s house, and saw the minstrels and the people making a noise. 24. He said unto them, Give place; for the maid is not dead, but sleepeth. And they laughed him to scorn. 25. But when the people were put forth, he went in, and took her by the hand, and the maid arose. 26. And the fame hereof went abroad into all that land.

We have here two passages of story put together: that of the raising of Jairus’ daughter to life, and that of the curing of the woman that had the bloody issue, as he was going to Jairus’ house, which is introduced in a parenthesis, in the midst of the other; for Christ’s miracles were thick sown, and interwoven; the work of him that sent him was his daily work. He was called to do these good works from speaking the things foregoing, in answer to the envious of the Pharisees, v. 18. While he spake these things; and we may suppose it a pleasing interruption given to that unpleasant work of disputa- tion, which, though sometimes needful, a good man will gladly leave, to go about a work of devotion or charity. Here is, 1. The mode of address to Christ, v. 18. A certain ruler, a ruler of the synagogue, came and worshipped him. Have any of the rulers believed on him? Yes, here was one, a church-ruler, whose faith condemned the unbelief of the rest of the rulers. This ruler had a little daughter, of twelve years old, just dead, and this breach made upon his family com- forts was the occasion of his coming to Christ. Note, In trouble we should visit God: the death of our relations should drive us to Christ, who is our life; it is well if any thing will do it. When affliction is in our families, we must not sit down astonished, but, as Job, fall down and worship. Now observe, 1. His humility in this address to Christ. He came with his criad to Christ himself, and did not send a servant. Note, It is no disparagement to us to come direct to the Lord Jesus. He worshipped him, bowed the knee to him, and gave him all imaginable respect. Note, They that would receive mercy from Christ must give honour to Christ. 2. His faith in this address; “My daughter is even now dead, and though any other physician would now come too late, (nothing more absurd than fast morts, in medecina—absurd for his doctor,) Christ comes not too late; he is a physician after death, for he is the resurrection and the life; O come then, and lay thy hand upon her, and she shall live.” This was quite above the power of nature, (a privation ad habitum non datur regressus—life once lost cannot be restored,) yet within the power of Christ, who has life in himself, and quickeneth whom he will. Now Christ works in an ordinary way, not by force and not against the current, he then did not in faith bring him such a request as this; while there is life there is hope, and room for prayer; but when our friends are dead, the case is determined; we shall go to them, but they shall not return to us. But while Christ was here upon earth working miracles, such a confidence as this was not only allowable but very commendable. 11. The readiness of Christ to comply with his address, v. 19. Jesus immediately arose, left his company, and followed him; he was not only willing to grant him what he desired, in raising his daughter to life, but to gratify him so far as to come to his house to do it. Surely he never said to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain. He denied to go along with the nobleman, who said, Sir, come down, ere my child die, (John 4. 48, 49, 50.) yet he went along with the ruler of the synagogue, who said, Sir, come down, and my child shall live. The variety of methods which Christ took in working his miracles, is perhaps to be attributed to the different frame and temper of mind, which they were in who applied to him, which he who searcheth the heart, perfectly knew, and accommodated himself to. He knows what is in man, and what course to take with him. And observe, when Jesus followed him, so did his disciples, whom he had chosen for his companions; it was not for state, or that he might come with observation, that he took his attendants with him, but that they might be the witnesses of his miracles, who were hereafter to be the preachers of his doctrine. 111. The healing of the poor woman’s bloody issue. I call her a poor woman, not only because her case was piteous, but because, though she had something in the world, she had disorders which rendered her destitute of the cure of her distemper, and was never the better; which was a double aggravation of the misery of her condition, that she had been full, but was now empty; and that she had impoverished herself for the recovery of her health, and yet had not her health neither. This woman was diseased with a constant issue of blood twelve years; (v. 20.) a disease, which was not only weakening and wasting, but which made her the most unclean, and shut her out from the courts of the Lord’s house; but it did not cut her off from approaching to Christ. She applied herself to Christ, and received mercy from him, by the way, as he followed the ruler, whose daughter was dead, to whom a would be a great encouragement, and a help to keep up his faith in the power of Christ. So graciously does Christ consider the frame, and consult the case, of weak believers. [163]

1. The woman's great faith in Christ, and in his power. Her disease was of such a nature, that her modesty would not suffer her to seek openly to Christ for a cure, as others did, but, by a peculiar impulse of the Spirit of faith, she believed him to have such an overwhelming fulness of healing virtue, that the very touch of his garment would be her cure. This, perhaps, had something of fancy mixed with faith; for she had heard but this way of application to Christ, unless, as some think, she had an eye to the raising of the dead man by the touch of Elisha's bones, 2 Kings 13. 21. But what weakness of understanding there was in it, Christ was pleased to overlook, and to accept the sincerity and strength of her faith; for he eateth the honey-comb with the honey, Cant. 4. 11. She believed she should be healed if she did but touch the very hem of his garment, the extremity of it. Note, There is virtue in every thing that belongs to Christ. The holy oil with which the high-priest was anointed, ran down to the skirts of his garments, Ps. 133. 2. Such a fulness of grace is there in Christ, that from it we may all receive, John 1. 16.

2. Christ's great favour to this woman. He did not despise (as he might have done) his healing influence from the touch of his garment. He called her dead patient to stand upon a cure unknown to any one else, though she could not think to do it unknown to him. And now she was well content to be gone, for she had what she came for, but Christ was not willing to let her go; he will not only have his power magnified in her cure, but his grace magnified in her comfort and commendation: the triumphs of her faith must be to her praise and honour. He turned about to see for her, (v. 22.) and soon discovered her. Note, It is great encouragement to humble Christians, that they who hide themselves from men, are known to Christ, who sees in secret their applications to heaven when most private. Now here,

(1.) He puts gladness into her heart, by that word, Daughter, be of good comfort. She feared being chidden for coming clandestinely, but she is encouraged to be of good courage. He called her daughter with the tenderness of a father, as he did to the man sick of the palsy, (v. 2.) whom he called son. Note, Christ has comforts ready for the daughters of Zion, that are of a sorrowful spirit, as Hannah was, 1 Sam. 1. 15. Believing women are Christ's daughters, and he will own them as such. [2.] He bids her be of good comfort: she has reason to be so, if Christ own her for a daughter. Note, the saint's consolation is founded in their adoption. His bidding her be comforted, brought comfort with it, as his saying be ye whole, brought health with it. Note, It is the will of Christ that his people should be comforted, and it is his prerogative to command comfort to troubled spirits. He creates the fruit of his lips, peace, Isa. 57. 19.

3. He puts honour upon her faith. That grace of all others gave most honour to Christ, and therefore he puts most honour upon it; Thy faith has made thee whole. By, faith she obtained a good report. And as of all graces Christ puts the greatest honour upon faith, so of all believers he puts the greatest honour upon those that are most humble; as here on this woman, who had more faith than she thought she had. She has reason to be of good comfort, not only because she was made whole, but because her faith had made her whole; that is, [1.] She was spiritually healed; that cure was wrought in her which is the proper fruit and effect of faith, the pardon of sin and the work of grace. Note, We may then be abundantly comforted in our temporal mercies when they are accompanied with those spiritual blessings that resemble them; our food and raiment will be comfortable, when by faith we are fed with the bread of life, and clothed with the clothing of righteousness. [2.] Her bodily cure was the fruit of faith, of her faith, and that made it a happy, comfortable cure indeed. They out of whom the devils were cast, were helped by Christ's grave comforts rather by the faith of others; (v. 21.) but it is thy faith that has made thee whole. Note, Temporal mercies are then comforts indeed to us, when they are received by faith. If, when in pursuit of mercy, we pray for it in faith, with an eye to the promise, and in dependence upon that, if we desired it for the sake of God's glory, and with a resignation to God's will, and have our hearts enlarged by it in faith, love, and obedience, we may then say, it was received by faith.

IV. The posture in which he found the ruler's house, v. 15. He saw the people and the minstrels, or musicians, making a noise. The house was in a hurry; such work does death make, when it comes into a family; and, perhaps, the necessary cares that arise at such a time, when our dead is to be decently buried out of our sight, give some useful ill

v. Sometimes, when the sorrow of the world prevails, it is difficult for Christ and his comforts to enter. They that harden themselves in sorrow, and, like Rachel, refuse to be comforted, should think they hear Christ saving to their disquieting thoughts, Give place: "Make room for him who is the Consolation of Israel, and brings with him strong consolations, strong enough to overcome the confusion and tyranny of these worldly griefs, if he may but be admitted into the soul." He gives a good reason why they should not thus disquiet themselves and one another; The mourner is not comforted, but strengthened. 1. This was eminently true of this maid, that was immediately to be raised to life; she was really dead, but not so to Christ, who knew within himself what he would do, and could do, and who had determined to make her death but as a sleep. There is little more difference between sleep and death, but in continuance; whatever other difference there is, it is but a dream. This death must be but of short continuance, and therefore is but a sleep, like one night's rest. He that quickens the dead, may well call the things which be not as though they were, Rom. 4. 17. 2. It is in a sense true of all that die, chiefly of them that die in the Lord. Now: They live again, and there is a new and everlasting life. All nations and languages, for the softening of that which is so dreadful, and withal so unavoidable, and the reconceiving of themselves to it, have agreed to call it so. It is said, even of the wicked kings, that they slept with their fathers; and of those that shall arise to everlasting contempt, that they sleep in the dust, Dan. 12. 2. It is not the sleep of the soul; its activity ceases not; but the sleep of the body, which lies down in the grave, still and silent, regardless and disregarded, wrapped up in darkness and obscurity. Sleep is a short death, and death a long sleep. But the death of the righteous is in a special manner to be looked upon as a sleep, Isa. 57. 2. They sleep in Jesus; (1 Thess. 4. 14.) they not only rest from the toils and labours of the day, but rest in hope of a joyful waking again in the morning of the resurrection, when they shall awake refreshed, wake to a new life, which shall be to be richly dressed and crowned, and wake to sleep no more. (2.) The consideration of this should moderate our grief at the death of our dear relations: "say not, they are lost; no, they are but gone before; say not, they are slain, no, they are but fallen asleep; and the apostle speaks of it as an absurd thing to imagine that they that are fallen asleep in Christ are punished; (1 Cor. 15. 19.) give place, therefore, to these confusions which the covenant of grace ministers, fetched from the future state, and the glory to be revealed."

Now could it be thought that such a comfortable word as this, from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, should be ridiculed as it was? They laughed him to scorn. These people lived in Capernaum, knew Christ's character, that he never spake a rash or foolish word; they knew how many mighty works he had done; so that if they did not understand what he meant by this, they might at least have been silent in expectation of the issue. Note, The words and works of Christ which cannot be understood, yet are not therefore to be despised. We must adore the mystery of divine sayings, even when they seem to contradict what we think ourselves most confident of. Yet even this tended to the confirmation of the miracle; for it seems she was so apparently dead, that it was thought a very ridiculous thing to say otherwise.

VI. The raising of the damsel to life by the power of Christ, v. 23. "The people were put forth. Note, Scorner that laugh at what they see and hear that is above their capacity, are not proper judges of the wonderful works of Christ, the glory of which lies not in pomp, but in power. The widow's son at Nain was not raised from the dead openly, but this damsel privately; for Capernaum, that had slighted the lesser miracles of restoring health, was unworthy to see the greater, of restoring life; these pearls were not to be cast before those that would trample them under their feet. Christ went in and took her by the hand, as it were to awake her, and to help her up, prosecuting his own metaphor of her being asleep. The high-priest, the Levitical priest, the Levitical order (Lev. 21. 10, 11.) but Christ touched the dead. The Levitical priesthood leaves the dead in their uncleanness, and therefore keeps at a distance from them, because it cannot remedy them; but Christ, having power to raise the dead, is above the infection, and therefore is not shy of touching them. He took her by the hand, and the maid arose. So easily, so effectually was the miracle wrought; not by prayer, as Elijah did, (1 Kings 17. 21.) and Elisha, (2 Kings 4. 35.) but by a touch. They did it as servants, he as a Son, as a God, to whom belong the names from death. Note, Jesus Christ is the Lord of souls, he commands them forth, and commands them back, when and as he pleases. Dead souls are not raised to spiritual life, unless Christ take them by the hand, when he is come. He helps us up, or we lie still.

VII. The general notice that was taken of this miracle, though it was wrought privately; v. 26. The fame thereof went abroad into all that land; it was the common subject of discourse. Note, Christ's works are more talked of than considered and improved. And doubtless, they that heard only the report of Christ's miracles, were accountable for that as well as they that were eye-witnesses of them. Though we at this distance have not seen Christ's miracles, yet having an authentic history of them, we are bound, upon the credit of that, to receive his doctrine; and blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed, John 20. 29.

27. And when Jesus departed thence, two blind men followed him, crying, and saying, Thou Son of David, have mercy on us. 28. And when he was come into the house, the blind men came to him: and Jesus saith unto them, Believe ye that I am able to do this? They said unto him, Yea, Lord. 29. Then touched he their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you. 30. And their eyes were opened; and Jesus straitly charged them saying, See that no man know it. 31. But they, when they were departed, spread abroad his fame in all that country. 32. As they went out, behold, they brought to him a dumb man possessed with a devil. 33. And when the devil was cast out, the dumb spake: and the multitude marvelled, saying, It was never so seen in Israel. 34. But the Pharisees said, He casteth out devils through the prince of the devils. In these verses we have an account of two more miracles wrought together by our Saviour.

1. The giving of sight to two blind men, v. 27—31. Christ is the Fountain of light as well as life; and as, by raising the dead, he showed himself to be the same that at first breathed into man the breath of life, so, by giving sight to the blind, he showed himself to be the same that at first commanded the light to shine out of darkness. Observe, The impartation of sight to the blind men to Christ. He was returning from the ruler's house to his own lodgings, and these blind men followed him, as beggars do, with their incessant cries, v. 27. He that cured diseases so easily, so effectually, and, withal, at so cheap a rate, shall have patients enough. As for other things, so he is famed for an Oculist. Observe, (1.) The time, which these blind men came to Christ; Thou Son of David, have mercy on us. The promise made to David, that of his lines the Messiah should come, was well known, and the Messiah was therefore commonly called the Son of David. At this time there was a general expectation of his appearing; these blind men knew, and own, and proclaim it in the streets of Capernaum, that he is come, and that this is he; which aggravates the folly and sin of the chief priests and Phar.
Christ is able to do for us, by the power of his merit and intercession in heaven, of his Spirit and grace in the heart, and of his providence and dominion in the world. To believe the power of Christ, is not only to assure ourselves of it, but to account ourselves to it, and encourage ourselves in it.

To this question they give an immediate answer, without hesitation; they said, Yea, Lord. Though he had kept them in suspense a while, and had not helped them at first, they honestly imputed that to his wisdom, not to his weakness, and were still confident of his ability.

The measures of mercy are laid up in the power of Christ, are laid out and wrought for those that trust in him, Ps. 31. 19.

3. The cure that Christ wrought on them; he touched their eyes, v. 29. This he did to encourage their faith, which, by his delay, he had tried, and to show that he gives sight to blind souls by the operations of his grace accompanying the word, anointing the eyes with eyesalve: and he put the cure upon their faith, According to your faith be it unto you. When they begged for a cure, he inquired into their faith, (v. 28.) Believe ye that I am able? He did not inquire into their wealth, whether they were able to pay him for a cure; nor into their reputation, should he get credit by curing them; but into their faith; and now they had professed their faith he referred the matter to that: "I know you do believe, and that ye are able; but that faith is not all; according to your faith be it unto you;" According to your faith be it unto you. This speaks, (1.) His knowledge of the sincerity of their faith, and his acceptance and approbation of it. Note, It is a great comfort to true believers, that Jesus Christ knows their faith, and is well pleased with it. Though it be weak, through others do not discern it, though they themselves are ready to question it, it is known to him. (2.) His desire that all who believe may take what he came to give; Believe ye that I am able, take what you come for. Note, They who apply themselves to Jesus Christ, shall be dealt with according to their faith; not according to their fines, not according to their profession, but, according to their faith; that is, unbelievers cannot expect to find any favour with God, but true believers may be sure to find all that favour which is offered in the gospel, according to their faith. "I know you do believe, and therefore I give you the cure; But that faith is stronger or weaker; We are not straitened in Christ, let us not then be straitened in ourselves.

4. The charge he gave them to keep it private, (v. 30.) See that no man know it. He gave them this charge, (1.) To set us an example of that humility and lowliness of mind, which he would have us to learn of him. Note, In the good we do, we must not seek our own praise, but only the glory of God: It must be more our care and endeavour to be useful, than to be known and observed to be so, Prov. 20. 6.—25. 27. Thus Christ seconded the rule he had given, Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth. (2.) Some think that Christ, in keeping it private, showed his displeasure against the people of Capernaum, who had seen so many mighty works in Jesus of Nazareth, and yet would not believe: Thus he scourged some of those who should proclaim the works of Christ, is a judgment to any place or people; and it is just with Christ, to deny the means of conviction to those that are obstinate in their infidelity; and to shroud the light from those that shut their eyes against it. (3.) He did it in discretion for his own preservation; because the more he was proclaimed, the more his power would perplex the thoughts of all who should have an eye to his coming interest among the people. (4.) Dr. Whitby gives another reason, which is very considerable, why Christ sometimes concealed his miracles, and afterwards forbid the publishing of his transfiguration; because he would not indulge that pernicious conceit which obtained among the Jews, that their...
Messiah should be a temporal prince, and so give occasion to the people to attempt the setting up of his kingdom, by tumults and seditions, as they offered to do, John 6. 15. But when, after his resurrection, (which was the full proof of his mission,) his spiritual kingdom was set up, then that danger was over, and they must be published to all nations. And he observes, that the miracles which Christ wrought among the Gentiles and the Samaritans, were ordered to be published, because with them there was that danger.

But honour is like the shadow, which, as it flies from those that follow it, so it follows those that fly from it; (v. 31.) They spread abroad his fame. This was more an act of zeal, than of prudence; and though it may be excused as honestly meant for the honour of Christ, yet it cannot be justified, being done against a particular charge. Whenever we profess to direct our attention to the glory of God, we must see to it that the action be according to the will of God.

11. The healing of a dumb man, that was possessed with a devil. And here observe,

1. His case, which was very sad. He was under the power of the devil in this particular instance, that he was disabled from speaking; v. 32. See the calamitous state of this world, and how varied the afflictions are among mankind. We have no sooner dismissed two blind men, but we meet with a dumb man. How thankful should we be to God for our sight and speech! See the malice of Satan against mankind, and how many ways he shows it! This man's dumbness was the effect of his being possessed with a devil; but it was better he should be unable to say any thing, than be forced to say, as those demons did. (ch. 8. 29.) But this had been done to the two blind men, and the dumb devil than a blaspheming one. When the devil gets possession of a soul, it is made silent as to any thing that is good; dumb in prayers and praises, which the devil is a sworn enemy to. This poor creature they brought to Christ, who entertained not only those that came of themselves in their own faith, but those that were brought to him by their friends in the faith of others. They had in the just shall live eternally by his faith, yet temporal mercies may be bestowed on us with an eye to their faith who are intercessors on our behalf. They brought him in just as the blind man went out. See how unwearyed Christ was in doing good; how closely one good work followed another! Treasures of mercy, wondrous mercy, are hid in him; which may be continually communicated, but can never be exhausted.

2. His cure, which was very sudden, (v. 33.) When the devil was cast out, the dumb spake. Note, Christ's cures strike at the root, and remove the effect by taking away the cause; they open the lips, by breaking Satan's power in the soul. In sanctification he heals the waters by casting salt into the spring. When Christ, by his grace, casts the devil out of a soul, presently the dumb speaks. When Paul was converted, behold, he prays; then the dumb speaks. (2 Cor. 11. 13.)

3. The consequences of this cure.

(1.) The multitudes marvelled; and well they might; few believed, many wondered. The admiration of the common people is sooner raised than any other affectation. It was foretold, that the new song, the New-Testament song, should be sung for marvellous works, Ps. 98. 1. They said, It was never so seen in Israel, and therefore never so seen anywhere; for no people experienced such wonders of mercy as Israel did. There had been those in Israel that were famous for working miracles, but Christ excelled them all. The miracles Moses wrought had reference to Israel as a people, but Christ's were brought home to particular persons.

(2.) The Pharisees blasphemed, v. 34. When they could not gainsay the convincing evidence of these miracles, they gathered them upon the devil, as if they had been wrought by compact and collusion: he casteth out devils (say they,) by the prince of the devils—a suggestion horrid beyond expression; we shall hear more of it afterwards, and Christ's answer to it; (ch. 12. 25.) only observe here, how evil men and seducers were worse and soon (2 Tim. 3. 13.) and it be both true and his punishment. Their quarrels with Christ for taking upon him to forgive sin, (v. 3.) for conversing with publicans and sinners, (v. 11.) for not fasting, (v. 14.) though spiritual enough, yet had some colour of piety, purity, and devotion in them; but this (which they are left to, to punish them for these,) breathes nothing but malice and falsehood, and hellish enmity in the highest degree; it is diabolism all over. And observe, it is the devil they so marvelled at, and they said, and this was all they could say.

35. And Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom and healing every sickness and every disease among the people. 36. But when he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion on them, because they fainted, and were scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd. 37. Then said he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few: 38. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into the harvest.

Here is,

1. A conclusion of the foregoing account of Christ's preaching and miracles; (v. 35.) He went about all the cities teaching and healing. This is the same we had before, ch. 4. 23.) There it is in the more particular record of Christ's preaching, (ch. 5. 6. and 7.) and of his cures, (ch. 8. and 9.) and here it is elegantly repeated in the close of these instances, as the quod erat demonstrandum—the point to be proved; as if the evangelist should say, "Now I hope I have made it out, by an induction of particulars, that Christ preached and healed; for you have had the heads of his sermons, and some few instances of his cures, which were warranted to confirm his doctrine; and these were written that you might believe." Some think that this was a second parabola in Galilee, like the former; he visited again those whom he had before preached to. Though the Pharisees cavilled at him and opposed him, he went on with his work; he preached the gospel of the kingdom. He told them of a kingdom of grace and glory, now to be set up under the government of a Mediator: this was gospel indeed, good news, glad tidings of great joy.

Observe how Christ in his preaching had respect.

1. To the private towns. He visited not only the great and wealthy cities, but the poor, obscure villages; there he preached, there he healed. The souls of those that are meanest in the world are as precious to Christ, and should be to us, as the souls of those that make the greatest figure. Rich and poor meet together in him, citizens and beasts: his righteous acts toward the inhabitants of his villages must be rehearsed, Judges 5. 11.

2. To the public worship. He taught in their synagogues, (1.) That he might bear a testimony to solemn assemblies, even then when there were cor raptions in them. We must not forsake the assemble-ing of ourselves together, as also the callings of our God and Lord. (2.) That he might have an opportunity of preaching there, where people were gathered together, with an expectation to hear. Thus, even where the gospel-church was founded, and christian meetings erected, the apostles often preached in the synagogues of the Jews. It is the wisdom of the prudent, to make the best of that which is.

1. He pitied them, and was concerned for them; (v. 36.) He was moved with compassion on them; not upon a temporal account, as he pitied the blind, dumb, and withered, but upon a spiritual account. He was concerned to see them ignorant and careless, and ready to perish for lack of vision. Note, Jesus Christ is a very compassionate Friend to precious souls; here his bowels do swell in a special manner yearn. It was pity to souls that brought him from heaven to earth, and there to the cross. Misery is the object of mercy; and the miseries of sinful, self-destroying souls, are the greatest miseries. Christ's emotions those most that pity themselves least; so should we. The most Christian compassion is compassion to souls; it is most Christ-like.

See what moved this pity. (1.) They fainted; they were destitute, vexed, wearied. They strayed, sosome; were lost one from another; The staff of bands was broken, Zech. 11. 14. They wanted help for their souls, and had none at hand that was good for any thing. The Scribes and Pharisees filled them with vain notions, burdened them with the traditions of the elders, deluded them into many mistakes, while they were not instructed in their duty, nor acquainted with the extent and spiritual nature of the divine law; therefore they fainted; for what spiritual health, and life, and vigour can there be in that soul, that is filled with husks and ashes, instead of the bread of life? 10. Like a sheep, and when gone astray, more helpless, shiftless, and exposed, or more unfit to find the way home again; sinful souls are as lost sheep; they need the care of shepderds to bring them back. The teachers the Jews then had, pretended to be shepherds, yet Christ says they had no shepherds, for they were worse than none; idio-shepherds that led them away, instead of leading them; that astray, instead of feeding it; such shepherds as were described, Jer. 23. 1, &c. Ezek. 24. 2, 8c. Note, The case of those people is very pitiable, who either have no ministers at all, or those that are as bad as none; that seek their own things, not the things of Christ and souls.

2. He excited his disciples to pray for them. His pity was for the souls of these people. It appears, (Luke 6. 12, 13.) that when he was at this occasion, before he sent out his apostles, he did himself spend a great deal of time in prayer. Note, These we pity we should pray for. Having spoken to God for them, he turns to his disciples, and tells them,

(1.) How the case stood; (v. 57.) The harvest truly is plentiful, but the labourers are few. People desired good preaching, but there were few good preachers. There was a great deal of work to be done, and a great deal of good likely to be done, but there wanted hands to do it. (1.) It was an exceptional thing for the apostles to be required. It was not strange, that there were multitudes that needed instruction, but it was what does not often happen, that they who needed it, desired it, and were forward to receive it. They that were ill taught were desirous to be better taught; people's expectations were raised, and there was such a moving of affections as promised well. Note, It is a good thing, to see people's loves growing, but not for them. The valleys are then covered over with corn, and there are hopes it may be well gathered in. That is a gale of opportunity, that calls for a double care and diligence in the improvement of; a harvest-day should be a busy day. (2.) It was pity when it was so, that the labourers should be so few; that the corn should be shed and spoil, and not upon the' head: and not only the disciples must be few, but the labourers very few. Note, It is ill with the church, when good work stands still, or goes slowly on, for want of good workmen; when it is so, the labourers that there are, have need to be very busy.

(2.) What was their duty in this case, (v. 38.) Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest. Note, The melancholy aspect of the times, and the deplodable state of the precious souls, should much excite us to quicken prayer. When things look discouraging, we should pray more, and then we should complain and fear less. And we should adapt our prayers to the present exigencies of the church; such an understanding we ought to have of the times, as to know, not only what Israel ought to do, but what Israel ought to pray for. Note, (1.) God is the Lord of the harvest; my Father is the husbandman, John 14. 1. It is the vineyard of the Lord of hosts, Isa. 5. 7. It is for him, and to him, and to his service and honour, that the harvest is gathered in. Ye are God's husbandry; (1 Cor. 3. 9.) his thriving, and the corn of his floor, Isa. 21. 10. He orders every thing concerning the harvest as he pleases; when and where the labourers shall work, and how long; and it is very comfortable to those who wish well to the harvest, to find that their own selves presides in it, who will be sure to order all for the best. (2.) Ministers are, and should be, labourers in God's harvest; the ministry is a work, and must be attended to accordingly; his harvest-work, which is needful work; work that requires every thing to be done in its season, and diligence to do it thoroughly; but it is pleasant work; they reap in joy, and the joy of the preachers of the gospel is a great reward; Isa. 61. 7. (3.) He that receiveth wages, he that receiveth the hire of the labourers that reap down God's field, shall not be kept back, as theirs was, Jer. 3. 4. (3.) It is God's work to send forth labourers; Christ makes ministers; (Eph. 4. 11.) the office is of his appointing, the qualifications of his working, the call of his giving. They will not be owned nor paid as public officers, as in other things; they must themselves be qualified, uncall ed. How shall they preach except they be sent? (4.) All that love Christ and souls, should show it by their earnest prayers to God, especially when the harvest is plentiful, that he would send forth more skillful, faithful, wise, and industrious labourers into his harvest; that he would raise up such instruments, as be in the harvest, and the edification of souls; he would give them a spirit for the work, call them to it, and succeed them in it; that he would give them wisdom to win souls, that he would thrust forth labourers, so some; intimating unwillingness in them to go forth, because of their own weakness and the people's badness, and opposition from men that endeavour to thrust them out of the harvest; but we should pray that all contradiction from within, and from without, may be conquered and got over. Christ puts his friends upon praying this, just before he sends them forth in to labour in the harvest. Note, It is a good sign God is about to bestow some special mercy upon a people, when he stirs up those that have an interest at the throne of grace, to pray for it, Ps. 10. 17. Further observe, that Christ said this to his disciples, who were to be employed as labourers. They must pray, First, That God would send them forth. Here am I, Lord, send me, Isa. 6. 8. The sending forth, or calling, is the most likely to be successful; Paul is a chosen vessel, for behold he prays, Acts 9. 11, 15. Secondly, That he would send others forth. Note, Not the people only, but those who are themselves ministers, should pray for the increase of ministers. Though self-interest makes those that seek their own things desirous to be placed alone, (the fewer ministers the more preferments,) yet those that love the house of Christ, desire more workmen, that more work may be done, though they be eclipsed by it.

CHAP. X.

This chapter is an ordination sermon, which our Lord Jesus preached, when he advanced his twelve disciples to the deaconship. In the close of the foregoing chapter, he had stirred up them and others to pray that God would send forth labourers, and here we have an immediate answer to that prayer; while they are yet speaking he hears and performs. What we pray for, according to Christ's direction, shall be given. Now here we have, I. The general commission that was given them, v. 1. 11. The names of the persons to whom this commission was given, v. 2. 4. III. The instructions that were given them, which are very full and particular: 1. Concerning the services they were to do; their preaching; their working miracles; to whom they must apply themselves; how they must behave themselves; and in what method they must proceed, v. 5. 13. 2. Concerning the sufferings they were to undergo. They are told what they should suffer, and from whom; counsels are given them what course to take when persecuted, and encouragements to bear up cheerfully under their sufferings, v. 16. 42. These things, though primarily intended for direction to the apostles, are of use to all Christ's ministers, with whom, by his word, Christ is, and will he always to the end of the world. 1. AND when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of disease. 2. Now the names of the twelve apostles are these: The first, Simon, who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother: James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother; 3. Philip, and Bar-tholomew; Thomas, and Matthew the publican; James the son of Alpheus; and Leb-beus, whose surname was Thaddæus; 4. Simon the Canaanite, and Judas Iscariot, who also betrayed him. Here we are told, 1. Who they were that Christ ordained to be his apostles or ambassadors; they were his disciples, v. 1. He had called them some time before to be disciples, his immediate followers and constant attendants, and he then told them that they should be made fishers of men, which promise he now performed. Note, Christ commonly confers honours and graces by degrees; the light of both, like that of the morning, shines more and more. All this while Christ had kept these twelve, 1. In a state of probation. Though he knew what is in man, though he knew from the first what was in them, (John 6. 70.) yet he took this method to give an example to his church. Note, The ministry being a great trust, it is fit that men should be tried while they are in it, till they be first proved, 1 Tim. 3. 10. Therefore hands must not be laid suddenly on any man, but let him first be observed as a candidate and probationer, a proposant, (that is the term the French churches use,) because some men's sins go before, others follow, 1 Tim. 3. 2. 2. In a state of preparation. All this while he had been fitting them for this great work. Note, Thesedisciples must first be prepared and qualified, in some measure, for it. He prepared them, 1. By taking them to be with him; Note, The best preparative for the work of the ministry, is acquaintance and communion with Jesus Christ. They that would serve Christ, must first be with him, (John 12. 26.) Paul had Christ revealed, not only to him, but in him, before he went to preach him among the Gentiles, Gal. 1. 16. By the frequent exercise of prayer and meditation, that fellowship with Christ must be maintained and kept up, which is a requisite qualification for the work of the ministry. 2. By teaching them; they were with him as scholars or pupils, and he taught them privately, besides the benefit they derived from his public preaching: he opened the scriptures to them, and opened their understandings to understand the scriptures; to them it was given to know the secrets of the kingdom of heaven, and to them they were made plain. Note, They that design to be teachers must first learn; they must receive, that they may give; they must be able to teach others, 2 Tim. 2. 2. Gospel-truths must be first committed to them, before they be commissioned to be gospel-ministers. To give men authority to teach others, that have not an ability, is but a mockery to God and the church; it is an injustice to the persons that receive it, and a great injury to the cause of God. Note, In the case of their commission, he gave them more ample instructions, Acts 1. 3. II. What the commission was that he gave them. 1. He called them to him, v. 1. He had called them to come after him before, now he calls them to be with him, admits them to his company, and will not let them keep at such a distance as they had hitherto observed. They that humble themselves shall thus be exalted. The priests under the law were said to draw near and approach unto God, nearer than the people; the same may be said of gospel-ministers; they are called to draw near to Christ, which, as it is an honour, so should strike an awe upon them, remembering that Christ will not be satisfied with the formalities of their service, if it is observable, that when the disciples were to be instructed, they came unto him of their own accord, ch. 5. 1. But now they were to be ordained, he called them. Note, It well becomes the disciples of Christ to be more forward to learn than to teach. In the sense of our own ignorance, we must seek opportunities to be taught; and in the same sense we must wait for a call, a clear call, ere we take upon us to teach others; for no man ought to take this honour upon himself. 2. He gave them power, εξουσία, authority in his name, to command men to obedience, and for the confirmation of that authority, to command devils too into a subjection. Note, All rightful authority is derived from Jesus Christ. All power is given to him without limitation, and the subordinate powers that be, are ordained of him. Some of his honour
he put on his ministers, as Moses put some of his on Joshua. Note, It is an undeniable proof of the fulness of power which Christ used as Mediator, that he could impart his power to those he employed, and enable them to work the same miracles that he wrought in his name. He gave them power over unclean spirits and over all manner of sickness. Note, The design of the gospel was to conquer the devil and to cure the world. These preachers were sent out destitute of all external advantages to recommend them; they had no wealth, nor learning, nor titles of honour, and they made a very mean figure. But remember, it required much that they should have some extraordinary power to advance them above the Scribes.

(1.) He gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out. Note, The power that is committed to the ministers of Christ, is directly levelled against the devil and his kingdom. The devil, as an unclean spirit, is working both in doctrinal errors, (Rev. 16. 13.) and in practical debauchery; (2 Pet. 2. 16.) and in both these, ministers have a charge against him. Christ gave them power to cast him out of the bodies of people; but that was to signify the destruction of his spiritual kingdom, and all the works of the devil; for which purpose the Son of God was manifested.

(2.) He gave them power to heal all manner of sickness. He authorized them to work miracles for the confirmation of their doctrine, to prove that it was of God; and they were to work useful miracles for the illustration of it, to prove that it is not only faithful, but well worthy of all acceptance; that the design of the gospel is to heal and save. Moses’s miracles were many of them for destruction; those Mahomet pretended to, were for ostentation; but the miracles Christ wrought, and appointed his apostles to perform, were all for edification, and evince him to be, not only the great Teacher and Ruler, but the great Redeemer, of the world. Observe what an emphasis is laid upon the extent of their power to all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease, without the exception even of those that are reckoned incurable, and the reproach of physicians. Note, In the grace of the gospel there is a salve for every sore, a remedy for every malady. There is no spiritual disease so malignant, so inveterate, but there is a sufficiency of power in Christ for the cure of it. Let none therefore say there is no hope, or that the breach is wide as the sea that cannot be healed.

III. The number and names of those that were commissioned; they are made apostles, that is, messengers. An angel, and an apostle, both signify the same thing—one sent on an errand, so an ambassado- dor. All faithful ministers are sent of Christ, but they that were first, and immediately, sent by him, are eminently called apostles, the prime ministers of state in his kingdom. Yet this was but the infancy of their office; it was when Christ ascended on high that he gave some apostles, Eph. 4. 11. Christ himself is called an Apostle, (Heb. 3. 1.) for he was sent of God, and so established. The prophets were called God’s messengers.

1. Their number was twelve, referring to the number of the tribes of Israel, and the sons of Jacob that were the patriarchs of those tribes. The gospel church must be the Israel of God; the Jews must be first invited into it; the apostles must be spiritual fathers, to beget a seed to Christ. Israel after the flesh is to be rejected for their infidelity, these twelve, therefore, are appointed to be the fathers of another Israel. These twelve, by their doctrine, were to judge the twelve tribes of Israel, Luke 22. 30. These were the twelve stars that made up the church’s crown; (Rev. 12. 1.) the twelve foundations of the new Jerusalem, (Rev. 21.

12. 14.) typified by the twelve precious stones in Aaron’s breast-plate, the twelve leaves on the table of shew-bread, the twelve wells of water at Elim.

This was that famous jury (and to make it a grand jury, Poule was added to it) that was imperfectly inquired between the King of kings, and the body of mankind; and, in this chapter, they have their charge given them, by him to whom all judgment was committed.

2. Their names are here left upon record, and it is their honour; yet in this they had more reason to rejoice, that their names were written in heaven, (Rev. 14.) while the high and mighty names of the great ones of the earth are buried in the dust. Observe,

(1.) There are some of these twelve apostles, of whom we know no more, from the scripture, than their names; as Bartholomew, and Simon the Canaanite; and yet they were faithful servants to Christ and his church. Note, All the good ministers of Christ are not alike famous, nor their actions alike celebrated.

(2.) They are named by couples; for at first they were sent forth two and two, because two are better than one; they would be serviceable to each other, and the more serviceable jointly to Christ and souls; what one forgot the other would remember, and out of the mouth of two witnesses every word would be established. These three couples of them were brethren; Peter and Andrew, James and John, and the other James and Lebbeus. Note, Friendship and fellowship ought to be kept up among relations, and to be made serviceable to religion. It is an excellent thing, when brethren by nature are brethren by grace, and those two bonds strengthen each other.

(3.) Peter is named first, because he was first called; or because he was the most forward man; or the apostles were given him to begin with the mouth of the rest of the apostles, nor is there the least mark of any supremacy that was given to him, or ever claimed by him, in this sacred college.

(4.) Matthew, the penman of this gospel, is here joined with Thomas, (v. 3.) but in two things there is a variation from the accounts of Mark and Luke; Mark 3. 18. Luke 6. 15. There, Matthew is put first; in that order it appears he was ordained before Thomas; but here, in his own catalogue, Thomas is put first. Note, It well becomes the disciples of Christ, in honour to prefer one another. There, he is only called Matthew, here Matthew the publican, the toll-gatherer or collector of the customs, who was called from that infamous company to be an apostle. Note, It is good for those who are advanced to honour with Christ, to look unto the rock whence they were hewn; often to remember what they were before Christ called them, that thereby they may be kept humble, and divine grace may be the more glorified. Matthew the apostle was Matthew the publican.

(5.) Simon is called the Canaanite, or rather the Canaean, (v. 10.) which signifies, that he was probably he was born; or Simon the Zelot, which some make to be the signification of Katanien.

(6.) Judas Iscariot is always named last, and with that black brand upon his name, who also betrayed him; which intimates, that from the first, Christ knew what a wretch he was, that he had a devil, and would prove a traitor; yet Christ took him among his apostles, that it might not be a surprise and discouragement to his church, if, at any time, the vilest scandals should break out in the best societies. Such spots there have been in our feasts of charity; tares among the wheat, wolves among the sheep; but there is a day of discovery and separation coming, when hypocrites shall be unmasked.
and discarded. Neither the apostleship, nor the rest of the apostles, were ever the worse for Judas's being one of the twelve, while his wickedness was concealed and did not break out.

5. These twelve Jesus sent forth, and commanded them, saying, Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: 6. But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. 7. And, as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. 8. Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils: freely ye have received, freely give. 9. Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass, in your purses: 10. Nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves: for the workman is worthy of his meat. 11. And into whatsoever city or town ye shall enter, inquire who in it is worthy; and there abide till ye go thence. 12. And when ye come into an house, salute it. 13. And if the house be worthy, let your peace come upon it: but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you. 14. And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house, or city, shake off the dust of your feet. 15. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city.

We have here the instructions that Christ gave to his disciples, when, he gave them their commission. Whether this charge was given them in a continued discourse, or the several articles of it hinted to them at several times, is not material: in this, if they preach them. Jacob's blessing his sons, is called his commanding them, and with these commands Christ commanded a blessing. Observe,

1. The people to whom he sent them. These ambassadors are directed what places to go to.

1. Not to the Gentiles nor the Samaritans. They must not go into the way of the Gentiles, nor into any road out of the land of Israel, whatever temptations they might have. The Gentiles must not have the gospel brought them, till the Jews have first refused it. As to the Samaritans, who were the posterity of that menedel people that the king of Assyria plant

II. The preaching work which he appointed them. He did not send them forth without an errand: no, As ye go, preach, v. 7. They were to itinerant preachers: wherever they came they must proclaim the beginning of the gospel, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Not that they must say nothing else, but this must be their text: on this subject they must engage. let people know that it is

13. The mission of the Messiah, who is the Lord from heaven, is now to be set up according to the scriptures; from whence it follows, that men must repent of their sins and forsake them, that they might be admitted to the privileges of that kingdom. It is said, (Mark 6. 12.) they went out and preached that men should repent, which was the proper use and application of this doctrine, concerning the approach of the kingdom of heaven. They must, therefore, be prepared to hear more of this long looked for Messiah shortly, and must be ready to receive his doctrine, to believe in him, and to submit to his yoke. The preaching of this was like the morning light, to give notice of the approach of the rising sun. How unlike was this to the preaching of Jonah, which proclaimed ruin at hand! Jonah 3. 4. This proclaims salvation at hand, nigh them that fear God; much and truly mighty to them in whom is the kingdom of heaven at hand; not so much the personal presence of the king; that must not be boasted upon; but a spiritual kingdom which is to be set up, when his bodily presence is removed, in the hearts of men.

Now this was the same that John the Baptist and Christ had preached before. Note, People need to have good truths pressed again and again, for fear they should forget them. If they preach them, let them be new learnings, or if they be old truths, let them be new affections, they are as if they were fresh to us. Christ, in the gospel, is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, Heb. 13. 8. Afterwards, indeed, when the Spirit was poured out, and the christian church was formed, this kingdom of heaven came, which was now spoken of as at hand: but the kingdom of heaven must still be the subject of our preaching: now it is come, we must tell people it is come, and must lay before them the precepts and privileges of it; and there is a kingdom of glory yet to come, which we must speak of as at hand, and quicken people to diligence from the consideration of that.

III. The power he gave them to work miracles for the confirmation of their doctrine, v. 8. When he sent them to preach the same doctrine that he had preached, he empowered them to confirm it, by the same divine seals, which could never he set to a lie. This is not necessary now the kingdom of God is come; to call for miracles now, is to lay again the foundation when the building is reared. The point being settled, and the doctrine of Christ sufficiently attested, by the miracles which Christ and his apostles wrought, it is tempting God to ask for more signs. They are directed here,

2. To use their power in these cases, not, Go and remove mountains, or "fetch fire from heaven," but heal the sick, cleanse the lepers. They are sent abroad as public blessings, to intimate to the world, that love and goodness were the spirit and genius of that gospel which they came to preach, and of that kingdom which they were employed to set up. By this it would appear, that they were the servants of that God who is good and does good, and whose mercy is over all his works; and that the intention of the doctrine they preached, was to heal sick souls, and to raise those that were dead in sin; and that this was the thing they were designed not to make a gain of the power they had to work miracles, but to use it to heal the sick, and to make them whole; and the doctrine which they were to preach was that of repentance towards God, and faith on the Lord Jesus Christ, which is here mentioned, for though we read not of their raising any to life before the resurrection of Christ, yet they were instrumental to do many to spiritual life.

2. In doing good freely; freely ye have received. Those that had power to heal all diseases, had an opportunity to enrich themselves; who would not purchase such easy, certain curing at an adequate price? They were designed not to make a gain of the power they had to work miracles, but to use it to heal the sick, and to make them whole; and the doctrine which they were to preach was that of repentance towards God, and faith on the Lord Jesus Christ, which is here mentioned, for though we read not of their raising any to life before the resurrection of Christ, yet they were instrumental to do many to spiritual life.

make the best of that which is, to abide by it, and not be for shifting upon every dislike or inconvenience.

(2.) In strange houses. When they had found the house of one they thought worthy, they must at their entrance salute it. In those common civilities, be_better than with pride, in too great luxury. Think it not a disparagement, to invite yourselves into a house, nor stand upon the jametillo of being invited. Salute the family. [1.] To draw on further discourse, and so introduce your message. " (From matters of common conversation, we may insensibly pass into that communication which is good to the use of edifying.) [2.] "To try whether you are welcome or not; you will take time or receive you here; a servant will be sent to the apostles went out backed with the authority of the Son of God himself; yet their instructions were, when they came into a house, not to command it, but to salute it; for love's sake rather to behe wth, is the evangelical way, Phil. 8. 9. Souls are first drawn to Christ with the cords of a man, and kept to him by the bands of love, Hos. 11. 4. When Peter made the first offer of the gospel to Cornelius, a Gentile, Peter was first saluted; see Acts 10. 25, for the Gentiles courted that which the Jews were courted to.

When they had saluted the family after a godly sort, they must, by the return, judge concerning the family, and proceed accordingly. Note, The eye of God is upon us, to observe what entertainment we give to good people and good ministers; if the house be worthy, let your peace come and rest upon it; if not, let it return to you, v. 13. It seems then that after they had inquired for the most worthy, (v. 11.) it was possible they might light upon those that were unworthy. Note, Though it is wisdom to hearken to, yet it is folly to rely upon, common report and opinion; we ought to use a judgment of discretion, and to see with our own eyes. The wisdom of the prudent is himself to understand his own way.

Note, 1. To this solemn salutation.

First, For satisfaction to the apostles. The common salutation was, peace be unto you; this, as they used it, was turned into gospel; it was the peace of God, the peace of the kingdom of heaven that they wished. Now lest they should make a scruple of pronouncing this blessing upon all promiscuously, because many were utterly unworthy of it, this is to clear them of that scruple; Christ tells them that the peace of God may be said to all, and that it should be given to all, as the gospel-preacher was made to all indefinitely, and that they should leave it to God who knows the heart and every man's true character, to determine the issue of it. If the house be worthy, it will reap the benefit of your blessing; if not, there is no harm done, you will not lose the benefit of it; it shall return to you, as David's prayers for his ungrateful enemies did, Ps. 35. 13. Note, It is not the business of those who proclaim the gospel, to be scrupulous for the salvation of all, to conduct ourselves courteously to all, for that is our part, and then to leave it with God to determine what effect it shall have upon them, for that is his part.

Secondly, For direction to them. If, upon your salutation, it appear that they are indeed worthy, let them have more of your company, and so let your peace come upon them; preach the gospel to them, peace by Jesus Christ; but if otherwise, if they carry it rudely to you, and shut their doors against you, let your peace, as much as in you lies, return to you. Retract what you have said, and turn your backs upon them; by slighting this, they have made themselves unworthy of the rest of your salutation. Note, Great blessings are often lost by a neglect seemingly small and inconsiderable, when men are in their probation and upon their behaviour. Thus Esau lost his birthright, (Gen. 25. 34.) and Saul his kingdom, 1 Sam. 13. 15, 14.

2. They are here directed how to carry it toward those that were refusers of them. The case is put, (v. 14.) of those that would not receive them, for or against their will, (as if it was now become) they think that now they had such a doctrine to preach, and such a power to work miracles for the confirmation of it, no doubt but they should be universally entertained and made welcome: they are, therefore, told before, that there would be those that would slight them, and put contempt on them and their message. Note, The best and most powerful preachers of the gospel must expect to meet with some, that will not think it an instance of respect to them the hearing, nor show them any token of respect. Many turn a deaf ear, even to the joyful sound, and will not hearken to the voice of the charmers, charm they never so wisely. Observe, "They will not receive you, and they will not hear your words." Note, Contempt of the gospel, and contempt of gospel-ministers, commonly go together, and they will either of them be construed into contempt of Christ, and will be reckoned for accordingly.

Now in this case we have here,

(1.) The directions given to the apostles what to do. They must depart out of that house or city. Note, The gospel will not tarry long with those that put it away from them. At their departure they must shake off the dust of their feet, [1.] In detestation of their wickedness; it was so abominable, that it did even pollute the ground they went upon, which must therefore be shaken off as a filthy thing. The apostles must have no fellowship nor communion with them; must not so much as carry away the dust of their city with them. The work of them that turn aside shall not leave to me, Ps. 101. 3. The prophet was not to eat or drink in Bethel, 1 Kings 13. 9. [2.] As a denunciation of wrath against them. It was to signify, that they were base and unprofitable, and the gospel should depart from them, and cast dust of the apostles' feet, which they left behind them, would witness against them, and be brought in as evidence, that the gospel had been preached to them, Mark 6. 11. Compare Jam. 5. 3. See this practised, Acts 13. 31.—18. 6. Note, They who despise God and his gospel shall be lightly esteemed.

(2.) The doom passed upon such wilful refusants, v. 15. It shall be more tolerable, in the day of judgment, for the land of Sodom, as with much more than the dust of the apostles' feet, which they left behind them, would witness against them, and be brought in as evidence, that the gospel had been preached to them, Mark 6. 11. Note, [1.] There is a day of judgment coming, when all those that refused the gospel will certainly be called to account for it; however they now make a jest of it. They that would not hear the doctrine that would save them, shall be made to hear the sentence that will ruin them. Their judgment is respite till that day. [2.] There are different degrees of punishment in that day. All the sins of the refuse are intolerable, but some will be more so than others. Some sinners sink deeper into hell than others, and are beaten with more stripes. [3.] The condemnation of those that reject the gospel, will in that day be severer and heavier than that of Sodom and Gomorrah. Sodom is said to suffer the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude 7. But that vengeance will come with an aggravation upon those that despise the great salvation. Sodom and Go morrah were exceedingly wicked, (Gen. 13, 14,) and that which filled up the measure of their iniquity was, that they received not the angels that were sent to them, but abused them, (Gen. 19, 4, 5,) and hearten- ed not to their words, ver. 14. And yet it will be more tolerable for them, than for those who receive not Christ's ministers, and hearken not to their words. God's wrath against them will be more flaming, and their own reflections upon them will be as much more the Son, remember, will sound most dreadfully in the ears of such as had a fair offer made them of eternal life, and chose death rather. The iniquity of Israel, when God sent them his servants the prophets, is represented, as upon that account, more heinous than the iniquity of Sodom, (Ezek. 16, 48, 49,) much more now he sent them his Son the great prophet.

16. Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves: be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves. 17. But beware of men: for they will deliver you up to the councils, and they will scourge you in their synagogues; 18. And ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake, to a testimony against them and the Gentiles. 19. But when they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak; for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. 20. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you. 21. And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child: and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death. 22. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake; but he that endureth to the end shall be saved. 23. But when they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another: for verily I say unto you, Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of man be come. 24. The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his Lord. 25. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his Lord. If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household? 26. Fear them not therefore: for there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; and hid, that shall not be known. 27. What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light: and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the house-tops. 28. And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. 29. Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. 30. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. 31. Fear ye not therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows. 32. Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. 33 But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven. 34. Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. 35. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. 36. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household. 37. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. 38. And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me. 39. He that findeth his life shall lose it: and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it. 40. He that receiveth you, receiveth me; and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me. 41. He that receiveth a prophet, in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man, in the name of a righteous man, shall receive a righteous man's reward. 42. And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.

All these verses relate to the sufferings of Christ's ministers in their work, which they are here taught to expect, and prepare for; they are directed also how to bear them, and how to go on with their work in the midst of them. This part of the sermon looks further than to their present mission: for we find not that they met with any great hardships or persecutions while Christ was with them, nor were they well able to bear them; but they are here forewarned of the troubles they should meet with, when, after Christ's correction, their commission should be enlarged, and the kingdom of heaven, which was now at hand, should be actually set up; they dream ed of nothing then, but outward pomp and power; but Christ tells them, they must expect greater sufferings than they were yet called to; that they should then be made prisoners, when they expected to be made princes. It is good to be told what troubles we may hereafter meet with, that we may provide accordingly, and may not boast, as if we had put off the harness, when we are yet but girding it on.

We have here intermixed, I. Predictions of trouble; and, II. Prescriptions of counsel and comfort, with reference to it.

I. We have here predictions of trouble, which the disciples should meet with in their work; Christ we may hereafter meet with, when we will have them go on, as he went on himself; and he foretold them, not only that the troubles might not be a surprise to them, and so a shock to their faith, but that, being the accomplishment of a prediction, they might be a confirmation to their faith. He tells them what they should suffer, and from whom.

1. What they should suffer: hard things to be sure; for, Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves, v. 16. And what may a flock of poor, helpless, unguarded sheep expect, in the midst of a herd of ravenous wolves, but to be worried and torn. Note, Wicked men are like wolves, in whose nature it is to devour and destroy. God's people, and especially his ministers, are like sheep among them, of a contrary nature and disposition, exposed to them, and commonly an easy prey to them. It looked unkind in Christ to expose them to so much danger, who had left all to follow him; but he knew that not for the present, but in the end, when in the greatest day they shall be set on his right hand, would be a recompense sufficient for sufferings as well as services. They are as sheep among wolves; that is frightful; but Christ sends them forth, that is comfortable; for he that sends them forth, will protect them, and bear them out. But that they might know the worst, he tells them particularly what they must expect.

(1.) They must expect to be hated, (v. 22.) "Ye shall be hated for my name's sake: that is the root of all the rest, and a bitter root it is. Note, Those whom Christ loves, the world hates; as whom the court blesses the country curses. If the world hated Christ without cause, (John 15. 25.) no marvel if it hated those that bore his image and served his interests. We hate what is nauseous, and they are counted as the offscouring of all things, 1 Cor. 4. 13. The world's reproach is the physician's prescription; counted the troubles of the land, (1 Kings 18. 17.) and the tormentors of their neighbours, Rev. 11. 10. It is grievous to be hated, and to be the object of so much ill-will, but it is for thy name's sake; which, as it speaks the true reason of the hatred, whatever is pretended, so it speaks comfort to them who are thus hated; it is for a good cause, and they have a good friend that shares with them in it, and takes it to himself."

(2.) They must expect to be apprehended and arraigned as malefactors. Their restless malice is restless malice, and they will not only attempt, but will prevail, to deliver you up to the councils, (v. 17. 18.) to the bench of aldermen or justices, that take care of the public peace. Note, A deal of mischief is often done to good men, under colour of law and justice. In the place of judgement there is fear of those that persecute wickedness, Eccl. 5. 16. They must be shunted, but only justly; sent to the courts, but from governors and kings, the supreme magistrates. To be brought before them, under such black representations as were commonly made of Christ's disciples, was dreadful and dangerous; for the wrath of a king is as the roaring of a lion. We find this often fulfilled in the acts of the apostles."

(3.) They must expect to be put to death; (v. 21.) "They shall deliver them to death, to death in state, with pomp and solemnity, when it shows itself most as the king of terrors. The malice of the enemies rages so high as to inflict this; it is the blood of the saints that they thirst after: the faith and patience of the saints stand so firm as to expect this; Neither count I my life dear to myself: the wisdom of Christ permits it, knowing how to make the blood of the martyrs the seal of the truth, and the seed of the church."

By this noble army's not loving their lives to the death, Satan has been vanquished, and the kingdom of Christ and its interests greatly advanced, Rev. 11. 11. They were put to death as criminals, so the enemies meant it, but really as sacrifices, (Phil. 2. 17.) 2 Tim. 4. 6.) as burnt-offerings, sacrifices of acknowledgment to the honour of God, and in his truth and cause."

(4.) They must expect, in the midst of these sufferings, to be bribed with the most odious and ignominious names and characters that can be. Persecutors would be ashamed in this world, if they did not first dress up those in bear-skins whom they thus bait, and represent them in such colours as may serve to justify such cruelties. The blackest of all the ill characters they give them is here stated; they call them Beelzebub, the name of the prince of the devils, v. 25. They represent them as ring-leaders of the interest of the kingdom of darkness, and since every one thinks he hates the devil, thus they endeavour to make them odious to all mankind. See; and be amazed to see, how this world is imposed upon; how even enemies are represented as his friends: the apostle goes down to the devil's kingdom, were called devils. Thus men laid to their charge, not only things which they knew not, but things which they abhorred, and were directly contrary to, and the reverse of. [2.] Satan's sworn servants would be thought to be his enemies, and they never more effectually do his work, than when they pretend to be fighting against him. Many that by them selves are nearest akin to the devil, are most apt to father others upon him; and those that paint him on others' clothes, have him reigning in their own hearts. It is well there is a day coming, when (as it follows here, v. 26.) that which is hid will be brought to light."

(5.) These sufferings are here represented by a sword and division, v. 34, 35. Think not that I am come to send peace, temporal peace and outward peace, but I come to send war, and the sword, to destroy the world, and to make it a bloody place, so that not one of his followers shall be left; but I come to set them in opposition to the world, and as its enemies, and as enemies of the world, in one respect, as the world's accuser, Christ came to give us peace with God, peace in our consciences, peace with our brethren, but in the world ye shall have tribulation. Note, They mistake the design of the gospel, who think their profession of it will secure them from its effects; they will certainly expose them to, trouble in this world. If all the world would receive Christ, there would then follow a universal peace, but while there are and will be so many that reject him, (and those not only the children of this world, but the seed of the serpent,) the children of God, that are called out of the world, must expect to feel the fruits of their enmity."

[1.] Look not for peace, but a sword. Christ came to give the sword of the word, with which his people were to conquer the world. By this sword he worked this word has made, (Rev. 6. 4.—19. 21.) and the sword of persecution, with which the world fights against the disciples, being cut to the heart with the sword of the word, (Acts 7. 54.) and tormented by the testimony of Christ's witnesses, (Rev. 11. 10.) and cruel work this sword made. Christ sent that gospel, which gives occasion for the drawing of this sword, and so may be said to send this sword; he orders his church into a suffering state for the trial and praise of his people's graces, and the filling up of the measure of their enemies' sins."

[2.] Look not for peace, but division, (v. 35.) I am come to set men at variance. This effect of the preaching of the gospel, is not the fault of the gospel, but of those who do not receive it. When some believe the things that are spoken, and others believe them not, the faith of those that believe condemns those that believe not, and, therefore, they have an enmity against them that believe. Note, The most violent and implacable feuds have ever been those that have arisen from difference in religion; no enmity like that of the persecutors, no resolution like that of the persecuted. Thus Christ tells his disciples what they should suffer, and these were hard sayings; if they could bear these, they could bear any thing. Note, Christ has dealt fairly and faithfully with us, in telling us the worst we shall meet with in his service; and he would have us deal so with ourselves, in sitting down and counting the cost.
2. They are here told from whom, and by whom, they should suffer these hard things. Surely hell itself must be let loose, and devils, those desperate and despairing spirits, that have no part nor lot in the great salvation, must become incarnate, ere such spiteful enemies could be found to a doctrine, the substance of which was good will toward men, and the reconciling of the world to God; no, would you think it? All this mischief arises to the preachers of the gospel, from those to whom they came to preach salvation. Thus the blood-thirsty hate the upright, and hate his soul, (Prov. 29. 10.) and therefore heaven is so much opposed on earth, because earth is so much under the power of hell, Eph. 2. 2.

These hard things Christ's disciples must suffer, (1.) From men, (v. 17.) "Beware of men; you will have need to stand upon your guard, even against those who are of the same nature with you"—such is the duplicity and degeneracy of that sort, (homo homini lupus—man is a wolf to man,) crafty and politic as men, but cruel and barbarous as beasts, and wholly divorced of the thing called humanity. Note, Persecuting rage and enmity turn men into brutes, into devils; Paul at Ephesus fought with beasts in the shape of men, 1 Cor. 15. 32. It is a sad pass that the world is come to, when the best friends of the gospel should disallow the friends of men. It aggravates the troubles of Christ's sufferers, that they arise from those who are bone of their bone, made of the same blood. Persecutors are, in this respect, worse than beasts, that they prey upon those of their own kind; "Sievis inter se convenit turris—Even savage bears agree among themselves." It is very grievous to have men rise up against us, (Ps. 124.) from whom we might expect protection and support; men would not do so to devils, and not saints; natural men, (1 Cor. 2. 14.) men of this world, Ps. 17. 14. Saints are more than men, and are redeemed from among men, and therefore are hated by them. The nature of man, if it be not sanctified, is the worst nature in the world next to that of devils. They are men, and therefore subordinate, dependent, dying creatures; they are men, but, they are but men, (Ps. 9. 29.) and who art thou, that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die? Isa. 51. 12. Beware of the men, So Dr. Hammond; those you are acquainted with, the men of the Jewish sanhedrim, which disallowed Christ, 1 Pet. 2. 4.

(2.) From professing men, men that have a form of godliness, and make a show of religion. They will scourge you in their synagogues, their places of meeting for the worship of God, and for the exercise of their church-discipline: so that they looked upon the scourging of Christ's ministers to be a branch of their religion. Paul was five times scourged in the synagogues, 2 Cor. 11. 24. The Jews, under colour of zeal for Moses, were the most bitter persecutors of Christ and Christianity, and placed those outrages to the score of their religion. Note, Christ's disciples are never in a worse case than his persecutors, that scourge them in their synagogues, cast them out and kill them, and think they do God good service, (John 16. 2.) and say, Let the Lord be glorified, Isa. 66. 5. Zech. 11. 4, 5. But the synagogue will be so far from consecrating the persecution, that the persecution, doubtless, profits, and desecrates the synagogue.

(3.) From great men, and men in authority. The Jews did not only scourge them, which was the utmost their remaining power extended to, but when they could go no further themselves, they delivered them up to the Roman powers, as they did Christ, John 18. 30. Ye shall be brought before governors and kings, (v. 18.) who, having more power, are in a capacity of doing the more mischief. Governors and kings receive their power from Christ, (Prov. 8. 15.) and should be his servants, and his church's protectors and nursing-fathers, but they often use their power against Christ, and oppressors of his church.

The kings of the earth set themselves in his kingdom, Ps. 2. 1, 2. Acts 4. 25, 26. Note, It has often happened the lot of good men to have great men for their enemies.

(4.) From all men, (v. 22.) Ye shall be hated of all men, of all wicked men, and these are the generality of men, for the whole world lies in wickedness. So few are there that love, and own, and connnence Christ's righteous cause, that we may say, the friends of it are as rare souls as they are all gone away, and, therefore, eat up my people, Ps. 14. 3. As far as the apostasy from God goes, so far the enmity against the saints goes; sometimes it appears more general than at other times, but there is something of this poison lurking in the hearts of all the children of disobedience. The world hates you, for it wonders after the beast, Rev. 13. 3. Every man is a liar, and therefore a hater of truth.

(5.) From those of their own kindred. The brother shall deliver up the brother to death, v. 21. A man shall be, upon this account, at variance with his own father; nay, and those of the weaker and tenderer sex too shall become persecutors and persecuted; the persecuting daughter will be against the believing mother, where natural affection and filial duty do not; and, therefore, she should so soon extinguish the quarrel; and then, so marvellous if the daughter-in-law be against the mother-in-law; where, too often, the coldness of love seek's occasion of contention, v. 23. In general, (v. 36.) A man's foes shall be they of his own household. They who should be his friends, will be incensed against him for embracing Christianity, and especially for adhering to it when it comes to be persecuted, and will join with those that are his enemies. The strongest bonds of relative love and duty have often been broken through, by an enmity against Christ and his doctrine. Such has been the power of prejudice against the true religion, and zeal for a false one, that all other regards, the most natural and sacred, the most engaging and endearing, have been sacrificed to these Molochs. They who rage against the Lord, and bear his name, are answered ones, break even these bonds in sunder, and cast away even these cords from them, Ps. 2. 2, 3. Christ's spouse suffers hard things from the anger of her own mother's children, Cant. 1. 6. Sufferings from such are more grievous; nothing cuts more than this, It was thou, a man, mine equal; (Ps. 55. 12, 13.) and the enmity of such is commonly most implacable; a brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city, Prov. 18. 19. The martyrlogies, both ancient and modern, are full of instances of this. Upon the whole matter, it appears, that all that will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution; and through many tribulations we must expect to enter into the kingdom of God.

II. With these predictions of trouble, we have here prescriptions of counsels and comforts for a time of trial. He sends them out exposed to danger in deed, and expecting it, but well armed with instructions and encouragements, sufficient to bear them up, and bear them out, in all these trials. Let us gather up what he says,

1. By way of counsel and direction in several things.

(1.) Be ye wise as serpents, v. 16. "You may be so;" (so some take it, only as a permission;) "you may be as wary as you please, provided you be harmless as doves." But it is rather to be taken as a precept, recommending to us that wisdom of the prudent, which is to understand his way, as useful at all times, but especially in suffering times. Therefore, because you are exposed, as sheep among wolves;
be ye wise as serpents; not wise as foxes, whose cunning is to deceive others, but as serpents, whose policy is only to defend themselves, and to shift for their own safety. The disciples of Christ are hated and persecuted as serpents, and their ruin is sought, and, therefore, they need the serpent's wisdom.

Note, It is the will of Christ that his people and ministers, being so much exposed to troubles in this world, as they usually are, should not needlessly expose themselves, but use all fair and lawful means for their own preservation. Christ gave us an example of this wisdom, ch. 21. 24, 25.—22. 17, 18, 19. John 8. 6, 7. besides the many escapes he made out of the hands of his enemies, till his hour was come. See an instance of St. Paul's wisdom, Acts 23. 6, 7.

In the cause of Christ we must sit loose to life and all its comforts, but must not be prodigal of them. It is the wisdom of the serpent, to secure his head, that hit to cast not by chance. They are sent forth among wolves, therefore must be as wise as serpents, but they are sent forth as shepherds, therefore must be harmless as doves. We must be wise, not to wrong ourselves, but rather so than wrong any one else; must use the harmless-ness of the dove to bear twenty injuries, rather than the subtlety of the serpent to offer or to return one. Note, It is the continual care of all Christ's disciples, to be innocent and inoffensive in word and deed, especially in consideration of the enemies they are in the midst of. We have need of a dove-like spirit, when we are beset with birds of prey, that we may neither provoke them, nor be provoked by them: David coveted the wings of a dove, on which to fly away and be at rest, rather than the wings of a hawk. The Spirit descended on Christ as a dove, and all became the Church of the Spirit of Christ, a dove-like spirit, made for love, not for war.

(3.) Beware of men, v. 17. Be always upon your guard, and avoid dangerous company; take heed what you say and do, and presume not too far upon any man's fidelity; be jealous of the most plausible pretensions; trust not in a friend, no, not in the wife of thy bosom, Micah 7. 5. Note, It becomes those who are gracious to be cautious, for we are taught to set the Contemporary value of all the enemies they are in the midst of. We have need of a dove-like spirit, when we are beset with birds of prey, that we may neither provoke them, nor be provoked by them: David coveted the wings of a dove, on which to fly away and be at rest, rather than the wings of a hawk. The Spirit descended on Christ as a dove, and all became the Church of the Spirit of Christ, a dove-like spirit, made for love, not for war.

(4.) Take no thought, how or what ye shall speak, v. 19. When ye are brought before magistrates, conduct yourself decently, but afflict not yourselves with care how you shall come off. A prudent thought there must be, but not an anxious, perplexing, disquieting thought; let this care be cast upon God, as well as that—what you shall eat and what you shall drink. Do not study to make fine speeches, ad captandum benevolentiam—to ingratiat yourselves; affect not quaint expressions, flowery of wit, and laboured periods, which only serve to gild a bad cause, the gold of a good one needs it not. It argues a deficiency of your cause, to be solicitous in this respect. But it is not sufficient to oppose it itself. You know upon what grounds you go, and then verbaque praeviam rem non invisa sequuntur—suitable expressions will readily occur. Never any spoke better before governors and kings than those three champions, who took no thought before, what they should speak: O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter, Dan. 3. 16. See Ps. 119. 46. Note, The disciples of Christ must be more thoughtful, how to do well, than how to speak well; how to keep their integrity, than how to vindicate it. Non magna logiumur, sed verum—Our lives, not boasting words, form the best apology.

(5.) When they persecute you in this city, flee to another city. While therefore, though you may go out of the way of danger, though you must not go out of the way of duty. Observe Christ's care of his disciples, in providing places of retreat and shelter for them; ordering it so, that persecution rages not in all places at the same time; but when one city is made too hot for them, another is reserved for a cooler shade, and a little sanctuary; a favour to be used and not to be slighted; yet always with this proviso, Do not make that your escape; for then it is not a door of God's opening. We have many examples to this rule in the history both of Christ and his apostles, in the application of all which to particular cases, wisdom and integrity are profitable to direct.

(6.) Fear them not, v. 26. For they can but kill the body. Note, It is the duty and interest of Christ's disciples, not to fear the greatest of their adversaries. They who truly fear God, need not fear man; and they who are afraid of the least sin, need not be afraid of the greatest trouble. The fear of man brings a snare, a perplexing snare, that disturbs our peace; an entangling snare, by which we are drawn into sin; and, therefore, it must be carefully watched, and striven, and prayed against. Be the times never so difficult, enemies never so outrageous, and events never so threatening, yet need we not fear; yet will we not fear, though the earth be moved, we have so good a God, so good a cause, and so good a hope through grace.

Yes, this is soon said, but when it comes to the trial, racks and tortures, dungeons and gallies, axes and gibbets, fire and faggot, are terrible things, enough to make the stoutest heart to tremble, and to start back, especially when it is plain, that they may be avoided by a few declining steps, and, therefore, to fortify us against this temptation, we have further:

[1.] A good reason against this fear, taken from the limited power of the enemies; they kill the body, that is the utmost their rage can extend to; hitherto they can go, if God permit them, but no further; they are not able to kill the soul, nor to do it any hurt, and the soul is the man. By this it appears, that the soul does not (as some dream) fall asleep at death, nor deprived of thought and perception long before the killing of the body would be the killing of the soul too. The soul is killed when it is separated from God and his love, which is its life, and is made a vessel of his wrath; now this is out of the reach of their power. Tribulation, distress, and persecution may separate us from all the world, but cannot part between us and God, cannot make us either not to love him, or not to be loved by him, Rev. 2. 10, 11. If, therefore, we are troubled about our souls, as our jewels, we should be less afraid of men, whose power cannot rob us of them; they can but kill the body, which would quickly die of itself, not the soul, which will enjoy itself and its God in spite of them. They can but crush the cabinet: a heathen set the tyrant at defiance with this, Tundu caput

ST. MATTHEW, X. 117
Anaxarch, Anaxarchum non beds—you may abuse the case of Anaxarchus, you cannot injure Anaxarchus himself. The pearl of price is untouched. Seneca undertakes to make it out, and the whole is most naturally. Science is no evil to him. Si maximum illud ultra quod nihil habere potest, aut sevisium domini minuitur, in quo injuriam sumum fortuna consumit, aqua placidique animo acerbitum ac scimus mortem malum non esse ob hoc ne in iuriam gudem.—If with calmness and composure we meet that last extremity, beyond which injured laws and merciless punishments have put the last injury in which fortune terminates her dominion, we know that death is not an evil, because it does not occasion the slightest injury. Seneca de Constantia.

[2.] A good remedy against it, and that is, to fear God. Fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. Note, First, Hell is the destruction both of soul and body; not of the body only, but the soul being of both; it is the ruin of the whole man; if the soul be lost, the body is lost too. They sinned together; the body was the soul's tempter to sin, and its tool in sin, and they must eternally suffer together. Secondly, This destruction comes from the power of God: he is able to destroy; it is a destruction from his glorious power; (2. Thess. 1. 9.) he will in it make his power known; not only his another, but also his glory, his power, in a short sentence, Rom. 9. 22. Thirdly, God is therefore to be feared, even by the best saints in this world. Knowing the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men to stand in awe of him. If, according to his fear, so is his wrath, then according to his wrath so should his fear be, especially, because none knows the power of his anger, Ps. 90. 11. When Adam, in innocency, was awed by a threatening, let none of Christ's disciples think that they need not the restraint of a holy fear. Hathly is the man that fears always. The God of Abraham, who was then dead, is called the Fear of Isaac, who was yet alive, Gen. 31. 42, 53. Fourthly, The fear of God and of his power reigning in the soul, will be a sovereign antidote against the fear of man. It is better to fall under the frowns of all the world, than under God's frowns, and therefore, as it is in the world, it is most safe for us, to obey God rather than men, Acts 4. 19. They who are afraid of a man that shall die, forget the Lord their Maker, Isa. 51. 12, 13. Neh. 4. 14.

(7.) What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light: (v. 27.) "whatever hazards you run, go on with your work, publishing and proclaiming the everlasting gospel to all the world; that is your business, mind that. The design of the enemies is not merely to destroy you, but to suppress that, and, therefore, whatever be the consequence, publish that." What I tell you, that speak ye. Note, That which the apostles have delivered to us, is the same that they received from Jesus Christ, Heb. 2. 3. They spake what he told them—that, all that, and nothing but that. Those ambassadors, however, are intrusted with a secret in darkness, in the ear, in corners, in parables. Many things Christ spake openly, and nothing in secret varying from what he preached in public, John 18. 20. But the particular instructions which he gave his disciples after his resurrection, concerning the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, were whispered in the ear, (Acts 1. 3.) for then he never showed himself openly. But the public proclamations he made in the light, and upon the house-tops: for the doctrine of the gospel is what all are concerned in, (Prov. 1. 20, 21—8. 2, 3.) therefore he that hath ears to hear, let him hear. The first indication of the reception of the Gentiles into the church, was upon a house-top, Acts 10. 9. Note, There is no part of Christ's gospel that needs, upon any account, to be concealed; the whole counsel of God must be revealed, Acts 20. 27. In never so mixed a multitude let it be plainly and fully delivered.

By thy of comfort and encouragement. Here is very much said to that purpose, and all little enough, considering the many hardships they were to grapple with, throughout the course of their ministry, and their present weakness, which was such, as that, without some powerful support, they could scarcely bear even the prospect of such usage; Christ therefore shows them why they should be of good cheer.

[1.] That their sufferings were for a testimony against them and the Gentiles, v. 18. When the Jewish consistory transfers you to the Roman governors, that they may have you put to death, your being hurried thus from one judgment-seat to another, will help to make your testimony the more public, and will give you an opportunity of bringing the gospel to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews; nay, you will testify to them, and against them, by the very troubles you undergo. Note, God's people, and especially God's ministers, are his witnesses, (Isa. 43. 10.) not only in their doing work, but in their suffering work. Hence they are called martyrs—witnesses for Christ, that his truths are of undoubted certainty and value; and being witnesses for him, they are witnesses against those who oppose him and his gospel. The sufferings of the martyrs, as they witness to the truth of the gospel they profess, so they are testimonies of the enmity of their persecutors, and both ways they are a testimony against them, and will be produced in evidence in the great day, when the saints shall judge the world; and the reason of the sentence will be, Inasmuch as ye did it unto these, ye did it unto me. Now if their sufferings be a testimony, how cheerfully should they be borne; for the testimony is not finished till those come, Rev. 11. 7. If they be Christ's witnesses, they shall be sure to have their charges borne. [2.] That these consistorys are justly displeased, and that the hernings by this day, the work and warfare will in a little time be accomplished. [3.] That these consistorys are justly displeased, and that the hernings by this day, the work and warfare will in a little time be accomplished.
especially when they were called before great men. When Moses was sent to Pharaoh he complained, I am not eloquent, Exod. 4. 10. When Jeremiah was set over the kingdoms, he objected, I am but a child, Jer. 1. 6, 10. Now, in answer to this suggestion, First, they are here supported by Moses' words, ver. 12, 14, twice before, but in that same hour, what they should speak. They shall speak ex tempore, and yet shall speak as much to the purpose, as if it had been never so well studied. Note, When God calls us out to speak for him, we may depend upon him to teach us what to say; even then, when we labour under the greatest disadvantages and discouragements. Secondly, They are here assured, that the blindest are to be able to speak in the power of the Spirit. It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father, which speaketh in you, v. 20. They were not left to themselves upon such an occasion, but God undertook for them; his Spirit of wisdom spoke in them, as sometimes his providence wonderfully spoke for them, and by both together they were manifested in the consciences even of their persecutors. God gave them an ability, not only to speak to the purpose, but to speak as they should. The same Spirit that assisted them in the pulpit, assisted them at the bar. They cannot but come off well, who have such an advocate; to whom God says, as he did to Moses, (Exod. 4. 12.) Go, and I will be with thy mouth, and with thine heart. [3.] That he that endureth to the end shall be saved, v. 22. Here it is very comfortable to consider, First, that there will be an end of these troubles; they may last long, but will not last always. Christ comforted himself with this, and so may his followers; The things concerning me have an end, Luke 22. 37. Dabit Deus his quoque finem—These also will God bring to a termination. Note, A believing prospect of the period of our troubles, will be of great use to support us under them. The weary will be at rest, when the wicked cease from troubling, Job 3. 17. God will give an expected end, Jer. 29. 11. The troubles may seem tedious, like the days of a hibernating, but blessed be God, they are not everlasting. Secondly, that while they continue; they may be endur'd; as they are not eternal, so they are not intolerable; they may be borne, and borne to the end, because the sufferers shall be borne up under them, in everlasting arms: The strength shall be according to the day, 1 Cor. 10. 13. Thirdly, Salvation will be the eternal recompense of all these that endure to the end. The weather shall change, and the wind fail, but the pleasure of home will make amends for all. A believing regard to the crown of glory has been in all ages the cordial and support of suffering saints, 2 Cor. 4. 16, 17, 18. Heb. 10. 34. This is not only an encouragement to us to endure, but an engagement to endure to the end. They who endure but a while, and in time of temptation fall away, have run in vain, and lose all that they have attained; but they who persevere, are sure of the prize, and they only. Be faithful unto death, and then shall you have the crown of life. [4.] That whatever hard usage the disciples of Christ meet with, it is no more than what their Master met with before, v. 24, 25. The disciple is not above his master. We find this given them as a reason, why they should not hesitate to perform the meanest duties, no, not washing one another's feet, John 13. 10. Here it is given as a reason why they should not be surprised at the smallness of the office, John 15. 20. It is a proverbial expression, The servant is not better than his master, and, therefore, let him not expect to fare better. Note, First, Jesus Christ is our Master, our teaching Master, and we are his disciples, to learn of him; our ruling Master, and we are his servants to obey him: He is Master of the house, (Exod 12. 6.) and has a despotic power in the church, which is his family. Secondly, Jesus Christ our Lord and Master, not with very hard usage from the world; they called him Beelzebub, the god of flies, the name of the chief of the devils, with whom they said he was possessed; it was hard to say, which is here more to be wondered at, the wickedness of men who thus abused Christ, or the patience of Christ, who suffered himself to be thus abused; that he who was the God of glory should be stigmatized as the god of flies; the King of Israel, as the god of Ekom; the Prince of light and life, as the prince of the powers of death and darkness; that Satan's greatest Enemy and Destroyer, should be run down as his confederate, and partaker with it of the same sinners. Thirdly, The consideration of this ill treatment which Christ met with in the world, should engage us to expect and prepare for the like, and to bear it patiently. Let us not think it strange, if they who hated him, hate his followers, for his sake; nor think it hard if they who are shortly to be made like him in glory, he now made like him in sufferings. Christ began in the bitter cup, let us be willing to pledge him his blood, his sweat, and his tears, in ours. [5.] That there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, v. 26. We understand this, First, Of the revealing of the gospel to all the world. ‘Do you publish it, (v. 27.) for it shall be published. The truths which are now, as mysteries, hid from the children of men, shall all be made known, to all nations, in their own language,’ Acts 2. 11. The ends of the earth must see his salvation. Note, It is a great thing to engross, to those who are doing Christ's work, that it is a work which shall certainly be done. It is a work which God will speed. Or, Secondly, Of the clearing up of the innocence of Christ's suffering servants, that are called Beelzebub; their true character is now invidiously disguised with false colours, but however their innocence and excellency are now covered, they shall be revealed; sometimes it is in a great measure done in this world, when the righteousness of the saints is made, by subsequent events, to shine forth as the light; however, it will be done at the great day, when their glory shall be manifested to all the world, angels and men, to whom they are now made spectacles, 1 Cor. 4. 9. All their reproach shall be rolled away, and their graces and services, that are now covered, shall be revealed, 1 Cor. 4. 5. Note, It is a matter of comfort to the people of God, under all the calamities and censures of men, that there will be a resurrection of the just, as well as of bodies, at the last day, when the righteous shall shine forth as the sun. Let Christ's ministers faithfully reveal his truths, and then leave it to him, in due time, to reveal their integrity. [6.] That the providence of God is in a special manner conversant about the saints, in their sufferings, v. 29—31. It is good to have recourse to our first principles, and particularly to the doctrine of God's universal providence, extending itself to all the creatures, even to all his works, ev'n the smallest and most minute. The light of nature teaches us this, and it is comfortable to all men, but especially to all good men, who can in faith call this God their Father, and for whom he has a tender concern. See here, First, the general extent of providence to all the creatures, even the least, and least considerable, to the least and smallest of them, 1 Cor. 14. 36. There is a small account, that one of them is not valued; there must go two to be worth a farthing, (nay, you shall have five for a halfpenny, Luke 12. 6.) and yet they are not shut out of the divine care; One of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father; That is, 1. They do not light on the ground for food, to pick up a grain of corn, but your heavenly Father, by his providence, laid it ready for them. In the parallel place, Luke 12. 6. it is thus expressed, 'For one of them is forgotten before God, forgotten to be provided for; lie feedeth them, ch. 6. 26. Now he that feeds the sparrows, will not starve the saints.
2. They do not fall to the ground by death, either a natural or a violent death, without the notice of God; through he they are so small a part of the creation, yet even their death comes within the notice of the divine providence, much more does the death of his disciples. Observe, The birds that soar above, when they die, fall to the ground; death brings the highest to the earth. Some think that Christ here alludes to the two sparrows that were used in clean-slng the Leper; (Lev. 14. 4, 5, 6.) the two birds, in this instance, were taken after death, as the sparrows are killed, and so fall to the ground, the other was let go. Now it seemed a casual thing, which of the two was killed; the persons employed, took which they pleased, but God's providence designed, and determined which. Now this God, who has such an eye to the sparrows, because they are his creatures, much more will have an eye to you who are his children; if you do not die without your Father, surely a man does not give a donkey, minister,—my friend,—my child. A bird falls not into the fowler's net, nor by the fowler's shot, and so comes not to be sold in the market, but according to the direction of providence; your enemies, like subtle fowlers, lay snares for you, and privately shoot at you, but they cannot take you, they cannot hit you, until ye will give them leave. Therefore be not afraid of death; your enemies have no power against you,
but what is given them from above.
God can break their bows and snares, (Ps. 37. 14, 15.—64. 4, 7.) and make our souls to escape as a bird; (Ps. 124. 7.) Fear ye not, therefore, v. 31.
Note, There is enough in the doctrine of God's providence, to silence all the fears of God's people; Ye are of more value than many sparrows. All men are so, for the other creatures were made for man, and put under his feet; (Ps. 8. 4, 5, 6.) much more, the disciples of Jesus Christ, who are the excellent ones of the earth, however contemned, as if not worth one sparrow.
Secondly, the particular cognizance which providence takes of the disciples of Christ, especially in their sufferings, (v. 30.) But the very hairs of your head are numbered. This is a proverbial expression, denoting theattentive care of the Creator, which he keeps, of all the concerns of his people, even of those that are most minute, and least regarded.
This is not to be made a matter of curious enquiry,
but of encouragement to live in a continual dependeance upon God's providential care, which extends itself to all occurrences, yet without disparagement to the infinite glory, or disturbance to the infinite rest, of the Eternal Mind. If God numbers their hairs, much more does he number their heads, and take care of their lives, their comforts, their souls.
It intimates, that God takes more care of them, than they do of themselves. They who are solicitous to number their money, and goods, and cattle, yet were never careful to number their hairs, which fall and are lost, and they never miss them: but God numbers not his, nor all the hairs of his hand, and not a hair of their head shall perish; (Luke 21. 18.) not the least hair shall be done them, but upon a valuable consideration: so precious to God are his saints, and their lives and deaths!
[8.] That he will shortly, in the day of triumph, own those who now own him, in the day of trial, when those who deny him shall be for ever disowned and never heard by him, Luke 22. 32, 33. Note, First, It is our duty, and if we do it, it will hereafter be our unspakable honour and happiness, to confess Christ before men. 1. It is our duty, not only to believe in Christ, but to profess that faith, in suffering for him, when we are called to it, as well as in serving him.
We must never be ashamed of our relation to Christ, our attendance on him, and our expectations from him; hereby the sincerity of our faith is evidenced, his name glorified, and others edified. 2. However this may expose us to reproach and trouble now, we shall be abundantly recompensed for that, in the resurrection of the just, when it will be our unspakable honour and happiness to hear Christ say; (what would we more?) '"Him will I confess, though a poor worthless worm of the earth; this is one of mine, one of my friends and favourites, who loved me, and was beloved by me; the purchase of my blood, the workmanship of my Spirit; I will confess him before my Father, and all his servants, both there and here; I will speak a good word for him, when he appears before my Father to receive his doom; I will present him, and will represent him to my Father.'
Those who honour Christ he will thus honour. They honour him before men; that is a good thing; he will honour them before his Father, that is a great thing.
Secondly, It is a dangerous thing for any to deny and dishonour Christ before men, and then be disowned and despised by him in the great day, when they have most need of him: he will not own them for his servants, who would not own him for their Master: I tell you, I know you not, ch. 7. 23. In the first ages of Christianity, when for a man to confess Christ, was to venture all that was dear to him in this world, it was more a trial of sincerity, than it was afterwards, when it had secular advantages attaining.
Note, [8.] That the foundation of their discipleship was laid in such a temper and disposition, as would make sufferings very light and easy to them; and it was upon the condition of a preparedness for suffering, that Christ took them to be his followers, v. 37—39.
He told them at first, that they were not worthy of him, if they were not willing to part with all for him.
Men hesitate not at these difficulties which necessarily attend their profession, and which they count upon, when they undertook that profession;
and they will either cheerfully submit to those fatigues and troubles, or disclaim the privileges and advantages of their profession. Now, in the christian profession, they are reckoned unworthy the dignity and felicity of it, that put not such a value upon their interest in Christ, as to prefer that above everything. Note, We must either accept the gains of a bargain, who will not come up to the terms of it.
Now thus the terms are settled; if religion be worth any thing, it is worth every thing; and, therefore, all who believe the truth of it, will soon come up to the price of it; and they who make it their business and bliss, will make every thing else to yield to it.
They who like not Christ on these terms, may leave him at their peril. Note, It is very encouraging to think, that whatever we leave, or lose, or suffer, for Christ, we do not make a hard bargain for ourselves.
Whatever we part with for this pearl of price, we may comfort ourselves with this persuasion, that it is well worth what we give for it. The terms are,
that we must prefer Christ.
First, Before our nearest and dearest relations; father or mother, son or daughter. Between these relations there is little room left for envy, there is commonly more room for love, and therefore, these are instanced in, as relations which are most likely to affect. Children must love their parents, and parents must love their children; but if they love them better than Christ, they are unworthy of him. As we must not be deterred from Christ by the hatred of our relations; which is so strong, (v. 21, 33, 35,) so we must not be drawn from him by their love. Christians must be as Levi, who said to his father, I have not seen him, Deut. 33. 9.
Secondly, Before our ease and safety. We must » take up our cross and follow him, else we are not worthy of him. Here observe, 1. They who would follow Christ, must expect their cross and take it up. 2. In taking up the cross we must follow Christ’s example, and bear it as he did. 3. It is a great encouragement to us, and will draw us to follow him. But during them we follow Christ, who has showed us the way; and that if we follow him faithfully, he will lead us through sufferings like his, to glory with him.

Thirdly, Before life itself, v. 39. He that findeth his life shall lose it; he that thinks he has found it, when he has savaged it, and kept it, by denying Christ, shall lose it in an eternal death; but he that loseth his life for Christ, shall partake of that rest which he alone can bestow, yea, shall find it. Thus shall we follow Christ, who has showed us the way; and that if we follow him faithfully, he will lead us through sufferings like his, to glory with him.

SECONDLY, Jesus Christ takes what is done to his faithful ministers, whether in kindness or in unkindness, as done to himself, and reckons himself treated as they are treated. He that receives you, receive me. Both honours and contempt put upon an ambassador, reflect honour or contempt upon the prince that sends him, and ministers are ambassadors for Christ. See how Christ may be still be entertained by those who would testify their respect to his; his people and ministers we have always with us; and he is with them always, even to the end of the world. Nay, the honour rises higher, He that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me. Not only Christ takes it as done to himself, but through Christ God does too. By entertaining Christ’s ministers, they entertain not angels unwares, but Christ, nay, and God himself, and unwares too, as appears, v. 35. When saw thee an hungered? Thirdly, That though the kindness done to Christ’s disciples be never so small, yet that if there be occasion for it, and ability to do no more, it shall be accepted, though it be but a cup of cold water given to one of these little ones, v. 42. They are little ones, poor and weak, and often stand in need of refreshment, and glad of the least. The extremity may be such, that a cup of cold water may be a great favour. Note, Kindness shown to Christ’s disciples shows kindness shown to Christ himself, and will break upon the cost of the gift, according to the affection of the giver. On that score the widow’s mite not only passed current, but was stamped high, Luke 21. 3, 4. Thus they who are truly rich in graces may be rich in good works, though poor in the world.

Fourthly, That kindness done to Christ’s disciples which he will accept, must be done with an eye to Christ, not for his own sake; that is, a prophet must be received in the name of a prophet, a man in the name of a righteous man, and one of those little ones in the name of a disciple; not because they are learned, or witty, nor because they are our relations or neighbours, but because they are righteous, and so bear Christ’s image; because they are prophets and disciples, and so are sent on Christ’s errand. It is a believing regard to Christ that puts an acceptable value upon the kindnesses done to his ministers. Christ does not interest himself in the matter, unless we first interest him in it. Thus he dehers and for good purposes, dehers non tantum mihi praestare, sed tanquam mihi—if you wish me to feel an obligation to you for any service you render, you must only perform the service, but you must convince me that you do it for my sake.

Fifthly, That kindness shown to Christ’s people and ministers, shall not only be accepted, but richly and suitably rewarded. There is a great deal to be gained, by the bringing outward offices to Christ’s disciples. If it be done to the Lord, he will repay them again with interest; for he is not unrighteous to forget any labour of love, Heb. 6. 10. 1. They shall receive a reward, and in no wise lose it. He does not say, that they deserve a reward; we cannot merit anything as wages, from the hand of God; but they shall receive a reward from the free gift of God: and they shall in no wise lose it, as good services often do answer men, because they who should reward them are either false or forgetful. The reward may be deferred, the full reward will be deferred, till the resurrection of the just; but it shall in no wise be lost, nor shall they be any losers by the delay. 2. This is a prophet’s reward, and a righteous man’s. That is, either, (1.) The reward that God gives to prophets and righteous men; the blessings conferred upon them shall distil upon their friends. Or, (2.) The reward he gives by prophets and righteous men; in answer to their prayers; (Gen. 20. 7.) He is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee, that is a prophet’s reward: and by their ministry; when he gives the instructions and comforts of the word, to those who are kind to the preachers of the word, then he sends a prophet’s reward. Prophets’ rewards are spiritual blessings in heavenly things, and if we know how to value them, we shall reckon them good payment.

CHAPTER XI.

In this chapter we have, 1. The constant and unwearied diligence of our Lord Jesus in his great work of preaching the gospel, v. 1. II. His discourse with the disciples of John concerning the Baptist’s ministry; a most convincing and important testimony that Christ bore to John Baptist, v. 7. 15. IV. The sad account he gives of that generation in general, and of some particular places, with reference to the success, both of John’s ministry, and of his gospel; and of the rejection of Christ at his first coming; v. 16, 18, 24. V. His thanksgiving to his Father for the wise and gracious method he had taken in revealing the great mysteries of the gospel, v. 25, 26. VI. His gracious call and invitation to poor sinners to come to him, and to be ruled, and taught, and saved by him, v. 27. 30. Nowhere have we more of the terror of gospel-voices for warning to us, or of the sweetness of gospel-grace, for encouragement to us, than in this chapter, which sets before us life and death, the blessing and the curse. 1. And it came to pass, when Jesus had made an end of commanding his twelve disciples, he departed thence, to teach and to preach in their cities. 2. Now when John had heard in the prison the works of Christ, he sent two of his disciples, 3. And said unto him, Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another? 4. Jesus answered and said unto them, Go and shew John again those things which ye do hear and see: 5. The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them. 6. And blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me.

The first verse of this chapter some join to the foregoing chapter, and make it (not unfitly) the close of that.

1. The ordination sermon which Christ preached to his disciples in the foregoing chapter, is here called his commissioning them. Now Christ's commission consisted in two parts. Their preaching of the gospel was not only permitted them, but it was enjoined them. It was not a thing respecting which they were left at their liberty, but necessity was laid upon them, 1 Cor. 9. 16. The promises he made them are included in these commands, for the covenant of grace is a word which he hath commanded, Ps. 105. 8. He saith, in the end of commanding, risen & departed.

Note, The instructions Christ gives are full instructions. He goes through with his work. 2. When Christ had said what he had to say to his disciples, he departed thence. It should seem they were very loth to leave their master, till he departed and separated himself from them; as the nurse withdraws the hand, that the child may learn to go by itself. Christ would now teach them how to live and act without him, and to speak with him. It was expedient for them, that Christ should thus go away for a while, that they might be prepared for his long departure, and that by the help of the Spirit, their own hands might be sufficient for them, (Deut. 33. 7.) and they might not be always children. We have little account of what they did now pursuant to their commission. They went abroad, notcmath, probably into Judea, (for in Galilee the gospel had been mostly preached hitherto,) publishing the doctrine of Christ, and working miracles in his name; but still in a more immediate dependence upon him, and not being long from him; and thus they were trained up, by degrees, for their great work.

3. Christ departed to teach and preach in the cities whether he sent his disciples before him to work miracles, (ch. 10. 1, 8.) and so to raise people's expectations, and to make way for his entertainment. Thus was the way of the Lord prepared; John prepared it by bringing people to repentance, but he did no miracles. The disciples go further, they work miracles for the confirmation. Note, Repentance and faith prepare people for the blessings of the kingdom of heaven, which Christ gives. Observe, Where Christ is, Christ's miracles are. If Christ employed himself in teaching and preaching, as if that were the more honourable of the two. That was but in order to do this. Healing the sick was the saving of bodies, but preaching the gospel was to the saving of souls. Christ had directed his disciples to preach, (ch. 10. 7.) yet he did not leave off preaching himself. He set them to work, not for his own glory, but for the sake of the country, and was not the less busy for employing them. How unlike are they to Christ, who yoke others only that they may themselves be idle. Note, The increase and multitude of labourers in the Lord's work should be made not an excuse for our negligence, but an encouragement to our diligence. The more busy others are, the more busy we should be, and all for the Lord. Now, observe, Christ sent his disciples, a time for it, and he sent them with power. Observe, He went to preach in their cities, which were populous places; he cast the net of the gospel where there were most fish to be inclosed. Wisdom cries in the cities, (Prov. 1. 21.) at the entry of the city, (Prov. 8. 3.) in the cities of the Jews, even of them who made light of him, who notwithstanding had the first offer.

What he preached we are not told, but it was probably to the same purpose with his sermon on the mount. But here is next recorded a message which John Baptist sent to Christ, and his return to it, v. 2—6. We heard before that Jesus heard of John's sufferings, ch. 4. 12. Now we are told that John, in prison, hears of Christ's doings. He heard in the prison the works of Christ; and no doubt he was glad to hear of them, for he was a true friend of the Bridegroom, John 3. 29. Note, When one useful instrument is laid aside, God knows how to raise up another. Christ was more than a man: though John was in prison, and it added no affliction, but a great deal of consolation to his bonds. Nothing more comfortable to God's people in distress, than to hear of the works of Christ; especially to experience them in their own souls. This turns a prison into a palace. Some way or other Christ will convey the notices of his love to those that are in trouble for conscience sake. John could not see the works of Christ, but he heard of them with pleasure. And blessed are they who have not seen, but only heard, and yet have believed.

Now John Baptist, hearing of Christ's works, sent two of his disciples to him; and what passed between them and him we have here an account of.

Here is, 1. The question they had to propose to him: Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another? This was a serious and important question; Art thou the Messiah promised, or not? Art thou the Christ? Tell us. 1. It is taken for granted that the Messiah should come. It was one of the names by which he was known to the Old-Testament saints, he that cometh or shall come, Ps. 118. 26. He is now come, but there is another coming of him which is still future. 2. They intimate, that if this is not he, they would look for another. Note, We must not be weary of looking for him that is coming, nor ever say, we will no more expect him till we come to enjoy him. Though he tarry, wait for him, for he that shall come will come, though not in our time.

3. They intimate likewise, that if they be convinced that this is he, they will not be sceptics, they will be satisfied, and will look for no other. 4. They therefore ask, art thou he? John had said for his part, I am not the Christ, John 1. 20. Now, (1.) Some think that John sent this question for his own satisfaction. It is true he had borne a noble testimony to Christ; he had declared him to be the Son of God, (John 1. 34.) the Lamb of God, (v. 29.) and he that should baptize you with the Holy Ghost, (v. 33.) and satisfied Christ of his own person. Was Christ not that which he claimed for himself? But had desired to be further and more fully assured, that he was the Messiah that had been so long promised and expected. Note, In matters relating to Christ and our salvation by him, it is good to be sure. Christ appeared not in that external pomp and power in which it was expected he should appear; his own disciples stumbled at this, and perhaps John did so; Christ saw something of this error, he knew it was in the mind of the people, he knew they would be ready to offer to it; and said, blessed is he, who shall not be offended in me. Note, It is hard, even for good men, to bear up against vulgar errors, (2.) John's doubt might arise from his own present circumstances. He was a prisoner, and might be tempted to think, if Jesus be indeed the Messiah, whence is it that I, his friend and fore-runner, am brought into this trouble, and am left to be an object of contempt to others? Observe, He went to preach in their cities, which were populous places; he cast the net of the gospel where there were most fish to be inclosed. Wisdom cries in the cities, (Prov. 1. 21.) at the entry of the city, (Prov. 8. 3.) in the cities of the Jews, even of them who made light of him, who notwithstanding had the first offer.

What he preached we are not told, but it was probably to the same purpose with his sermon on the mount. But here is next recorded a message which especially when they continue long unrelieved, are such trials of faith as sometimes prove too hard to be borne up against. [3] The remaining unbelief of good men may sometimes, in an hour of temptation, strike at the root, and call in question the most fundamental truths which were thought to be well grounded. We will hope that John's faith did not fail in this matter, only he desired to have it strengthened and confirmed. Note, The best saints have need of the best helps they can get for the strengthening of their faith, and the arming of themselves against temptations to infidelity. Abraham believed, and yet desired a sign, (Gen. 15. 6, 8,) so did Gideon, Judges 6. 36. Will He now hear and see? Note, That John sent disciples to Christ with this question, not so much for his own satisfaction as for theirs. Observe, Though he was a prisoner they adhered to him, attended on him, and were ready to receive instructions from him; they loved him, and would not leave him. Now, [1] They were weak in knowledge, and wavering in their faith; and needed instruction and confirmation; and in this matter they were not behaving as their master, they were jealous of our Master: they were loth to acknowledge Jesus to be the Messiah, because he eclipsed John, and are leth to believe their own master when they think he speaks against himself and them. Good men are apt to have their judgments blasted by their interest. Now John would have them consider that to be as well satisfied as he himself was. Note, Ministers' business is to direct every body to Christ. And those who would know the certainty of the doctrine of Christ, must apply themselves to him, who is come to give an understanding. They who would grow in grace must be inquisitive.

II. Here is Christ's answer to this question, v. 4—6. It was not so direct and express as when he said, I that speak unto thee am he; but it was a real answer, an answer in fact. Christ will have us to spell out the convincing evidences of gospel-truths, and to take pains in digging for knowledge.

1. He points them to what they heard and saw, which they must tell John, that he might from thence take occasion, the more fully to instruct and convince them out of their own mouths. Go and tell him. Note, Our sex, sense, and reason must be appealed to in these things that are their proper objects. Therefore the popish doctrine of the real presence agrees not with the truth as it is in Jesus; for Christ refers us to the things we hear and see. Go and tell John,

(1) What you see of the power of Christ's miracles; you see how, by the word of Jesus, the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, &c. Christ's miracles are so strong and so great that men perish in them. They feared not the strongest and most impartial scrutiny. Veritas non quaerit angulos—Truth seeks not concealment. They are to be considered, [1] As the acts of a divine power. None but the God of nature could thus overrule and outdo the power of nature. It is particularly spoken of as God's prerogative to open the eyes of the blind, Psal. 146. 8. Miracles are therefore the broad seal of heaven, and the doctrine they are affixed to must be of God, for his power will never contradict his truth; nor can it be imagined that he should set his seal to a lie; however lying wonders may be vouched for, in proof of false doctrines, true miracles evince a divine commission; such Christ's were, and they leave no room to doubt that they were sent from God. Note, It was his that sent him. [2] As the accomplishment of a divine prediction. It was foretold, (Isa. 55. 5, 6,) that our God should come, and that then the eyes of the blind should be opened. Now if the works of Christ agree with the words of the prophet, as it is plain they do, then no doubt but this is our God whom we have waited for, who shall come and rescue his confused people, who has such a mind, [2] Tell him what you hear of the preaching of his gospel, which accompanies his miracles. Faith, though confirmed by seeing, comes by hearing. Tell him, [1] That the poor preach the gospel; so some read it. It proves Christ's divine mission, that those whom he employed in founding his kingdom were poor men, destitute of all secular advantages, who, therefore, could never have carried their point, if they had not been carried on by a divine power. [2] That the poor have the gospel preached to them. Christ's auditory is made up of such as the Scribes and Pharisees despised, and looked upon with contempt, and the rabble would not instruct, because they were not able to pay them. The Old-Testament prophets were sent mostly to kings and princes, but Christ preached to the congregations of the poor. It was foretold that the floor of the flock should wait upon him, Ezek. 11. 11. Note, Christ's glorious condescensions and compassions to the poor, are an evidence of it that he should bring to the world the tender mercies of our God. It was foretold that the Son of David should be the floor man's King, Ps. 72. 2, 4, 12, 13. Or we may understand it, not so much of the power of the world, as the floor in spirit, and so that scripture is fulfilled, Isa. 61. 1. He hath anointed me to preach glad tidings to the meek. Note, It is a proof of Christ's divine mission, that his doctrine is gospel indeed: good news to those who are truly humbled in sorrow for their sins, and truly humble in the denial of self; to them it is accommodated, for whom God always declared he had mercy in store. [3] That the poor receive the gospel, and are wrought upon by it, they are evangelized, they receive and entertain the gospel, are leavened by it, and delivered into it as into a mould. Note, The power of the gospel is the more effectual because it is the gospel original. The poor are wrought upon by it. The prophets complained of the poor, that they knew not the way of the Lord, Jer. 5. 4. They could do no good upon them; but the gospel of Christ made its way into their untutored minds.

2. He pronounces a blessing on these that were not offended in him, v. 6. So clear are these evidences of Christ's mission, that they who are not willfully blind and deaf are not to be accused. (So the word is,) cannot but receive his doctrine, and so be blessed in him. Note, (1) There are many things in Christ which they who are ignorant and unthinking are apt to be offended at some circumstances, for the sake of which they reject the substance of his gospel. The meanness of his appearance, his education at Nazareth, the poverty of his life, the despicableness of his followers, the slight which the Pharisees and Scribes cast upon him, his OWN doctrine, the contradiction it gives to flesh and blood, and the sufferings that attend the profession of his name; these are things that keep many from him, who otherwise cannot but see much of God in him. Thus he is set for the fall of many, even in Israel, (Luke 2. 34,) a Rock of offence, 1 Pet. 2. 8. (2) They are happy who get over these offences. Blessed are they. The expression intimates, that it is a difficult thing to conquer these prejudices, and a dan-genuine thing not to conquer them; but as to those, who, notwithstanding this opposition, do believe in Christ, their faith will be found so much the more to praise, and honour, and glory.

7. And, as they departed, Jesus began to say unto the multitudes concerning John, What went ye out into the wilderness to see? A reed shaken with the wind? 8. But what went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they that wear soft clothing are in kings' houses. 9. But what went ye out for to see? A prophet? yea, I say unto you, and more than a prophet. 10. For this is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. 11. Verily I say unto you, among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist: notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. 12. And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. 13. For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. 14. And if ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come. 15. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

We have here the high encomium which our Lord Jesus gave of John the Baptist; not only to revive his honour, but to revive his work. Some of Christ's disciples might perhaps take occasion from the question John sent to reflect upon him, as weak and wavering, and inconsistent with himself, to prevent which Christ gives him this character. Note, It is our duty to consult the reputation of our brethren, and not only to remove, but to exalt and prevent, jealousies and ill thoughts of them; and we must take all occasions especially to discover any thing of infirmity, to speak well of those who are praise-worthy, and to give them that fruit of their hands. John the Baptist, when he was upon the stage, and Christ in privacy and retirement, bore testimony to Christ; and now that Christ appeared publicly, and John was under a cloud, he bore testimony to John. Note, They who have a confirmed interest themselves should improve it for the helping of the credit and reputation of others, whose character claims it, but whose temper or present circumstances put them out of the way of it. This is giving honour to whom honour is due. John had abased himself to honour Christ, (John 3. 29, 30. ch. 3. 11.) had made himself nothing, that Christ might be All, and now Christ dignifies him with this character. Note, They who humble themselves shall be exalted, and those that honour Christ he will honour; those that confess him before men, he will confess, and sometimes before men too, even in this world. John had now finished his testimony, and now Christ commends him. Note, Christ reserves honour for his servants when they have done their work, John 12. 26.

Now concerning this commendation of John, observe,

I. That Christ spoke thus honourably of John, not in the hearing of John's disciples, but as they departed, just after they were gone, Luke 7. 24. He would not so much as seem to flatter John, nor have these praises of him reported to him. Note, Though we must be forward to give to all their due praise for their encouragement, yet we must avoid every thing that looks like flattery, or may be in danger of puffing them up. They who in other things are mortal, to flatter, yet are their own praise. Pride is a corrupt humour, which we must not feed either in others or in ourselves.

II. That what Christ said concerning John, was intended not only for his praise, but for the people's profit, to revive the remembrance of John's ministry which had been well attended, but which was now (as other such things used to be) strangely forgotten; therefore he did now for a season, rejoice in his light, John 5. 35. "Now, consider, what went ye out into the wilderness to see? Put this question to yourselves." 1. John preached in the wilderness, and thither people flocked in crowds to him, though in a remote place, and an inconvenient one. If teachers be removed into corners, it is better to go after them than to be without them. Now if his preaching was worth taking so much pains to hear it, surely we must give serious attention to some, the greater the difficulties we have broken through to hear the word, the more we are concerned to profit by it. 2. They went out to him to see him; rather to feed their eyes with the unusual appearance of his person, than to feed their souls with his wholesome instructions; rather for curiosity than for conscience. Note, Many that attend on the word come only to see what business had you such a time at such an hour, and to have something to talk of, than to be made wise to salvation. Christ puts it to them, what went ye out to see? Note, They who attend on the word will be called to an account, what their intentions and what their improvements were. We think when the sermon is done, the care is over; no, then the greatest of the care begins. It will shortly be asked, What business had you such a time at such an ordination? What brought you thither? Was it custom or company, or was it a desire to honour God and get good? What have you brought thence? What knowledge, and grace, and comfort? What went you to see? Note, When we go to read and hear the word, we should see that we aim right in what we do.

III. They saw what the commendation of John was. They knew not what answer to make to Christ's question; well, says Christ, "I will tell you what a man John the Baptist was;"

1. "He was a firm, resolute man, and not a reed shaken with the wind; you have been so in your thoughts of him, but he was not so. He was not wavering in his principles, nor uneven in his conversation; but was remarkable for his steadiness and constant consistency with himself." They who are weak as reeds will be shaken as reeds; but John was strong in spirit, Eph. 4. 14. When the wind of popular applause on the one hand blew fresh and fair, when the storm of Herod's rage on the other hand grew fierce and threatening, John was still the same, the same in all weathers. The testimony he had borne to Christ was not the testimony of a reed, of a man who would fold up his boat and run away to morrow; it was not a weather-cock testimony; no, his constancy in it is intimated; (John 1. 20.) he confessed, and denied not, but confessed, and stood to it afterwards, John 3. 28. And therefore this question sent by his disciples was not to be construed into any suspicion of the truth of what he had formerly said: therefore the people flocked to him, because he was true. Note, They who are loose in the long run by an unshaken resolution to go on with our work, neither courting the smiles, nor fearing the frowns of men. 2. He was a self-denying man, and mortified to this world. "Was he a man clothed in soft raiment?"
If so, you would not have gone into the wilderness to see him, but to the court. You went to see one that had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; his mien and habit shewed the legions of the world and the pleasures of sense; his clothing agreed with the wilderness he lived in, and the doctrine he preached there, that of repentance. Now you cannot think that he who was such a stranger to the pleasures of a court, should be brought to change his mind by the terrors of a prison, and now to question whether Jesus be the Messiah or not!" Note, they who have lived in the van of mortification, are least likely to be driven off from their religion by persecution. He was not a man clothed in soft raiment; such there are, but they are in kings' houses. Note, It becomes people in all their appearances to be consistent with their character, and their situation. They who are preachers must not affect to look like courtiers; nor must they whose lot is cast in common dwellings, be ambitious of the soft clothing which they wear who are in kings' houses. Prudence teaches us to be of a piece. John appeared rough and unpleasant, yet they flocked after him. Note, The remembrance of our former zeal in attending on the word of God, should quicken us to, and in our present work: let it not be said that we have done and suffered so many things in vain, have run in vain, and laboured in vain.

His greatest commendation of all was his office and ministry, which was more his honour than any personal endowments or qualifications could be; and therefore this is most enlarged upon in a full encomium.

(1.) He was a prophet, yea, and more than a prophet; (v. 9.) so he said of him who was the great Prophet, to whom all the prophets bare witness. John said of himself, he was not that prophet, that great prophet, the Messiah himself; and now Christ appears, he is not more than a prophet. He owned himself inferior to Christ, and Christ owned him superior to all other prophets. Observe, The forerunner of Christ was not a king, but a prophet, lest it should seem that the kingdom of the Messiah had been laid in earthly power, but his immediate forerunner was as such, a transcendent prophet, more than an Old-Testament prophet; they all did virtually, but John exhibited Christ's soul's desire, and their vision was yet for a great while to come: but John saw the day dawn, he saw the sun rise, and told the people of the Messiah, as one that stood among them. They spake of Christ, but he pointed to him: they said, A virgin shall conceive, he said, Behold, the Lamb of God!

(2.) He was the same that was predicted to be Christ's forerunner, (v. 10.) This is he of whom it is written, He shall be called the Spirit of the Father; He was the forerunner of Christ, and therefore was greater than they. Malachi prophesied concerning John, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face. Herein some of Christ's honour was put upon him, that the Old-Testament prophets spake and wrote of him; and this honour have all the saints, that their names are written in the Lamb's book of life. It was great forerunners to John above all the prophets, that he was Christ's servant, and not mere prophet; that he was a forerunner, a messenger, one among a thousand, deriving his honour from him whose messenger he was; he is my messenger, sent of God, and sent before the Son of God. His business was to prepare Christ's way, to dispose people to receive the Saviour, by discovering to them their sin and misery, and their need of a Saviour. This he had said of himself, (John 1. 23.) and now Christ said it of him; intending hereby not only to put an honour upon John's ministry, but to revive people's regard to it, as making way for the Messiah. Note, Much of the beauty of God's dispensations lies in their mutual connection and coherence, and the reference they have one to another. That which advanced John above the Old-Testament prophets was, that he went immediately before Christ. Note, The nearer any arc to Christ, the more truly honourable they are.

(3.) There was not a greater born of women than John the Baptist, v. 11. Christ knew how to use persons according to the degrees of the truth, and he prefers John before the prophets before him, for all that were born of women by ordinary generation. Of all that God had raised up and called to any service in his church, John is the most eminent, even beyond Moses himself; for he began to preach the gospel-doctrine of remission of sin to those who are truly penitent; and he had more signal revelations from heaven than any of them had, for he saw the new heaven opened, and the dead saints come.] He also had greater authority in his ministry; almost the whole nation flocked to him: none rose on so great a design, or came on so noble an errand, as John did, or had such claims to a welcome reception. Many had been born of women that made a great figure in the world, but Christ prefers John before them. Note, Greatness is not to be measured by appearances and outward splendour, but they are the greatest men in the kingdom of heaven, those greatest saints, and those greatest blessings, who are, as John was great in the sight of the Lord, Luke 1. 15.

Yet this high encomium of John has a surprising limitation, notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. [1.] In the kingdom of glory. John was a great and good man, but he was yet in a state of infirmity and imperfection, and therefore came short of glorified saints, and the spirits of just men made perfect. First, There are degrees of glory in heaven, some that are less than others there; though every vessel is alike full, all are not alike large and capacious. Secondly, The least saint in heaven is greater, and knows more, and loves more, and does more in praising God, and receives more from him, than the greatest in this world. The saints on earth are excellent ones, (Ps. 16. 3.) but those in heaven are much more excellent; the best in heaven are none other than those whose names are written in heaven, (v. 3.) there are no less there equal with the angels, (v. 8.) and the least there are equal to the Lord himself. Secondpart, this is to be observed, that blessed state, where the saur shall be as David, Zech. 12. 8. [2.] By the kingdom of heaven here, is rather to be understood the kingdom of grace, the gospel-dispensation in the perfection of its power and purity; and μισθοεῖν— he that is less in that is greater than John. Some understand it of Christ himself, who was younger than John, and, in the opinion of some, less than John, who always spoke diminishingly of himself; I am a worm, and no man, yet greater than John; so it agrees with what John the Baptist said, (John 1. 15.) He that cometh after me is preferred before me. But it is rather to be understood of the apostles and ministers of the New Testament, the evangelical prophets; and the comparison between them and John, is not with respect to their personal sanctity, but to their office: John preached Christ coming, but they preached Christ not only coming, but crucified and risen, and glorified; and, as an herald to the dawning of the gospel-day, and therein excelled the foregoing prophets, but he was taken off before the noon of that day, before the rending of the veil, before Christ's death and resurrection, and the pouring out of the Spirit; so that the least of the apostles and evangelists, having greater discoveries made to them, and being employed in a greater embassy, is greater than John. John did no miracles, that the apostles wrought many. The ground of this preference is laid in the preference of the New-Testament dispensations of grace, and those who ministered in that dispensation, were great and mighty: and, though the dispensations of the Old Testament were great, and the dispensations of the New Testament are great, yet the dispensations of the New Testament are greater.

(5.) The ministry of John was the beginning of the gospel, as it is reckoned, Mark 1. 1. Acts 1. 22. The third John 1:2, 'by the way of things, that their glory

[1.] In John the Old Testament dispensation began to die, v. 13. So long that ministration continued in full force and virtue, but then it began to decline. Though the obligation of the law of Moses was not removed till Christ's death, yet the discoveries of the Old Testament began to be superseded by the more clear manifestation of the kingdom of heaven as at hand. Because the light of the gospel had already been let in to precede and make way for its laws, therefore the prophecies of the Old Testament came to an end (finis perficiens, not interieurs—an end of completion, not of duration,) before the precepts of it; so that when Christ says, all the prophecies and the law prophaned until John, he shows us, First, How the light of the Old Testament was set up; it was set up in the law and the prophets, Deut. 18. 15, 'They shall come in my name, and shall do no thing.' But he, secondly, as we have both the New-Testament doctrine to explain the Old-Testament prophecies, and the Old-Testament prophecies to confirm and illustrate the New-Testament doctrine: (Heb. 1. 1.) like the two cherubim, they look at each other. The law was given by Moses long ago, and there had been no prophets for three hundred years before them, and yet they are both said to prophesy until John, because the law was set up, and Moses and the prophets still read. Note, The scripture is teaching to this day, though the penmen of it are gone. Moses and the prophets are dead; the apostles and evangelists are dead, (Zech. 1. 5.) but the word of the Lord endures forever; (1 Pet. 1. 25.) the scripture is speaking expressly, though the writers are silent in the dust. Secondly, How this light was laid aside; when he says, they prophesied in the Spirit, they had been but men; and the Spirit of prophecy was eclipsed by the glory which excelled: their predictions superseded by John's testimony, Behold the Lamb of God! Even before the sun rises, the morning light makes candles to shine dim. Their prophecies of a Christ to come became out of date, when John said, He is come.

[2.] In him the New-Testament day began to dawn; for, (v. 14.) This is Elias, that was for to come. John was as the lamp which coupled the two Testaments; as Noah was Fibula utrinque mundi—the link connecting both worlds, so he utrinque Testamenti—the link connecting both Testaments. The concluding prophecy of the Old Testament was, Behold, I will send you Elias, Mal. 4. 5, 6. Those words prophesied until John, and then being turned into a history, they ceased to prophesy. First, Chris speaks of it as a great truth, that John the Baptist is the Elias of the New Testament: not Elias in proprid person—in his own person, as the carnal Jews expected; he denied that; (John 1. 21.) but one that should come in the spirit and power of Elias, (Luke 1. 17.) like him in temper and conversation, that should press repentance with tears, and especially as it is in the prophecy, that should gather his hearers in the same storm, in the same tempest, and under the same violence; and take possession of the same debtors. Secondly, He speaks of it as a truth, which would not be easily apprehended by those whose expectations fastened upon the temporal kingdom of the Messiah, and introductions to it acceptable. Christ suspect... the welcome of it, if ye will receive it. Not but that it was true, whether they would receive it or not, but he upbraids them with their prejudices, that they were backward to receive the greatest truths that were opposed to their sentiments, though never so favourable to their interests. Or, "If you will receive him, or if you will receive the ministry of John as that of the promised Elias, he will be an Elias to you, to turn you and prepare you for the Lord." Note, Gospel-truths are, as they are received, a savour of life or death. Christ is a Saviour, and John an Elias, to those who will receive the truth contained in the one and the other.

Lastly, Our Lord Jesus closes this discourse with a solemn demand of attention, (v. 15.) He that hath ears to hear, let him hear: which intimates, that those things were dark and hard to be understood, and therefore needed attention, but of great concern and consequence, and therefore well deserved his notice. "Let all people take notice of this, if John be the Elias prophesied of, then certainly here is a great revolution on foot, the Messiah's kingdom is at the door, and the world will shortly be surprised into a happy change. These are things which require your serious consideration, and therefore you are all concerned to hearken to what I say." Note, The things of God are of great and common concern, every one that has ears to hear any thing, is concerned to hear this. It intimates, that God requires no more from us but the right use and improvement of the faculties he has already given us. He requires those to hear that have ears, those to use their reason that have reason. Therefore people are ignorant, not because they want power, but because they want will; therefore they do not hear, because, like the deaf adder, they stop their ears.

16. But whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows, 17. And saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented. 18. For John came neither eating nor drinking; and they say, He hath a devil. 19. The Son of man came eating and drinking; and they say, Behold a man glutinous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. But Wisdom is justified of her children. 20. Then began he to upbraid the cities wherein most of his mighty works were done, because they repented not. 21. Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works which were done in you had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes. 22. But I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the day of judgment, than for you. 23. And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shall be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. 24. But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee. 27

Christ was going on in the praise of John the Baptist and his ministry, but here stops on a sudden, and turns that to the reproach of those who enjoyed both that, and the ministry of Christ, and his apostles too, in vain. There is to that observation, we may observe to whom he compares them, (v. 16—19.) and as to the particular places he instances in, we may observe with whom he compares them, v. 20—24.

I. As to that generation, the body of the Jewish people at that time. There were many indeed that pressed into the kingdom of heaven; but the general continued and prevailing men was a great and good man, but the generation into which his lot was cast was as barren and unprofitable as could be, and unworthy of him. Note, The badness of the places where good ministers live serves for a foil to their beauty. It was Noah's praise that he was righteous in his generation. Having commended John, he condemns those who had him among them, and did not profit by his ministry. Note, The more praise-worthy the minister is, the more blame-worthy the people are, if they slight him, and so it will be found in the day of account.

This our Lord Jesus here sets forth in a parable, yet speaks as if he were at a loss to find out a similitude proper to represent this, Whereunto shall I liken this generation? Note, There is not a greater absurdity than that they are guilty of who have good preaching among them, and are never the better for it. It is hard to say what they are like. The similitude is taken from some common custom among the Jewish children at their play, who, as is usual with children, imitated the fashions of grown people at their marriages and funerals, rejoicing and lamenting; but being all a jest, it made no impression; no more did the ministry either of John the Baptist or of Christ upon that generation. He especially commends the Scribes and Pharisees, who had a proud conceit of themselves, therefore to humble them he compares them to children, and their behaviour to children's play.

The parable will be best explained by opening it and the illustration of it together in these five observations.

Note, 1. The God of heaven uses a variety of proper means and methods for the conversion and salvation of poor souls. He would not have it done, and therefore leaves no stone unturned in order to it. The great thing he aims at, is the melting of our wills into a compliance with the will of God, and in order to this, the affecting of us with the discoveries he has made of himself. Having various affections to be wrought upon, he uses various ways of working upon them, which, though differing one from another, all tend to the same end; and God is in them all carrying on the same design. In the parable, this is called his piping to us, and his mourning to us; he hath piped to us in the precious promises of the gospel, proper to work upon hope, and mourned to us in the dreadful threatenings of the law, proper to work upon fear, that he might frighten us out of our sins and allure us to himself. He has piped to us in gracious and merciful providences, mourned to us in calamitous, afflicting providences, and has set them one over against the other. He has taught his ministers to change their voice: (Gal. 4. 20.) sometimes to speak in thunder from mount Sinai, sometimes in a still small voice from mount Sion.

In the explanation of the parable is set forth the different temper of John's ministry and of Christ's, who were the two great lights of that generation.

(1.) On the one hand, John came mourning to them, neither eating nor drinking; not conversing familiarly with people, nor ordinarily eating in company, but alone, in his cell in the wilderness, where his meat was locusts and wild honey. Now this, one would think, should work upon them; for such an austere, mortified life as this, was very agreeable to the doctrine he preached; and that minister is most likely to do good, whose conversation is according to his doctrine; and yet the preaching even of such a man was not always effectual.
(2.) On the other hand, the Son of man came eating and drinking, and so he fished unto them. Christ conversed familiarly with all sorts of people, not affecting any peculiar strictness or austerity; he was affable and easy of access, not sly of any company, was often at feasts, both with Pharisees and Publi-cans, to try if this would win upon those who were not his friends; nor was John's religion, which were not aved by John's browes, would be allured by Christ's smiles; from whom St. Paul learned to become all things to all men, 1 Cor. 9. 22. Now our Lord Jesus, by this freedom, did not at all condemn John, any more than John did condemn him, though their deportment was so very different.
Note, Though we are never so clear in the goodness of our own practice, yet we must not judge of others by it. There may be a great diversity of operations, where it is the same God that worketh all in all, (1 Cor. 12. 6.) and this various manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal, v. 7.
Observe especially, that God's ministers are variously gifted: the ability and genius of some lies one way, of others, another way: some are Bomberges—sweetest things; others, Barnabases—sons of consolation; yet all are given to work this same Spirit, (1 Cor. 12. 11.) and therefore we ought not to condemn either, but to praise both, and praise God for both, who thus tris various ways of dealing with persons of various tempers, that sinners may be either made pliable or left inexcusable, so that whatever the issue is, God will be glorified.
Note. 2. The various methods which God takes for the conversion of sinners, are as on them: the sweetests and the bitterest, the most liberal and the most vindictive: Ye have not danced, ye have not lamented;
you have not been suitably affected either with the one or with the other. Particular means have, as in medicine, their particular intentions, which must be answered, particular impressions, which must be submitted to, in order to the success of the great and general design; now if people will be conversant by laws, nor invited by promises, nor frightened by threatening, nor by the greatest things, nor allured by the sweetest things, nor startled by the most terrible things, nor made sensible by the plainest things; if they will hearken to the voice neither of scripture, nor reason, nor experience, nor providence, nor conscience, nor interest, what more can be done? The believers are burned, the lead is consumed, the founder melts in vain; rephraze silver shall men call them, Jer.
6. 29. Ministers' labour is bestowed in vain, (Isa. 49. 4.)
and, which is a much greater loss, the grace of God received in vain, 2 Cor. 6. 1. Note, It is some comfort to faithful ministers, when they see little success of their labours, that it is no new thing for the best preachers and best preaching in the world to come short of the desired end. Why not therefore be our report? If He that called us be faithful, from the fat of the mighty, the bow of those great commanders, Christ and John, returned so often empty, (2 Sam. 1. 22.) no marv if ours do so,
and we prophesy to so little purpose upon dry bones.
Note. 3. That commonly those persons who do not profit by the means of grace, are perverse, and reflect upon the ministers or whom they enjoy those means, and thereby may get good themselves; they do all the hurt they can to others, by raising and propagating prejudices against the word, and the faithful preachers of it. Those who will not comply with God, and walk after him, confront him, and walk contrary to him. So this generation did; because they were resolved not to believe Christ and John, and to own them as they ought to have done for the best of men, they set themselves to abuse them, and to represent them as the worst.
(1.) As for John the Baptist, they say, He has a devil. That he was afflicted with melancholy, and some kind or degree of a possession of Satan. "Why should we heed him? he is a poor hypochondriacal man, full of fancies, and under the power of a crazed imagination." (2.) As for Jesus Christ, they imputed his free and obliging conversation to the more vicious habit of luxury and flesh-pleasing; Behold a gluttonous man and a wine-Drunkard, how can his deportment be contrary; it is the charge against the rebellious son, (Deut. 21. 20.) He is a glutton and a drunkard; and yet none could be more false and unjust; for Christ pleased not himself, (Rom. 15. 3.) nor did ever any man live such a life of self-denial, mortification, and contempt of the world, as Christ lived; he that was unfiled, and separate from sinners, is here represented as in league with them, and polluted by them.
Note. They are dispossessed of some of their own riches, and the unparallelled excellency, will not always be a fence against the reproach of tongues: nay, a man's best gifts and best actions, which are both well intended and well calculated for edification, may be made the matter of his reproach. The best of our actions may become the worst of our accusations, as David's fasting, Ps. 69. 10. It was true in some sense, that Christ was a Friend to publicans and sinners; the best Friend they ever had, for he came into the world to save sinners, great sinners, even the chief; so he said very feelingly, who had been himself not a pubican and sinner, but a Pharisee and sinner; but this is, and will be to eternity, Christ's praise, and they forfeited the benefit of it who thus turned it to his reproach.
Note. 3. That the cause of this great unfruitful-ness and perverseness of people under the means of grace, is because they are like children sitting in the markets; they are foolish as children, froward as children, mindless and playful as children; would they but show themselves men in understanding, there would be some hopes of them. The market-place they sit in, is to some a place of idleness; (eb. 20. 3.)
to others a place of worldly business; (James 4. 13.)
to others it is to some a place of sin; and we ask the reason why people get so little good by the means of grace, you will find it is, because they are slothful and trifling, and do not love to take pains;
or because their heads, and hands, and hearts are full of the world, the cares of which choke the word, and choke their souls at last, (Ezek. 33. 31. Amos 8. 5.) and they study to divert their own thoughts from every thing that is serious. Thus in the markets they are, and there they sit; in these things their hearts rest, and by them they resolve to abide.
Note. 5. Though the means of grace be thus slighted and abused by many, by the most, yet there is a remnant that, through grace, do improve them, and answer the designs of them, to the glory of God, and the good of their own souls. But wisdom is justified by all her children. Christ is Wisdom; in him he hid treasures of wisdom; the saints are the children God has given him, Heb. 2. 13. The gospel is wisdom, it is the wisdom from above: true believers are begotten again by it, and born from above too:
you are wise children, wise for themselves, and their true interests; not like the foolish children that sat at the markets. These children of wisdom justify wisdom, they enjoy the benefits of wisdom, and without the intentions of it, and are suitably affected with, and impressed by, the various methods it takes, and so evidence the wisdom of Christ in taking these methods. This is explained, Luke 7. 29. The publicans justified God, being baptized with the bap-

tion of John, and afterwards embracing the gospel of Christ. Note, The success of the means of grace justifies the wisdom of God, in the choice of these means, against those who charge him with folly therein. The care of every patient, that observes the physician's orders, justifies the wisdom of the physician: and therefore Paul is not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, because whatever it is to others, that Nazianzen says, has been to him "a perfection renovation, Rom. 1. 16. When the cross of Christ, which to others is foolishness and a stumbling-block, is to them that are called the wisdom of God, and the power of God, (1 Cor. 1. 23, 24,) so that they make the knowledge of that, the summit of their ambition, (1 Cor. 2. 2.) and the efficacy of that, the crown of their glorying, (Gal. 6. 14.) here is wisdom justified. Her children are taught by this wisdom to reflect upon the children of the world, (Isa. 44, 20,) and shall be produced as witnesses in that day, when wisdom, that is now justified by the saints, shall be glorified in the saints, and admired in all them that believe, 2 Thess. 1. 10. If the unbelief of some reproach Christ, by giving him the lie; the faith of others shall honour him, by setting to its seal that he is true, and that he also is wise, 1 Cor. 1. 23. Whether we applaud it, it will be done; not only God's equity, but his wisdom, will be justified when he speaks, when he judges. Well, this is the account Christ gives of that generation, and that generation is not passed away, but remains in a succession of the like; for as it was then, it has been since and is still; some believe the things which are spoken, and some believe not, Acts 28. 24. II. As to the particular places in which Christ was most conversant. What he said in general of that generation, he applied in particular to those places, to affect them. Then began he to upbraid them, v. 20. He began to preach to them long before, (ch. 4. 17,) but he did not begin to upbraid till now. Note, Rough and unpleasing methods must not be taken, till gentler means have first been used. Christ is not apt to upbraid; he gives liberally, and upbraideth not, till sinners by their obstinacy extort it from him. Wisdom first invites, but when her invitations are slighted, then she upbraids, Prov. 1. 20, 24. Those do not go in Christ's method, who begin with upbraidings. Now observe, 1. The sin charged upon them; not any against the moral law, then an appeal would have lain to the gospel, which would have relieved, but a sin against the gospel, the remedial law, and that is impiety among the Christians, and this way of dealing with them was brought upon them, for the most shameful, ungrateful thing that could be, that they repented not. Note, Willful impiety is the great damning sin of multitudes that enjoy the gospel, and which (more than any other) sinners will be upbraided with to eternity. The great doctrine that both John the Baptist, and Christ, and the apostles preached, was repentance; and Christ so designed, both in the John and in the Parable, as to prevail with people to change their minds and ways to leave their sins and turn to God; and this they would not be brought to. He does not say, because they believed not; for some kind of faith many of them had, that Christ was a Teacher come from God; but, because they repented not; their faith did not prevail to the transforming of their hearts, and the reforming of their lives. Our faith will never do any thing for our other sins, that might lead them to repentance; but when they repented not, He upbraided them with that, as their refusal to be healed: He upbraided them with it, that they might upbraid themselves, and might at length see the folly of it, as that which alone makes the sad case a desperate one, and the wound incurable.

2. The aggravation of the sin; they were the cities in which most of his mighty works were done; for thence he his principal residence had been for some time. Note, Some places enjoy the means of grace in greater plenty, power, and purity, than other places. God is a free Agent, and acts so in all his dispositions, both as the God of grace, and the God of grace, and distinguishing grace. When Christ's mighty works, they should have been prevailed with, not only to receive his doctrine, but to obey his law; the curing of bodily diseases should have been the healing of their souls, but it had not that effect. Note, The stronger inducements we have to repent, the more heinous is the impiety, and the severer will the recompensing be; for Christ keeps account of the mighty works done for us too, by which also we should be led to repentance, Rom. 2. 4.

(1.) Chorazin and Bethsaida are here instanced, (v. 21, 22,) they have each of them their woe: We unto thee, Chorazin, woe unto thee, Bethsaida. Christ came into the world to bless us, but if that blessing be slighted, he has woes in reserve, and his woes are of all other the most terrible. These two cities were situated upon the sea of Galilee, the former on the east side, and the latter on the west, rich and populous places; Bethsaida was lately advanced to a city by Philip the tetrarch; out of it Christ took at least three of his apostles; thus highly were these places favoured! Yet because they knew not the day of their visitation, they fell under these woes, which stuck so close to them, that soon after this, they decayed, and dwindled into mean, obscure villages, so fatally as in ruin cities, and so certainly does the work of Christ take place!

Now Chorazin and Bethsaida are here compared with Tyre and Sidon, two maritime cities we read much of in the Old Testament, that had been brought to ruin, but began to flourish again; these cities bordered upon Galilee, but were in a very ill name among the Jews for idolatry and other wickedness. Christ sometimes went into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, (ch. 15. 21,) but never tolerated; the Jews would have taken it very heinous if he had; therefore Christ, to convince and humble them, here shows, [1.] That Tyre and Sidon would not have been so bad as Chorazin and Bethsaida. If they had had the same word preached, and the same miracles wrought among them, they would have repented, and that long ago, as Nineveh did when God showed them the hearts of all, knew that if he had gone and lived among them, and preached among them, he should have done more good there, than where he was; yet he continued where he was for some time, to encourage his ministers to do so, though they see not the success they desire. Note, among the children of disobedience, some are more easily won than others; and it is a great aggravation of the wickedness of any that the whole world of them, by the means of grace, not only see that there are many who sit under the same means that are wrought upon, but that there are many more that have been wrought upon, if they had enjoyed the same means. See Ezek. 3. 6, 7. Our repentance is slow and delayed, but theirs would have been speedy, they would have repented long ago. Ours has been slight and superficial, theirs would have been deep and solid, and thorough. You must observe, with an awful adoration of the divine sovereignty, that the Tyrians and Sidonians will justly perish in their sin, though, if they had had the means of grace, they would have repented; for God is a debtor to no man.

[2.] That therefore Tyre and Sidon shall not be so miserable as Chorazin and Bethsaida, but it shall be more tolerable for them in the day of judgment,
v. 25. Note, First, At the day of judgment the everlasting state of the children of men will, by an unerring and unalterable doom, be determined; happiness or misery, and the several degrees of each. Therefore it is called the eternal judgment, (Heb. 6. 2.) because decisive of the everlasting condition of the soul. Secondly, In that judgment, all the means of grace that were enjoyed in the state of probation will certainly come into the account, and it will be inquired, not only how bad we were, but how much better we might have been, had it not been our own fault, Isa. 3. 3, 4. Thirdly, Though the damnation of all that perish will be intolerable, yet the damnation of those who had the fullest and clearest discoveries made them of the power and grace of Christ, and yet repented not, will be of all other the most intolerable. The gospel-light and sound open the faculties, and enlarge the capacities of all that see and hear it, either to receive the riches of divine grace, or (as that grace be slighted) to take in the most plentiful effusions of divine wrath. If self-reproach be the torture of hell, it must needs be hell indeed to those who had such a fair opportunity of getting to heaven. Son, remember that.

(2.) Capernaum is here condemned with an emphasis, (v. 25.) “And thou, Capernaum, hold up thy hand, and hear thy doom.” Capernaum, above all the cities of Israel, was dignified with Christ’s most honourable residence; it was like Shiloh of old, the place where his chosen people were, and it shed with it as with Shiloh. Jer. 7. 12, 14. Christ’s miracles here were daily bread, and therefore, as the manna of old, were despised, and called light bread. Many a sweet and comfortable lecture of grace Christ had read them to little purpose, and therefore here he renders it a dreadful lecture of wrath: these who will not hear the former, shall be made to feel the latter.

We have here Capernaum’s doom,

[1.] Put absolutely: Thon which are exalted to heaven, shall be brought down to hell. Note, First, Those who enjoy the gospel in power and purity, are thereby exalted to heaven; they have therein a great honour for the present, and a great advantage for eternity; they are lifted up toward heaven; but it is with a curse, for these, though they cleave to the earth, they may thank themselves that they are not lifted up into heaven. Secondly, Gospel-advantages and advancements abused, will sink sinners so much the lower into hell. Our external privileges will be far from saving us, that if our hearts and lives be not agreeable to them, they will but inflame the reckonings: the higher the precipice is, the more fatal is the fall from it: Let us not therefore be high-minded, but fear; not slothful, but diligent. See Job 20. 6, 7.

[2.] We have it here put in comparison with the doom of Sodom—a place more remarkable, both for sin and ruin, than perhaps any other; and yet Christ here tells us, First, That Capernaum’s means would have saved Sodom. If these miracles had been done among the Sodomites, as they were among the Capernaumites, and they were not repented, and their city would have remained unto this day a monument of sparing mercy, as now it is of destroying justice, Jude 7. Note, Upon true repentance through Christ, even the greatest sin shall be pardoned and the greatest ruin prevented, that of Sodom not excepted. Angels were sent to Sodom, and it was not repented; but if Christ had been sent thither, and had formed the people, how well is it for us, then that the world to come is put in subjection to Christ, and not to angels! Heb. 2. 5. Lot would not have seemed as one that mocked if he had wrought miracles.

Secondly, That Sodom’s ruin will therefore be less at the great day than Capernaum’s. Sodom will have many sins to answer for, but not the sin of neglecting Christ, as Capernaum will. If the gospel prove a savour of death, a killing savour, it is doubtless so; it is of death unto death, so a great death; (2 Cor. 2. 16.) Christ had said the same of all other places; that receive not his ministers nor bid his gospel wel come; (2 Thess. 3. 14.) It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom than for that city. We that have now the written word in our hands, the gospel preached, and the gospel-ordinances administered to us, and live under the dispensation of the Spirit, have advantages not inferior to those of Chorazin, and Bethsaida, and Capernaum, and the account in the great day will be accordingly. It has therefore been justly said, that the professors of this age, whether they go to heaven or hell, will be the greatest debtors in either of these places; if to heaven, the greatest debtors to divine mercy, for those rich means that brought them thither; if to hell, the greatest debtors to divine justice, for those rich means that would have kept them from thence.

25. At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: 26. Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight. 27. All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him. 28. Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. 29. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls: 30. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.

In these verses we have Christ looking up to heaven, with thanksgiving to his Father for the sovereignty and security of the covenant of redemption; and looking around him upon this earth, with an offer to all the children of men, to whom these presents shall come, of the privileges and benefits of the covenant of grace.

I. Christ here returns thanks to God for his favour to these babes, who had the mysteries of the gospel revealed to them, (v. 25, 26.) Jesus answered and said. It is called an answer, though no other words are before recorded but his own, because it is so comfortable a reply to the melancholy considerations preceding, and is aptly set in the balance against them. The sin and ruin of those woful cities, no doubt, was a grief to the Lord Jesus; he could not but weep over them, as he did over Jerusalem; (Luke 19. 41.) with this thought therefore he refreshes himself. He could not but weep over Sodom, but he puts it into a thanksgiving; that for all this, though a remnant, though but babes, to whom the things of the gospel are revealed: though Israel be not gathered, yet shall he be glorious. Note, We may take great encouragement in looking upward to God, when round about us we see nothing but what is discouraging. It is sad to see how regardless most men are of their own happiness, but it is comfortable to think that the wise and faithful God will, however, effectually secure the interests of his own glory. Jesus answered and said, I thank thee. Note, Thanksgiving is a proper answer to dark and disquieting thoughts, and may be an effectual means to silence them. Songs of praise are sovereign cords to dropping souls, and will help to cure melancholy.
When we have no other answer ready to the suggestions of grief and fear, we may have recourse to this, I thank thee, O Father; let us bless God that it is not worse with us than it is.

Now in this thanksgiving of Christ, we may observe,

1. The titles he gives to God; O Father, Lord of heaven and earth. Note, (1.) In all our approaches to God, by praise as well as by prayer, it is good for us to eye him as a Father, and to fasten on that relation, not only when we ask for the mercies we want, but when we give thanks for the mercies we have received. Mercies are then doubly sweet, and powerful to enlarge the heart in praise, when the are backsliding and deviating from the order of our Father's hand: Giving thanks to the Father; Col. 1. 12. It becomes children to be grateful, and to say, Thank you, father, as readily as, Pray, father. (2.) When we come to God as a Father, we must withal remember, that he is Lord of heaven and earth; which obliges us to come to him with reverence, as to the sovereign Lord of all, and yet with confidence, as one able to do us whatever we need or can desire; to defend us from all evil and to supply us with all good. Christ, in Melchizedec, had long since blessed God as the Possessor, or Lord of heaven and earth; and in all our thanksgivings for mercies in the stream, we must give him the glory of the all-sufficiency that is in the fountain.

2. The thing he gives thanks for: Because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes. These things he does not say what things, but means the great things of the gospel, the things that belong to our peace, Luke 18. 42. He speaks thus emphatically of them, these things, because they were things that filled him and should fill us; all other things are as nothing to these things.

Note, (1.) The great things of the everlasting gospel have been and are hid from many that were wise and prudent, and yet revealed them to babes. These things he does not say what things, but means the great things of the gospel, the things that belong to our peace, Luke 18. 42. He speaks thus emphatically of them, these things, because they were things that filled him and should fill us; all other things are as nothing to these things.

(2.) While the wise and prudent men of the world are in the dark about gospel mysteries, even the babes in Christ have the sanctifying, saving knowledge of them: Thou hast revealed them unto babes. That is, the disciples of Christ were: men of mean birth and education; no scholars, no artists, no politicians, unlearned and ignorant men, Acts 4. 13. Thus are the secrets of wisdom which are double to that which is, (John 11. 6.) made known to babes and sucklings, that out of their mouth strength might be ordained, (Ps. 8. 2.) and God's praise thereby perfected. The learned men of the world were not made choice of to be the preachers of the gospel, but he hath chosen the foolish things of the world, 1 Cor. 2. 6, 10.

(3.) This difference between the wise and the foolish is of God's own making. (1.) It is he that has hid these things from the wise and prudent; he gave them parts, and learning, and much of human understanding above others, and they were proud of that, and rested in it, and looked no further; and therefore God justly denies them the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, and then, though they hear the sound of the gospel-tidings, they are to them as a strange thing. God is not the Author of their ignorance and error, but he leaves them to themselves, and their sin becomes their punishment, and the Lord is righteous in it. See John 12. 39, 40. Rom. 11. 7, 8. Acts 28. 26, 27. Had they honoured God with the wisdom and prudence they had, he would have given them the knowledge of these things; but because they served their lusts with them, he has hid their hearts from this understanding. (2.) It is he that has revealed them unto babes. Things revealed belong to our children, (Deut. 29. 29.) and to them he gives an understanding to receive these things, and the impressions of them. Thus he resists the proud, and gives grace to the humble, Jam. 4. 6. (3.) This is that which nothing but a revelation from the divine sovereignty, Christ himself reveals to them, that; Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. Christ here subscribes to the will of his Father in this matter; Even so. Let God take what way he pleases to glorify himself, and make use of what instruments he pleases for the carrying on of his own work; his grace is his own, and he may give or withhold it as he pleases. We can give no reason why Peter, a fisherman, should be made an apostle, and not Nicodemus, a Pharisee and a ruler of the Jews, though he also believed in Christ; but so it seemed good in God's sight. Christ said this in the hearing of his disciples, to show them that it was not for any merit of their own, that they were thus dignified and distinguished, but purely from God's good pleasure he made them to differ.

(5.) This way of dispensing divine grace is to be acknowledged by us, as it was by our Lord Jesus, with all thankfulness. We must thank God, [1.] That these things are revealed; the mystery hid from ages and generations is manifested; that they are revealed, not to a few, but to be published to all the world. [2.] That they are revealed to babes, that the meek and humble are beautified with this salvation; and this honour put upon them whom the world pours contempt upon. [3.] It magnifies the mercy to them, that these things are hid from the wise and prudent; distinguishing favours are most obliging. As Job adored the name of the Lord in taking away as well as in giving, so may we in hiding these things from the wise and prudent, as well as in revealing them unto babes; not as it is their misery, but as it is a method by which self is abased, proud thoughts brought down, all flesh silenced, and divine power and wisdom made to shine the more, 1 Cor. 2. 6, 7.

II. Christ here makes a gracious offer of the benefits of the gospel to all, and these are the things which are revealed to babes, v. 27, &c. Observe here,

1. The solemn preface which ushered in this call or invitation, both to command our attention to it, and to encourage our compliance with it. That we might have strong consolation, in flying for refuge to him, who before us, Christ prefixed his authority, produces his credentials; shall we see he is empowered to make this offer.

Two things he here lays before us, v. 27.

(1.) His commission from the Father: All things are delivered unto me of my Father. Christ, as God, is equal in power and glory with the Father; but as Mediator, he receives his power and glory from the Father; has all judgment committed to him. He is in a sense the judge between God and man, and to offer peace and happiness to the apostate world, upon such terms as he should think fit: he was sanctified and sealed to be the sole Mediator, to concert and establish this great affair. In order to this, he has all power both in heaven and earth; (ch. 28. 18.) power over all flesh; (John 17. 2.) authority to execute judgment, John 5. 22, 27. This encourages us to come to Christ, that he is commissioned to receive us, and to give us what we come for, and has all things delivered to him for that purpose, by him who is Lord of all.

All powers, all treasures are in his hand. Observe, The Father has delivered his all into the hands of the Lord Jesus; let us but deliver our all into his hand, and the work is done. God has given wise judges and zealous Referees, blessed Daysmen, to lay his hand upon us both: that which we have to do is to agree to the reference, to submit to the arbitration of the Lord Jesus, for the taking up of this unhappy controversy, and to enter into bonds to stand to his award.

(2.) His intimacy with the Father: Ab man knoweth the Son but the Father. As God knew his Son, so the Father knew man the Father saves the Son. This gives us a further satisfaction, and an abundant one. Ambassadors use to have not only their commissions, which they produce, but their instructions, which they reserve to themselves, to be made use of as there is occasion in their negotiations: our Lord Jesus had both, not only authority, but ability, for his undertaking. In transacting the great business of our deliverance, the Father and the Son were parties principally concerned: the counsel of peace is between them, Zech. 6. 13. It must therefore be a great encouragement to us to be assured, that they understood one another very well in this affair; that, he Father knew the Son, and the Son knew the Father, and both perfectly, (a mutual consciousness we may call it, between the Father and the Son,) so that there could be no mistake in the settling of this affair, after their foreknowledge, the overthow of contracts, and the breaking of the measures taken, through their misunderstanding one another. The Son had lain in the bosom of the Father from eternity, he was a secretarius— of the cabinet-council, John 1. 18. He was by him, as one brought up with him, (Prov. 25. 30.) so that none knows the Father save the Son, he adds, and he to whom the Son will reveal him. Note, (1.) The happiness of men lies in an acquaintance with God: it is life eternal, it is the perfection of rational beings. (2.) Those who would have an acquaintance with God, must apply themselves to Jesus Christ: for the light of the knowledge of the glory of God shines in the face of Christ, 2 Cor. 4. 6. We are obliged to Christ for all the revelation we have of God the Father’s will and love, ever since Adam sinned; there is no comfortable introduction to God and sinful man, but in and by a Mediator, John 14. 6.

2. Here is the offer itself that is made to us, and an invitation to accept of it. After so solemn a preface, we may well expect something very great: and it is so, a faithful saying, and well worthy of all acceptation; words whereby we may be saved. We are here invited to Christ as our Priest, Prince, and Prophet, to be saved, and, in order to that, to be rul’d and taught, by him.

(1.) We must come to Jesus Christ as our Rest, and repose ourselves in him, (v. 28.) Come unto me, all ye that labour. Observe, [1.] The character of the persons invited; all that labour, and are heavy laden. This is a word in season to him that is wea tired. Isa. 53. 5. The Christian’s maxim is, The yoke of the ceremonial law, which weakens, burdens, and debases the soul, is not to be endured, but to be laid off. (2.) The burden of sin, both the guilt and the power of it. Note, All those, and those only are invited to rest in Christ, that are sensible of sin as a burden, and groan under it, that are not only convinced of the evil of sin, of their own sin, but are contrite in soul for it; that are really sick of their sins, weary of the service of the world and of the flesh; that see their state sad and dangerous by reason of sin, and are in pain and fear about it, as Ephraim, (Jer. 31. 18—20.) the prodigal, (Luke 15. 17.) the publican, (Luke 18. 13.) Peter’s heart, (Acts 2. 36.) Paul, (Acts 9. 4.) the publican, (Acts 15. 9.) the jailor, Acts 16, 29, 30. This is a necessary preparative for pardon and peace. The Comforter must first convunce; (John 16. 8.) I have torn, and then will heal.

[2.] The invitation itself: Come unto me. That glorious display of Christ’s greatness which we had, (v. 27.) as Lord of all, might frighten us from him, but this invitation will quiet our fears, and humble us, that we may touch the top of it and may live. Note, It is the duty and interest of weary and heavy laden sinners to come to Jesus Christ. Renouncing all those things which stand in opposition to him, or in competition with him, we must accept of him, as our Physician and Advocate, and give up ourselves to his conduct and government; freely willing to be led by him, to tell the end from the beginning, to do their business according to God’s terms. Come and cast that burden upon him, under which thou art heavy laden. This is the gospel call, The Spirit saith, Come; and the bride saith, Come; Let him that is athirst come: Whoever will, let him come.

[3.] The blessing promised to those that do come: I will give you rest. Christ is our Noah, whose name signifies rest, for this shall give us rest. Gen. 8. 20—21. Truly rest is good, (Gen. 49. 15.) especially to those that labour, and are heavy laden, Excl. 5. 12. Note, Jesus Christ will give assured rest to those weary souls, that by a lively faith come to him for it; rest from the terror of sin, in a well-grounded peace of conscience; rest from the power of sin, in a regular order of the soul, and its due government of itself: a rest in God, and a completeness of soul in his love, Ps. 118. 28—29. (This is that rest which remains for the people of God, (Heb. 4. 9.) begun in grace, and perfected in glory.

(2.) We must come to Jesus Christ as our ruler, and submit ourselves to him, (v. 29.) Take my yoke upon you. This must go along with the former, for Christ is exalted to be both a Prince and Saviour, a Priest upon his throne. The rest he promises isa rest from the laborious yoke of sin, from the yoke of the service of God, and an obligation to the duty we owe to him. Note, Christ has a yoke for our necks, as well as a crown for our heads, and this yoke he expects we should take upon us and draw in. To call those who are weary and heavy laden, to take a yoke upon them, looks like adding affliction to the afflicted; but the pertinency of it lies in the word my: You are under a yoke which makes you weary, take that off and try mine, which will make you easy. Servants are said to be under the yoke, (1 Tim. 6. 1.) and subjects, 1 Kings 12. 10. To take Christ’s yoke upon us, is to put ourselves into the relation of servants and subjects to him, and then to conduct ourselves accordingly, in a conscientious obedience to all his commands, and a cheerful submission to all his disposals: it is to obey the gospel of his son, by taking upon you the yoke of the Lord: it is Christ’s yoke; the yoke he has approved, the yoke he offered himself drawn in before us, for he learned obedience, and which he does by his Spirit draw in with us, for he helpeth our infirmities, Rom. 8. 26. A yoke speaks some hardship, but if the beast must draw, the yoke helps him. Christ’s commands are all in our favour: we must take this yoke upon us to draw in it. We are yoked to work, and therefore must be diligent; we are yoked to submit, and therefore must be humble and patient; we are yoked together with our fellow-servants, and therefore must keep up the communion of saints: and the words of the vine are as grapes, to those who are thus yoked.

Now this is the hardest part of our lesson, and therefore it is qualified, (v. 30.) My yoke is easy and my burden is light; you need not be afraid of it.

1. The yoke of Christ's commands is an easy yoke; it is peaceful, not only easy, but gracious, so the word signifies; it is sweet and pleasant; there is nothing in it to gall the yielding neck, nothing to hurt us, but on the contrary, much to refresh us. It is a yoke that is lined with love. Such is the nature of all Christ's commands, so reasonable in them- selves, and all summed up in one word, and that a sweet word, love. So powerful are the assistance he gives us, so suitable the encouragements, and so strong the consolations that are to be found in the way of duty, that we may truly say, it is a yoke of pleasantness. It is easy to the new nature, very easy to him that understandeth, Prov. 14. 6. It may be a little hard at first, but it is easy afterwards; the love of God and the hope of heaven will make it easy.

2. The burden of Christ's cross is a light burden, very light: afflictions from Christ, which befall us as men; afflictions for Christ, which befall us as Christians; the latter are especially meant. This burden in itself is not justus, but grievous; yet as it is Christ's, it is light. Paul knew as much of it as any man, and he calls it light affliction, (2 Cor. 12. 7.) Christ's sympathy, (Isa. 63. 9. Dan. 3. 28.) and especially the Spirit's aids and comforts, (2 Cor. 1. 5.) make suffering for Christ, light and easy. As afflictions abound, and are prolonged, consolations abound, and are prolonged too. Let this therefore reconcile us to the difficulties, and help us over the discouragements, we may meet with, both in doing work and suffering work; though we may lose for Christ, we shall not lose by him.

3. We must come to Jesus Christ as our Teacher, and set ourselves to learn of him, ver. 29. Christ has erected a great school, and has invited us to be his scholars. We must enter ourselves, associate with his scholars, and daily attend the instructions he gives by his word and Spirit. We must converse much with what he said, and have it ready to use upon all occasions; the most convenient to what he did, and follow his steps, 1 Pet. 2. 21. Some make the following words, for I am meek and lowly in heart, to be the particular lesson we are required to learn from the example of Christ. We must learn of him to be meek and lowly, and must mortify our pride and passion, which render us so unlike to him. We must so learn of Christ as to learn Christ, (Eph. 4. 20.) for he is both Teacher and Lesson, Guide and Way, and All to All.

Two reasons are given why we must learn of Christ.

1. I am meek and lowly in heart, and therefore fit to teach you. First, He is meek, and can have compassion on the ignorant, whom others would be in a passion with. Many able teachers are hot and hasty, which is a great discouragement to those who are dull and slow; but Christ knows how to bear with such, and to open their understandings. His carriage toward his twelve disciples was a specimen of this; he was mild and gentle with them, and made the best of them; though they were heedless and forgetful, he was not extreme to mark their follies. Secondly, He is lowly in heart. He condescends to teach poor scholars, to teach novices; he chose disciples, not for merit, but for humility, and to open their understandings. He teaches the first principles, such things as are milk for babes; he stoops to the meanest capacities; he taught Ephraim to go, Hos. 11. 3. Who teaches like him? It is an encouragement to us to put ourselves to school to such a Teacher. This humility and meekness, is it qualifies him to be a Teacher, so it will be the best qualification of those who are to be taught by him; for the meek will guide in judgment, Ps. 25. 9.

2. You shall find rest to your souls. This promise is borrowed from Jer. 6. 16., for Christ delighted to express himself in the language of the prophets, to show the harmony between the two Testaments. Note, First, Rest for the soul is the most desirable rest; to have the soul to dwell at ease. Secondly, The only way, and a sure way to find rest for our souls, is, to sit at Christ's feet and hear his word. The way of duty is the way of rest. The understanding finds rest in the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ, and is there abundantly satisfied, finding that wisdom in the gospel which has been sought for in vain throughout the whole creation, Job 28. 12. The truths Christ teaches are such as may vent our souls upon. The affections find rest in the love of God and Jesus Christ, and meet with that in them which gives them an abundant satisfaction; quietness and assurance for ever. And those satisfactions will be perfected and perpetuated in heaven, where we shall see and enjoy God immediately, shall see him as he is, and enjoy him as he is ours. This rest is to be had with Christ for all those who learn of him. Well, this is the substance and substance of the gospel-call and offer: we are here told, in a few words, what the Lord Jesus requires of us, and it agrees with what God said of him once and again. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him.

CHAP. XII.

In this chapter, we have, 1. Christ's clearing of the law of the fourth commandment concerning the Sabbath-day, and vindicating it from some supposititious notions advanced by the Jewish teachers; showing that works of necessity and mercy are to be done on that day, v. 1. 13. 11. The prudence, humility, and self-denial of our Lord Jesus in working his miracles, v. 14. . . . 21. 11. Christ's answer to the blasphemous cards and calumnies of the Scribes and Pharisees, who imputed his casting out devils to a compact with the Devil, v. 22. . . . 37. IV. Christ's reply to a tempting demand of the Scribes and Pharisees, challenging him to show them a sign from heaven, v. 38. . . . 45. 1. Christ's judgment about his kindred and relations, v. 46. . . . 50.

1. At that time Jesus went on the Sabbath-day through the corn; and his disciples were an hungred, and began to pluck the ears of corn, and to eat. But when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto him, Behold, thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the Sabbath-day. But he said unto them, Have ye not read what David did when he was an hungred, and they that were with him; 4. How he entered into the house of God, and did eat the shew-bread, which was not lawful for him to eat, neither for them which were with him, but only for the priests? 5. Or have ye not read in the law, how that on the Sabbath-days the priests in the temple profane the Sabbath, and are blameless? 6. But I say unto you, that in this place is one greater than the temple. 7. But if ye have known what this meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless. 8. For the Son of man is Lord even of the Sabbath-day. 9. And when he was departed thence, he went into their synagogue: 10. And, behold, there was a man which had his hand withered. And they asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath-days? that they might accuse him. 11. And he said unto them, What man shall there be among you that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit on the Sabbath-day, will he not lay it hold on, and lift it out? 12. How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath-days! 13. Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth; and it was restored whole, like as the other.

The Jewish teachers had corrupted many of the commandments, by interpreting them more loosely than they were intended; a mistake which Christ discovered and rectified, (ch. 5.) in his sermon on the mount. In the fourth commandment, they had erred in the other extreme, and interpreted it too strictly. Note, It is common for men of corrupt minds, by their zeal in rituals, and the external services of religion, to think to atone for the looseness of their morals. But they are cursed who add to, as well as who take from, the words of this book, Rev. 22. 16, 19. Prov. 30. 6.

Note, that which our Lord Jesus here lays down is, that the works of necessity and mercy are lawful on the Sabbath-day, which the Jews in many instances were taught to make a scruple of. Christ's indubious explanation of the fourth commandment, intimates its perpetual obligation to the religious observance of one day in seven, as a holy sabbath. He would not expound a law that was immediately to expire, but doubtless intended hereby to settle a point which would be of use to his church in all ages; and so it is to teach us, that our christian sabbath, though under the direction of the fourth commandment, is not under the injunctions of the Jewish elders.

It is usual to settle the meaning of a law by judgments given upon cases that happen in fact, and in like manner is the meaning of this law settled. Here are two passages of story put together for this purpose, happening at some distance of time from each other, and of a different nature, but both answering this intention.

1. Christ, by justifying his disciples in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath-day, shows that works of necessity are lawful on that day. Now he saith,

1. What it was that the disciples did. They were following their Master one sabbath-day through a corn-field; it is likely they were going to the synagogue, (v. 9.) for it becomes not Christ's disciples to take idle walks on that day,) and they were hungry; let it be no disparagement to our Master's housekeeping. But we will suppose they were so intent upon the sabbath-work, that they forgot to eat bread; and spent so much time in their morning worship, that they had no time for their morning meal, but came out fasting, because they would not come late to the synagogue. Providence ordered it that they went through the corn, and there they were supplied. Note, God has many ways of bringing suitable provision to his people when they need it, and will take particular care of them when they are going to the synagogue, as of old for them that went up to Jerusalem to worship, (Ps. 84. 6, 7.) for whose use the rain filled the pools: while we are in our way of duty, Jehovah-Jireh, let God provide for us. Being in the corn-fields, they began to pluck the ears of corn; the law of God allowed this, (Deut. 23. 25.) to teach people to be neighbourly, and not to insist upon property in a small matter, whereby another may be benefited. This was but slender provision for Christ and his disciples, but it was the best they had; and they were content with it. The famous Mr. Ball, of Ayr, used to say he had two dishes of meat to his sabbath-dinner, a dish of hot milk, and a dish of cold, and he had enough and enough.

2. What was the offence that the Pharisees took at this. It was but a dry breakfast, yet the Pharisees would not let them eat that in quietness. They did not quarrel with them for taking another man's corn, (they were no great zealots for justice,) but for doing it on the sabbath-day; for plucking and rubbing the ears of corn on that day, was expressly forbidden by the tradition of the elders, for this reason, because it was a kind of reaping. Note, It is no new thing for the most harmless and innocent actions of Christ's disciples to be evil spoken of and reflected upon as unlawful, especially by those who are zealous for their own inventions and impositions. The Pharisees and Scribes had the strictness of the sabbath-day, for doing that which it was not lawful to do. Note, These are no friends to Christ and his disciples, who make that to be unlawful which God has not made to be so.

3. What was Christ's answer to this cavil of the Pharisees. The disciples could say little for themselves, especially because those who quarrelled with them were no strangers to the strictness of the sabbath-sanctification on their side; and it is safest to err on that hand: but Christ came to free his followers, not only from the corruptions of the Pharisees, but from their unscriptural impositions, and therefore has something to say for them, and justifies what they did, though it was a transgression of the canon.

(1.) He justifies them by precedents, which were allowed to be good by the Pharisees themselves.

1. [The] 12. Man must eat, even David, who in a case of necessity did that which otherwise he ought not to have done; (v. 3, 4.) "Have ye not read the story (1 Sam. 21. &c.) of David's eating the shew-bread, which by the law was appropriated to the priest? (Lev. 24. 5—9.) It is most holy to Aaron and his sons; and (Exod. 29. 33.) a stranger shall not eat of it; yet the priest gave it to David and his men." For though the exception of a case of necessity was not expressed, yet it was implied in that and all other ritual institutions. That which bere out David in eating the shew-bread was not his dignity, (Uzziah, that invaded the priest's office in the pride of his heart, though a king, was struck with a leprosy for it, 2 Chron. 26. 16,) but his hunger. The greatest shall not have their lusts indulged, (2 Chron. 16. 17,) but shall hunger. "But hunger is a natural desire which cannot be mortified, but must be gratified, and cannot be put off with any thing but meat; therefore we say, It will break through stone walls. Now the Lord is for the body, and allowed his own appointment to be dispensed with in a case of distress; much more might the tradition of the elders be dispensed with. Note, That may be done in a case of necessity which may be done in time; there are laws which necessity has not, but it is a law to itself. Men do not desist, but pity, a thief that steals to satisfy his soul when he is hungry, Prov. 6. 30.

2. He urges a daily instance of the priests, which they likewise read in the law, and according to which was the constant usage, v. 5. The priests in the temple did a great deal of servile work on the sabbath-day; killing, flattering, burning, the sacrificed beasts, which in a command too would have been profaning the sabbath; and yet it was never reckoned any transgression of the fourth commandment, because the temple-service required and justified it. This intimates, that those labours are lawful on the sabbath-day which are necessary, not only to the support of life, but to the service of the day; as tolling a bell to call the congregation together, transfer to church, and the like that rests is to promote, not to hinder, sabbath-worship.

[1.] In this place is one greater than the temple, v. 6. If the temple-service would justify what the priests did in their ministration, the service of Christ would much more justify the disciples in what they did in their attendance upon him. The Jews had an innumerable by them the temple, it sanctified the gold; Stephen was accused for blasphemying that holy place; (Acts 6. 13.) but Christ, in a corn-field, was greater than the temple, for in him dwelt not the presence of God symbolically, but all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Note, If, whatever we do, we do it in the name of Christ, and as unto him, it shall be graciously accepted of God, however it may be remarkable and censured by men.

[2.] God will have mercy, and not sacrifice, v. 7. Ceremonial duties must give way to moral, and the natural, royal law of love and self-preservation must take place of ritual observances. This is quoted from Hos. 6. 6. It was used before, ch. 9. 13. in vindication of mercy to the souls of men; here, of mercy to their bodies. The rest of the sabbath was ordained for man's good, in favour of the body, Dent. 5. 14. Now no law was constructed so as to contradist its own end. If you had known what this means, you would have been sorry that they were forced to do this to satisfy their hunger, and would not have condemned the guiltless. Note, First, Ignorance is the cause of our rash and uncharitable censures of our brethren. Secondly, It is not enough for us to know the scriptures, but we must labour to know them in such a manner as to understand them. Thirdly, Ignorance of the meaning of the scripture is especially shameful in those who take upon them to teach others.

[3.] The Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath-day, v. 8. That law, as all the rest, is put into the hand of Christ, to be altered, enforced, or dispensed with, as he sees good. It was by the Son that God made the world, and by him he instituted the sabbath, and in his name he gave the fourth commandment at Mount Sinai, and as Mediator he is intrusted with the institution of ordinances, and to make what changes he thought fit; and particularly, as being Lord of the sabbath, he was authorized to make such an alteration of that day, as that it should become the Lord's day, the Lord Christ's day. And if Christ be the Lord of the sabbath, it is fit the day and all the work of it should be dedicated to him. By virtue of this power, Christ here enacts, that works of necessity, if they be really such, and not a pretended and self-created necessity, are lawful on the sabbath-day; and this explanation of the law plainly shows that it was to be perpetual. Exege tio fihmat regulam.—The execution confirms the rule.

Christ having thus silenced the Pharisees, and got clear of them, (v. 9.) departed, and went into their synagogue, the synagogue of these Pharisees, in order to dispute with them as he went along; they asked him, when they picked this quarrel with him. Note, First, We must take heed lest any thing that occurs in our way to holy ordinances unfit us for, or divert us from, our due attendances on them. Let us proceed in the way of our duty, notwithstanding the artifices of Satan, who endeavours by false men of corrupt minds, and many other ways, to ruffle and discompose us. Secondly, We must not, for the sake of private feuds and personal piques, draw back from public worship. Though the Pharisees had thus maliciously cavilled at Christ, yet he went into their synagogue. Satan gains his point, if, by sowing discord among brethren, he prevail to drive them, or any of them, from the synagogue, and so to discommode the faithful.

II. Christ, by healing the man that had the withered hand on the sabbath-day, shows that works of mercy are lawful and proper to be done on that day. The work of necessity was done by the disciples, and justified by him; the work of mercy was done by himself; the works of mercy were his works of necessity; it was his meat and drink to do good. I must preach, says he, Luke 4. 18. This cure is recorded for the sake of the time when it was wrought, on the sabbath.

Here is, 1. The affliction that this poor man was in; his hand was withered so that he was utterly disabled to get his living by working with his hands. St. Jerome says, that the gospel of Matthew in Hebrew, used by the Nazarenes and Ebiennites, adds this circumstance to this story of the man with the withered hand, that he was a cobbler, and applied himself to Christ thus: Lord, I am a cobbler, and have got my living by my labour; (manibus victam guaritas;) I beseech thee, O Jesus, restore me the use of my hand, that I may not be obliged to beg my bread, (ne turgifer mendicem cives.) Hieron, in loc. This poor man was in the synagogue. Note, Those who can do but little, or have but little to do for the world, must take no more of their souls as the rich, the aged, and the infirm.

2. A profitable question which the Pharisees put to Christ upon the sight of this man. They asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal? We read not here of any address this poor man made to Christ for a cure, but they observed Christ begin to take notice of him, and knew it was usual for him to be found of those that sought him not, and therefore with their eyes watched him, and made this question, if in this case as a stumbling-block in the way of doing good; Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath-day? Whether it was lawful for physicians to heal on that day or not, which was the thing disputed in their books, one would think it past dispute, that it is lawful for prophets to heal, for him to heal who discovered a divine power and goodness in all he did of this kind, and manifested himself to be sent of God. Christ answered, was ever any man, whether it be lawful to heal, to send his word and heal? It is true, Christ was now made under the law, by a voluntary submission to it, but he was never made under the precepts of the elders. Is it lawful to heal? To inquire into the lawfulness and unlawfulness of actions is very good, and we cannot apply ourselves to any with such inquiries more fitly than to Christ; but they asked here, not that they might be instructed by him, but that they might accuse him. If he should say that it was lawful to heal on the sabbath-day, they would accuse him of a contradiction to the fourth commandment; so to great a degree of superstition had the Pharisees brought the sabbath-rest, that, unless in private of life, they allowed not any medicinal operations on the sabbath-day. If he should say that it was not lawful, they would accuse him of partiality, having lately justified his disciples in violation of the laws of corn. If he the ears of corn.

3. Christ's answer to this question, by way of appeal to themselves, and their own opinion and practice, v. 11, 12. In case a thief (though but one, of which the less would not be very great) should fall
14. Then the Pharisees went out, and held a council against him, how they might destroy him. 15. But when Jesus knew it, he withdrew from them: and great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all; 16. And charged them that they should not make him known: 17. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, 18. Behold, my servant, whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my spirit upon him, and he shall shew judgment unto the Gentiles. 19. He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets. 20. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory. 21. And in his name shall the Gentiles trust.

As in the midst of Christ's greatest humiliations, there were proofs of his dignity, so in the midst of his greatest honours, he gave proofs of his humility; and when there was no sick man, yet did he give him an opportunity of making a figure, yet he made it appear that he emptied himself, and made himself of no reputation. Here we have,

I. The cursed malice of the Pharisees against Christ; (v. 14.) being enraged at the convincing evidence of his miracles, they went out, and held a council against him, how they might destroy him. That which vexed them was, not only that his miracles had honored God and theirs, but that the doctrine he preached was directly opposite to their pride, and hypocrisy, and worldly interest; but they pretended to be displeased at his breaking the sabbath-day, which was by the law a capital crime, Exod. 33. 2. Note, It is no new thing to see the vilest practices cloaked with the most specious pretences. Observe their policy; they took counsel about it, considered with themselves which way to do it effectually; they took counsel together in a close cabal about it, that they might both animate and assist one another. Observe their cruelty; they took counsel, not to imprison or banish him, but to destroy him, to be the death of him who canae that we might have life. What an indignity was hereby put upon our Lord Jesus, to run him down as an outlaw, (qui caput certum lexipatinum—carries a wolf's head,) and the plague of his country, who was the greatest Blessing of it, the Glory of his people Israel!

II. Christ's absconding upon this occasion, and the privacy he chose, to decline, not his work, but his danger; because his hour was not yet come, (v. 15.) he withdrew himself from them. He could have secured himself by miracle, but chose to do it in the common way of flight and retirement by grace in this, as in other things, he would submit to the sinless infirmities of our nature. Herein he humbled himself, that he was driven to the common shift of those who are most helpless; thus also he would give an example to his own rule, When they persecute you in one city, flee to another. Christ had said and done enough to convince those Pharisees, if reduced to extremity, or yielding to the conviction, they were hardened and enraged, and therefore he left them as incurable, Jer. 51. 9.

Christ did not retire for his own ease, nor seek an excuse to leave off his work; no, his retirements were filled up with business, and he was even then doing good, when he was forced to flee for the same. Thus he gave an example to his ministers, to do what they can, when they cannot do what they would, and to continue teaching, even when they are removed into corners. When the Pharisees, the great dons and doctors of that nation, followed Christ in them, and forced him to withdraw himself, yet the common people crowded after him, great multitudes followed him and found him out. This would turn to his reproach, and call him the King-leader of the mob; but it was really his honour, that all who were unbiased and unprejudiced, and not blinded by the pomp of the world, were so hearty, so zealous for him, that they would follow him wherever he went, and whatever hazards they run with him; as it was also the honour of his grace, that the poor were evangelized; that when they received him, he received them and healed them all. Christ came into the world to be a Physician-general, as the sun to the lower world, with healing under his wings. Though the Pharisees persecuted Christ for doing good, yet he went on in it, and did not let the people forsake the work for the wickedness of their rulers.

Note, Though some are unkind to us, we must not on that account be unkind to others.

Christ studied to reconcile usefulness and privacy; he healed them all, and yet (v. 16.) charged them that they should not make him known, which may be looked upon, 1. As an act of prudence; it was not so much the miracles themselves, as the public discourse concerning them, that enraged the Pharisees. v. 23, 24. The folly of Christ. Though he would not omit doing good, yet would do it with as little noise as possible, to avoid offence to them and peril to himself. Note, Wise and good men, though they covet to do good, yet are far from coveting to have it talked of when it is done; because it is God's acceptance, not men's applause, that they aim at. And in suffering under them, we must boldly go on to do what it is good to do; and not shrink from the circumstances of it so as not to exasperate, nor to render it necessary, those who seek occasion against us.

Be ye wise as serpents, ch. 10. 16. 2. It may be looked upon as an act of righteous judgment upon the Pharisees, who were unworthy to hear of any more of his miracles, having made so light of those they had seen. By shutting their eyes against the light, they had forfeited the benefit of it. 3. As an act of love and pity. Though Christ's intention in his miracles was to prove Messiah, and so to bring men to believe on him, in order to which it was requisite that they should be known, yet sometimes he charged the people to conceal them, to set us an example of humbleness, and to teach us not to proclaim our own goodness or usefulness, or to desire to have it proclaimed. Christ would have his disciples to be the reverse of those who did all their works to be seen of men.

III. The fulfilling of the scriptures in all this. v. 17. Christ retired into privacy and obscurity, that, though he was eclipsed, the word of God might be fulfilled, and so illustrated and glorified, which was the thing his heart was upon. The scripture here said to be fulfilled is Isa. 42. 1-4, which is quoted at large, v. 18-21. The scope of it is to show how mild and quiet, and yet how successful, our Lord Jesus should be in his undertaking; instances of both when we have in the foregoing passages. Observe here,

1. The pleasure of the Father in Christ; (v. 18.) Behold, my Servant whom I have chosen, my Beloved in whom my soul is well pleased. Hence we may learn,

(1.) That our Saviour was God's Servant in the great work of our redemption. He therein submitted himself to the Father's will, (Heb. 10. 7.) and set himself to serve the designs of his grace and the interests of his glory, in repairing the breaches that had been made by man's apostasy. As a Servant, he had a great work appointed him and a great trust reposed in him. This was a part of his humiliation, that though he was equal with God, yet that in the work of our salvation he took upon him the form of a servant, received a law, and came into bands. Though he were a son, yet learned he this obedience, Heb. 5. 8. The motto of this Prince, is let them do— I serve.

(2.) That Jesus Christ was chosen of God, as the only fit and proper Person for the management of the great work of our redemption. He came not to be courts of justice, but to be courted by God, yet that in the work of our salvation he took upon him the form of a servant, received a law, and came into bands. Though he were a son, yet learned he this obedience, Heb. 5. 8. The motto of this Prince, is let them do—I serve.

(3.) That Jesus Christ is God's Beloved, his beloved Son; as God, he lay from eternity in his bosom; (John 1. 18.) he was daily his Delight, Prov. 8. 30. Between the Father and the Son there was before all time an eternal and infinite conjunction of love. God declared, by a voice from heaven, that he was his beloved Son, and that in him he was well pleased, and thus the Lord possessed him in the beginning of his way, Prov. 8. 22. As Mediator, the Father loved him; then when it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and he submitted to it, therefore did the Father love him, John 10. 17.

(4.) That Jesus Christ is one in whom the Father is well pleased, in whom his soul is pleased; which denotes the highest complacency imaginable. God declared, by a voice from heaven, that he was his beloved Son, and that he was well pleased in him, because he was the ready and cheerful Undertaker of that work of wonder which God's heart was so much upon, and he is well pleased with us in him; for he has made us accepted in the Beloved, Eph. 1. 6. All the interest which fallen man has or can have in God, is grounded upon and owing to God's well-pleasedness in Jesus Christ; for there is no coming to the Father but by this Jesus, John 14. 6. The presence of the Father is the great happiness of the Father to him in two things.

(1.) That he should be every way well qualified for his undertaking; I will put my Spirit upon him, as a Spirit of wisdom and counsel, Isa. 11. 2, 3. Those whom God calls to any service, he will be sure to fit and qualify for it; and by that it will appear that he called them to it, as Moses, Exod. 4. 12. Christ, as God, was equal in power and glory with the Father; as Mediator, he received from the Father power and glory, and received that he might give: and all that the Father gave him, to qualify him for his undertaking, was summed up in this, he put his Spirit upon him; this was that oil of gladness with which he was anointed above his fellows, Heb. 1. 9. He received the Spirit, not by measure, but without measure, John 3. 34. Note, Whoever they be that God has chosen, and in whom he is well pleased, he will be sure to put his Spirit upon them. Wherever he confers his love, he confers somewhat of his likeness.

(2.) That he should be abundantly successful in his undertaking. Those whom God sends he will certainly own. It was long since secured by promise to our Lord Jesus, that the good pleasure of the Lord should prosper in his hand, Isa. 53. 10. And here we have an account of that prospering good pleasure.

[1.] He shall show judgment to the Gentiles. Christ in his own person preached to those who bordered upon the heathen nations, (see Mark 3. 6-8.) and by his apostles showed his gospel, called here, his judgment, to the Gentile world. The way and method of salvation, the judgment which is committed to the Son, is not only wrought out by him as our great High-Priest, but showed and published by him as a gospel, as it is a rule of practice and conversation, which has a direct tendency to the reforming and bettering of men's hearts and lives, shall be shown to the Gentiles. God's judgments had been the Jews' peculiar, (Psalm 147:19;) but it was often foretold, by the Old-Testament prophets, that they should be showed to the Gentiles, which therefore ought to have been a surprise, and it was a clever deceiving Jews, much less a vexation.

[2.] In his name shall the Gentiles trust, v. 21. He shall so show judgment to them, that they shall heed and observe what he shows them, and be influenced by it to depend upon him, to devote themselves to him, and conform to that judgment. Note, The great design of the gospel is to bring people to trust in the name of Jesus Christ; his name Jesus, a Saviour, that precious name whereby he is called, and which is as ointment poured forth; The Lord our Righteousness. The evangelist here follows the Septuagint; (or perhaps the latter editions of the Septuagint follow the evangelist;) the Hebrew (Isa. 42:4.) is, The isles shall wait for his law. The isles of the Gentiles are spoken of (Gen. 10.5.) as peopled by the sons of Japheth, (Gen. 10;) and Japheth shall spread abroad Japheth to dwell in the tents of Shem; which was now to be fulfilled, when the isles, (says the prophet,) the Gentiles, (says the evangelist,) shall wait for his law, and trust in his name; compare these together, and observe, that they, and they only, can with confidence trust in Christ's name, that wait for his law with a resolution to be ruled by it. Observe also, that the law we without issue are cast aside, that if we trust in his name. This is now his great commandment, that we believe in Christ, 1 John 3.23.

3. The prediction concerning him, and his mild and quiet management of his undertaking, v. 19, 20. It is chiefly for the sake of this, that it is here quoted, upon occasion of Christ's affected privacy and concealment.

(1.) That he should carry on his undertaking without severity and rigour, (v. 20.) A bruised reed shall he not break. Some understand this of his patience in bearing with the wicked; he could as easily have broken these Pharisees as a bruised reed, and have quenched them as soon as smoking flax; but he will not do it till the judgment-day, when all his enemies shall be broken down and trodden under foot. Others understand it of his power and grace in bearing up the weak. In general, the design of his gospel is to establish such a method of salvation as encourages sincerity, though there be much infirmity; it does not insist upon a sinless obedience, but accepts an upright, willing mind. As to particular persons, that follow Christ in meekness, and in much trembling, observe, [1.] How their case is here described—they are like a bruised reed, and smoking flax. Young beginners in religion are weak, as a bruised reed, and their weakness offensive like smoking flax; some little life they have, but it is like that of a bruised reed; some little heat, but like that of smoking flax. Christ's disciples were as yet but weak, and many are so that have a place in his family. The grace and goodness in them are as a bruised reed, the corruption and baseness in them are as smoking flax, as the wick of a candle when it is put out and is yet smoking. [2.] What is this compassion of our Lord Jesus toward them. He will not discourage them, much less reject them or cast them off; the reed that is bruised shall not be broken and trodden down, but shall be supported, and made as a strong cedar or flourishing palm-tree. The candle newly lighted, though it only smokes and does not flame, shall not be blown out, but blown up. The day of small things is the day of precious things, and therefore he will not despise it, but make it the day of great things, Zech. 4.10. Note, Our Lord Jesus deals very tenderly with those who have true grace, though they be weak in it, Isa. 40.11. Heb. 5.2. He remembers not only that we are dust, but that we are flesh. [3.] The good issue and success of this, intimadated in this, till he send forth his word, the Son of Man from heaven, and the word, which he showed to the Gentiles shall be victorions, he will go on conquering and to conquer, Rev. 6.2. Both the preaching of the gospel in the world, and the power of the gospel in the heart, shall prevail. Grace shall get the upper hand of corruption, and shall at length be perfected in glory. Christ's judgment will be brought forth to victory, for when he judges he will overcome. He shall bring forth judgment unto truth; so it is, Isa. 42.3. Truth and victory are much the same, for great is the truth, and will prevail.

22. Then was brought unto him one possessed with a devil, blind and dumb; and he healed him, insomuch that the blind and dumb both spake and saw. 23. And all the people were amazed, and said, Is not this the son of David? 24. But when the Pharisees heard it, they said, This fellow doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils. 25. And Jesus knew their thoughts, and said unto them, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand: 26. And if Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself; how shall then his kingdom stand? 27. And if I cast out devils, by whom do your children cast them out? Therefore they shall be your judges. 28. But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you. 29. Or else, how can one enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man? and then will he spoil his house. 30. He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad. 31. Wherefore I say unto you, All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men: but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. 32. And whatsoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come. 33. Either make the tree good, and his fruit good: or else make the tree corrupt, and his fruit corrupt; for the tree is known by his fruit. 34. O generation of vipers! how can ye, being evil, speak good things? For out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.

In these verses, we have,

1. Christ's glorious conquest of Satan, in the gracious cure of one who, by the divine permission, was under his power, and in his possession, v. 22. Here observe,

1. The man's case was very sad; he was possessed with a devil. More cases of this kind occurred in Christ's time than usual, that Christ's power might be displayed. See the note on Matt. 8:27. A man's power is manifested, in opposing and dispossessing Satan; and that it might the more evidently appear, that he came to destroy the works of the devil. This poor man that was possessed was blind and dumb; a miserable case! he could neither see to help himself, nor speak to others to help him. A soul under Satan's power, and led captive by him, is blind in the things of God, and dumb at the throne of grace; sees nothing, and says nothing, to the purpose. Satan blinds the eye of faith, and seals up the lips of prayer.

2. His cure was very strange, and the more so, because sudden; he healed him. Note, The conquering and dispossessing of Satan is the healing of souls. And the cause being removed, immediately the effect ceased: the blind and dumb both spake and saw. Note, Christ's mercy is directly opposite to Satan's malice; his favours, to the devil's mischiefs. When Satan's power is broken in the soul, the eyes are opened to see God's glory, and the lips opened to speak his praise.

11. The conviction which this gave to the people, to all the people; they were amazed. Christ had wrought divers miracles of this kind before; but his works are not the less wonderful, nor the less to be wondered at, for that they were often repeated; as these they inferred from it, "Is not this the Son of David? Is not this the Son of the Messias promised, to was to spring from the loins of David? Is not this he that should come?" We may take this, 1. As an inquiring question; they asked, Is not this the Son of David? But they did not stay for an answer; the impressions were cogent, but they were transient. It was a good question that they started; but, it should seem, it was soon lost, and was not properly pressed and prosecuted as these should be brought to a head, and then they are likely to be brought to the heart. Or, 2. As an affirming question; Is not this the Son of David? * * * Yes, certainly it is, it can be no other: such miracles as these plainly evince that the kingdom of the Messias is now in the setting up." And they were the people, theologians, and the spectres, that drew this inference from Christ's miracles. Atheists will say, "That was because they were less prying than the Pharisees;" no, the matter of fact was obvious, and required not much search; but it was because they were less prejudiced and biased by worldly interest. So plain and easy was the way made to this great truth of Christ's being the Messias and Saviour of the world, that the common people did not miss it. The way-faring men, though fools, could not err therein. See Isa. 35. 8. It was found of them that sought it. It is an instance of the condescensions of the divine grace, that the things that were hid from the wise and prudent were revealed unto babes. The world by wisdom knew not God, and by the foolish things the wise were confounded.

11. The blasphemous calumny of the Pharisees, v. 24. The Pharisees were a sort of men that pretended to more knowledge in, and zeal for, the divine law, than other people; yet they were the most inveterate enemies to Christ and his doctrine. They were proud of the reputation they had among the people; that fed their pride, supported their power, and filled their purses: and when they heard the people say, Is not this the Son of David? they were extremely irritated, more at that than at the natural and simple inference itself; this was a piece of our Lord Jesus, and apprehensive, that as his interest in the people's esteem increased, theirs must of course be eclipsed and diminished; therefore they envied him, as Saul did his father David, because of what the women sung of him, 1 Sam. 18. 7, 8. Note, Those who bind up their happiness in the praise and applause of men, expose themselves to a perpetual unseasonableness upon every favourable word that men speak of them, or a pour-favour. Let the friends of honour follow Christ, who fled from it, and fled from the Pharisees, who were eager in the pursuit of it. They said, "This fellow doth not cast out devils but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils, and therefore is not the Son of David." Observe,

1. How scornfully they speak of Christ, this fellow; as if that precious name of his, which is a ornament poured forth, were not in itself a powerful recovery of the honour, and the glory, and the favours, of his people. They were the worst examples of their pride and superciliousness, and their diabolical envy, that the more people magnified Christ, the more industrious they were to vitify him. It is a bad thing to speak of good men with disdain because they are poor. 2. How blasphemously they speak of his miracles; they could not deny the matter of fact; it was as plain as the sun, that devils were cast out by the word of Christ; nor could they deny that it was an extraordinary thing, and supernatural. Being thus forced to grant the premises, they had no other way to avoid the conclusion, that this is the Son of David, than by suggesting that Christ cast out devils by Beelzebub; that there was a compact between Christ and the devil; pursuant to that, the devil was not cast out, but did voluntarily retire, and give back by consent and with design; or as if, by an agreement with the ruling devil, he had power to cast out the inferior devils. No surmise could be more palpably false and vile than this; that he, who is Truth itself, should be in combination with the father of lies, to cheat the world. This was the last refuge, or subterfuge rather, of an obstinate infidelity, that was resolved to stand it out against the clearest conviction. Observe, Among the devils there is a prince, the ringleader of the apostasy from God and rebellion against him, but this prince is Beelzebub, the god of a fly, or a dung-hill-god. How art thou fallen, O Lucifer! from an angel of light, to be a lord of flies! Yet this is the prince of the devils, the chief of the gang of infernal spirits.
IV. Christ's reply to this base insinuation, v. 23
30. Jesus knew their thoughts. Note, Jesus Christ knows what we are thinking at any time, knows what is in man; he understands our thoughts of the best and worst that come to mind, the Pharisees could not for shame speak it out, but keep it in their minds; they could not expect to satisfy the people with it, they therefore reserved it for the silencing of the convictions of their own consciences. Note, Many are kept off from their duty by that which they are ashamed to own, but which they cannot hide from Jesus Christ: yet it is probable that the Pharisees had high thoughts of themselves, to help to harden another; but Christ's reply is said to be to their thoughts, because he knew what they said; that they did not say it in their haste, but that it was the product of a rooted malignity.

Christ's reply to this imputation is copious and cogent, that every mouth may be stopped with sense and reason, before it be stopped with fire and brimstone. Here are three arguments by which he demonstrates the unreasonableness of this suggestion.

1. It would be very strange, and highly improbable, that Satan should be cast out by such a compact, because then Satan's kingdom would be divided against itself; which, considering his subtlety, is not a thing to be imagined, v. 25, 26.

2. It is a known rule laid down, that in all societies a common ruin is the consequence of mutual quarrels: Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every family too: Qae enim domus tam stabilis est, qua tam firma civitas, quae non odit angue dissidius funditus eterni fossis—For what family is so strong, what community so firm, as not to be overthrown by enmity and dissension? Grec. Lect. Divisions commonly end in desolations; if the churches, we break; if we divide one from another, we become an easy prey to a common enemy; much more if we fight and devour one another, shall we be consumed one of another, Gal. 5. 13.

Churches and nations have known this by sad experience.

3. The casting out of devils was a certain token and indication of the approach and appearance of the kingdom of God; (v. 28.) "But if it be indeed that I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, as certainly I speak the words of God, I am not willing to receive it, yet the kingdom of the Messiah is now about to be set up among you." Other miracles that Christ wrought proved him sent of God, but this proved him sent of God to destroy the Devil's kingdom and his works. Now that great promise was evidently fulfilled, that the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head, Gen. 3. 15.

There has been a revelation of the kingdom of God, which has been long expected, is now commenced; slight it at your peril." Note, [1.] The destruction of the Devil's power is wrought by the Spirit of God; that Spirit who works to the obedience of faith, overthrows the interest of that spirit who works in the children of unbelief and disobedience. [2.] The casting out of devils is a certain introduction to the kingdom of God. If the Devil's interest in a soul be not only checked by custom or external restraints, but sunk and broken by the Spirit of God, as a Sanctifier, no doubt but the kingdom of God is come to that soul, the kingdom of grace, a blessed earnest of the kingdom of glory.

3. The comparing of Christ's miracles, particularly this of casting out devils, with his doctrine, is to lay stress upon the matchless of his power, that he is not confined to the work of a strong man; so is every unregenerate soul; where Satan resides, there he rules. Now, (1.) The design of Christ's gospel was to spoil the Devil's house, which, as a strong man, he kept in the world, to turn the people from darkness to light, from sin to holiness, from this world to a better, from the power of Satan unto God; (Acts 26. 18.) to alter the property of souls. (2.) Pursuant to this design, he bound the strong man, when he cast out unclean spirits by his word: thus he wrested the sword out of the Devil's hand, that he might wrest the scripture out of it. The doctrine of Christ teaches us how to construe his miracles, and when he showed how easily and effectually he could cast the Devil out of people's bodies, he encouraged all believers to hope that the weaker Satan might usurp and exercise in the souls of men, Christ by his grace would break it; he will spoil him, for it appears that he can bind him. When nations were turned from the service of idols to serve the living God, when some of the worst sinners were sanctified and justified, and became the best of saints, then Christ spoiled the Devil's house, and will spoil it more and more.

4. It is here intimated, that the way in which Christ was carrying on with vigour against the Devil and his kingdom, was such as would not admit of a neutrality, (v. 30.) He that is not with me, is against me. In the little differences that may arise between the disciples of Christ among themselves, we are taught to lessen the matters in variance, and to seek peace, by accounting those who are not against us, to be with us; (Luke 9. 46.) but in the great matter of his war against the Devil, there is no peace to be sought, nor any such favourable construction to be made of any difference in the matter; he that is not hearty for Christ, will be reckoned with as really against him: he that is cold in the cause, is looked upon as an enemy. When the dispute is between God and Balaam, there is no halting between two, (1 Kings 18. 21.) there is no trimming between Christ and Belial; for the kingdom of Christ, as it is eternally opposite to, so it will be eternally victorious over, the Devil's kingdom; and therefore in this cause there is no sitting still with Gilead beyond Jordan, or Asher on the sea-shore; (Judg. 5. 16, 17.) we must be entirely, faithfully, and immovably, on Christ's side: it is the right side, and will at last be the rising side; see Exod. 32. 36.

The latter clause is to the same purport; He that gathereth not with me, scattereth. Note, (1.) Christ's errand into the world was to gather, to gather in his harvest, to gather in those whom the Father had given him, John 11. 52. Eph. 1. 10. 2. Christ expects and requires from those who are with him, that they gather with him; that they not only gather to him themselves, but do all they can in their places, to gather others to him, and so to strengthen his interest. (3.) The holy war, which Christ is waging, will not appear, and act, as furtherers of Christ's kingdom, will be looked upon, and dealt with, as hinderers of it; if we gather not with Christ, we scatter; it is not enough, not to do hurt, but we must do good. Thus is the breach widened between Christ and Satan, to show that there was no such compact between them as the Pharisees whispered.

V. Here is a discourse of Christ's upon this occasion concerning tongue-sins; Christ foretells unto you. He urges them to turn from the people, from disputing to instructing; and from the sin of the Pharisees he warns the people concerning three sorts of tongue-sins; for others' harms are admonitions to us.

1. Blasphemous words against the Holy Ghost are the worst kind of tongue-sins, and unpardonable, v. 31, 32.

Here is a gracious assurance of the pardon of all sin upon gospel-terms: this Christ says to us, and it is a comfortable saying, that the greatness of sin shall be no bar to our acceptance with God, if we truly repent and believe the gospel: All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men. Though the sin has been as scarlet and crimson, (Isa. 1. 18.) though ever so heinous in its nature, ever so much aggravated by its circumstances, and ever so often repeated, though it reach up to the heavens yet with the Lord there is mercy, that reacheth beyond the heavens; mercy will be extended even to blasphemy, a sin immediately teaching God's name and honour: Paul obtained mercy, who had been a blasphemer, 1 Tim. 1. 13. Well may we say, Whom shall I praise? and whom shall I glorify? Micah 7. 18. Even words spoken against the Son of man shall be forgiven; as theirs were who reviled him at his death, many of whom repented and found mercy. Christ herein has set an example to all the sons of men, to be ready to forgive words spoken against them: I, as a deaf man, heard not. Observe, They shall be forgiven unto men, not to devils; this is love to the whole world of mankind, and to the whole world of fallen angels, that all sin is pardonable to them.

(2.) Here is an exception of the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, which is here declared to be the only unpardonable sin. See here,

(1.) What this sin is; it is speaking against the Holy Ghost. See what malignity there is in tongue-sins, when the only unpardonable sin is so. But Jesus knew their thoughts, v. 34. Observe, the presence and integrity of the Holy Ghost, or some of his more private operations, or merely the resisting of his internal working in the sinner himself, that is here meant; for whom then should be saved? It is adjudged in our law, that an act of indemnity shall always be construed in favour of that grace and clemency which is the intention of the act; and therefore the exceptions in the act are not to be extended further than needs must. The act of indemnity; none are excepted by name, nor any by description, but these only that blaspheme the Holy Ghost; which therefore must be construed in the narrowest sense: all presuming sinners are effectually cut off by the conditions of the indemnity, faith and repentance; and therefore the other exceptions must not be stretched far; and this blasphemy is excepted, not for any defect of mercy in God or merit in Christ, but because it in itself leaves the sinner in infidelity and impiety.

We have reason to think that none are guilty of this sin, who believe that Christ is the Son of God, and sincerely desire to have part in his merit and mercy: and those who fear they have committed this sin, give a good sign that they have not. The learned Dr. Whitby very well observes, that Christ speaks not of what was now said or done, but of what should be, (Mark 3. 28. Luke 12. 10.) Here shall blaspheme. As for those who blasphemed Christ when he was here upon earth, and called him a Winebibber, a Deceiver, a Blasphemer, and the like, they had some colour of excuse, because of the meanness of his appearance, and the prejudices of the nation against him; and the proof of his divine mission was not perfected till after his ascension; and therefore, upon their repentance, they shall be pardoned. It is discerned, and it is hoped that the proof is in Christ; therefore, they shall be forgiven.

Secondly, This was the most powerful evidence, and more apt to convince than miracles themselves. Thirdly, These therefore who blaspheme this dispensation of the Spirit, cannot possibly be brought to believe in Christ; those who should be his most close communion with Satan, as the Pharisees did the miracles, what can convince them? This is such a strong hold of infidelity as a man can never be beaten out of, and is therefore unpardonable, because hereby repentance is hid from the sinner's eyes.

[2.] What the sentence is that is passed upon it; It shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. This is the then prediction of the Jewish church, there was no sacrifice of expiation for the soul that sinned presumptuously; so neither under the dispensation of gospel-grace, which is often in scripture called the world to come, shall there be any pardon to such as tread under foot the blood of the covenant, and do despite to the Spirit of grace: there is no cure for a sin so directly against the remedy. It was a rule in our old law, No sanction for sacrifice. Or, It shall be forgiven, neither now, in the sinner's own conscience, nor in the great day, when the pardon shall be published. Or, This is a sin that exposes the sinner both to eternal and temporal punishment, both to present wrath and the wrath to come.

2. Christ speaks here concerning other wicked words, the products of corruption reigning in the heart, and breaking out thereof, (v. 32—35.) It was said (v. 25.) that Jesus knew their thoughts, and here he spoke with an eye to them, showing that it was not strange that they should speak so ill, when their hearts were so full of cunning and malice; which yet they often endeavoured to cloak and cover, by feigning themselves just men. Our Lord Jesus therefore points to the springs, and heals them; let the heart be sanctified, and it will appear in our words.

(1.) The heart is the root, the language is the fruit; (v. 33.) if the nature of the tree be good, it will bring forth fruit accordingly. Where grace is the reigning principle in the heart, the language will be the language of Canaan; and, on the contrary, whatever lust reigns in the heart it will break out; discussed lungs make an offensive breath: men's language discovers what country they are of, likewise what manner of spirit they are of: Either make the tree good, and then the fruit will be good; get pure hearts and then you will have pure lips and pure lives; or else the tree will be corrupt, and the fruit accordingly. You may make a crab-stock to become a good tree, by grafting into it a shoot from a good tree, and then the fruit will be good; but if the tree be still the same, plant it where you will, and water it how you will, the fruit will be still corrupt.” Note, Unless the heart be transformed, the life will never be thoroughly reformed. These Pharisees were shy of speaking out their wicked thoughts of Jesus Christ; but Christ here intimates, how vain it was for them to seek to hide that root of bitterness in them, that bore this gall and wormwood, which they could never sought to mortify it. Note, It should be more in our care to be good really, than to seem good outwardly.

(2.) The heart is the fountain, the words are the streams; (v. 34.) Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, as the streams are the overflowings of the spring. A wicked heart is said to send forth wickedness, as a fountain casts forth her waters, ler. 6. 7. An troubled fountain, and a corrupt spring, shall not yield up herbless water. (Prov. 11. 10.) It sends forth muddy and unpleasant streams. Evil words are the natural, genuine product of an evil heart. Nothing but the salt of grace, cast into the spring, will heal the waters, season the speech, and purify the corrupt communication. This they wanted, they were evil; and how can ye, being evil, speak good things? They were a generation of vipers; John Baptist had called them so, (ch. 3. 7.) and they were all still the same; for can the Ephesian change the leopard's spots, or the snake's skin? Pharisees are a generation of saints, but Christ calls them a generation of vipers, the seed of the serpent, that had an enmity to Christ and his gospel. Now what could be expected from a generation of vipers, but that which is poisonous and malignant? Can the viper be otherwise than venemous? Note, Bad things may be expected from bad people, as said the people looking upon him from the wicked, 1 Sam. 24. 13. The vile person shall speak vilfully, Isa. 32. 6. These who are themselves evil, have neither skill nor will to speak good things, as they should be spoken. Christ would have his disciples know what sort of men they were to live among, that they might know what to look for. They are as Exekiel among scorpions, (Ezek. 2. 6.) and must not think it strange if they be stung at any blow.

(3.) The heart is the treasure, the words are the things brought out of that treasure; (v. 35.) and from hence men's characters may be drawn, and may be judged of.

[1.] It is the character of a good man, that he has a good treasure in his heart, and from thence brings forth good things, as there is charity, (verse 49.) Graces, love and charity reigns in the heart, which are the knowledge, good resolutions, these are a good treasure in the heart; the word of God hidden there, the law of God written there, divine truths dwelling and ruling there, are a treasure there, valuable and suitable, kept safe and kept secret, as the stores of the good house-builder, but ready for use upon all occasions. A good man, thus furnished, will bring forth, as Joseph out of his stores; will be speaking and doing that which is good, for God's glory, and the edification of others. See Prov. 10. 11, 13, 14, 20, 21, 31, 32. This is bringing forth good things. Some pretend to good expenses that have not a good treasure—such will soon be bankrupts; some pretend to have a good treasure within, but give no proof of it; they hope they have it in them, and thank God, whatever their words and actions are, they have good hearts; but faith without works is dead: and some have a good treasure of wisdom and knowledge, but they are not communicative, they do not bring forth out of it: they have a talent, but know not how to trade with it. The complete christian in this bears the image of God, that he both is good, and does good.

[2.] It is the character of an evil man, that he has an evil treasure in his heart, and out of it brings forth evil things. Lusts and corruptions dwelling and reigning in the heart, are an evil treasure, out of which the sinner brings forth bad words and actions, to the dishonour of God, and the hurt of others. See Gen. 6. 5, 12. Mat. 15. 18—20. Jam. 1. 15. But treasures of wickedness (Prov. 10. 2.) will be treasures of wrath.

3. Christ speaks here concerning idle words, and such words as there is in them; (v. 36, 37.) much more is there in such wicked words as the Pharisees spoke. It concerns us to think much of the day of judgment, that that may be a check upon our tongues; and let us consider,

(1.) How particular the account will be of tongue-sins in that day: even for every idle word, or discourse, that men speak, they shall give account of.

This intimates, [1.] That God takes notice of every word we say, even that which we ourselves do not take notice of. See Ps. 139. 4. ‘Not a word in my tongue but thou knowest it:’ through spoken without regard or design, God takes cognizance of it. [2.] That vain, idle, importent talk is displeasing to God, which tends not to any good purpose, is not good to any use of edifying; it is the product of a van and trifling heart. These idle words are the same with that foolish talking and jesting which is forbidden, Eph. 5. 4. This is that sin which is sordom wanting in the multitude of words, unprofitable talk, Job 13. 3. [3.] We must shortly account for these idle words; they will be produced in evidence against us, to prove us unprofitable servants, that have not improved the faculties of reason and speech, which are part of the talents we are intrusted with. If we repent not of our idle words, and our account far be not balanced by the blood of Christ, we are undone.

(2.) How strict the judgment will be upon that account; (v. 57.) By thy words thou shalt be justified or condemned; a common rule in men’s judgments, and have set tenor of our discourse, according as it is gracious or not gracious, will be an evidence for us, or against us, at the great day. Those who seemed to be religious, but bribled not their tongue, will then be found to have put a cheat upon themselves with a vain religion, Jam. 1. 26. Some think that Christ here refers to that of Elijah, (Job 15. 6.) Then even mouth condemn thee, and not I; or, rather to that of Solomon, (Prov. 18. 21.) Death and life are in the power of the tongue.

32. Then certain of the Scribes and of the Pharisees answered, saying, Master, we would see a sign from thee. 39. But he answered and said unto them, An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas: 40. For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale’s belly; so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. 41. The men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: because they repented at the preaching of Jonas; and, behold, a greater than Jonas is here. 42. The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: for she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and behold, a greater than Solomon is here. 43. When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none. 44. Then he saith, I will return into my house from whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished. 45. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation.

It is probable that these Pharisees with whom Christ is here in discourse, were not the same that cavilled at him, (v. 24.) and would not credit the signs he gave; but another set of them, who saw that there was no reason to discredit them, but would not content themselves with the signs he gave, nor admit the evidence of them unless he would give them such further proof as they should demand. Here

I. Their address to him, v. 58. They compliment him with the title of Master, pretending respect for him, when they intended to abuse him; all are not indeed Christ’s servants, who call him Master. Their request is, We would see a sign from thee. It was highly reasonable that they should see a sign, that he should by miracles prove approved; and He was at heart, to take down a model of religion that was set up by miracles, and therefore it was requisite he should produce the same credentials; but it was highly unreasonable to demand a sign now, when he had given so many signs already, that did abundantly prove him sent of God. Note, It is natural to proud men to prescribe to God, and then to make that an excuse for not subscribing to his laws, but a man’s offence will not lessen his interest.

II. His answer to this address, this insolent demand.

1. He condemns the demand, as the language of an evil and adulterous generation, v. 59. He fastens the charge, not only on the Scribes and Pharisees, but the whole nation of the Jews; they were all like their leaders, a seed and succession of evil-doers: they were an evil generation indeed, not only for their wickedness, but in their abuse of Christ’s miracles, but set themselves to abuse him, and put contempt on his miracles. They were an adulterous generation, (1.) As an adulterous brood; so miserably degenerated from the faith and obedience of their ancestors, that Abraham and Israel acknowledged them not. See Is. 57. 3. Or, (2.) As an adulterous wife; they departed from that God, for whom they had chosen, in which they had been espoused, as they were not guilty of the chordom of idolatry, as they had been before the captivity, but they were guilty of infidelity, and all iniquity, and that is whoredom too: they did not look after gods of their own making, but they looked for signs of their own devising; and that was adultery.

2. He refuses to give them any other sign than he has already given them, but that of the prophet Jonas. Note, Though Christ is always ready to hear and answer holy desires and prayers, yet he will not gratify corrupt lusts and lusts. Those who ask amiss, ask, and have not. Signs were granted to those who desired them for the confirmation of their faith, as to Abraham and Gideon; but were denied to those who demanded them for the excuse of their unbelief. Justly might Christ have said, They shall never see another miracle: but see his wonderful goodness; (1.) They shall have the greatest signs, as well as all the rest, completed and fulfilled among them. “If they will not believe the former signs, they will believe this, (Exod. 4. 9.) and if this will not convince them, nothing will.” And yet the unbelief of the Jews found out an evasion to shift off that too, by saying, His disciples came and stole him away; for there are so incurably blind as those who are resured, they will not see.

3. How this sign of the prophet Jonas he further explains here: (v. 40.) As Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale’s belly, and then came out again safe and well, thus Christ shall be so long in the grave, and then shall rise again. (1.) The grave was to Christ as the belly of the fish was to Jonas; thither he was thrown, as a ransom for lives ready to be lost in a storm; there he lay, as in the belly of hell, (Jonah 2. 2.) and seemed to be cast out of God’s
st. She but the. but when he lay in the grave, it is expressly said to rest in hope, as one assured he should see corruption, Acts 2. 26, 27. [4.] As Jonah on the third day was discharged from his prison, and came to the land of the living again, from the congregation of the dead, (for dead things are said to be formed from under the water, Job 26. 5.) so Christ on the third day should return to life, and rise out of his grave, to send abroad his gospel to the Gentiles.

3. Christ takes this occasion to represent the sad condition and condition of that generation in which he lived, a generation which was not reformed, and therefore could not but be miserable; and he gives them their character, as it would stand in the day of judgment, under the full discoveries and final sentences of that day. Persons and things now appear under false colours; characters and conditions are here changeable: if therefore we would make a right estimate, we must take our measures from the last judgment; things are really, what they are eternally.

Now Christ represents the people of the Jews, (1.) As a generation that would be condemned by the men of Nineveh, whose repenting at the preaching of Jonas would rise up in judgment against them, v. 41. Christ’s resurrection will be the sign of the prophet Jonas to them: but it will not have so happy an effect upon them, as that of Jonas had upon the Ninevites, for they were by it brought to such a repentance as prevented their ruin: but the Jews will be hardened in an unbelief that shall hasten their ruin; and in the day of judgment, the repentance of the Ninevites will be mentioned as an aggravation of the sin, and consequently the condemnation, of those to whom Christ preached then, and of those to whom Christ is preached now; for this reason, because Christ is greater than Jonas. [1.] Jonah was a sinner, subject to the same passions, as we are; but Christ is the Son of God. [2.] Jonah was a stranger in Nineveh, he came among the strangers that were prejudiced against his country; but Christ came to his own, when he preached to the Jews, and much more when he is preached among professing Christians, that are called by his name. [3.] Jonah preached but once, and that without any extraordinary methods, but as he passed along the streets; Christ revives his calls, sat and taught, taught in the synagogues. [4.] Jonah preached nothing but wrath and ruin within forty days, gave no instructions, directions, or encouragements, to repent; but Christ, beside the warning given us of our danger, has showed wherein we must repent, and assured us of acceptance of repentance, that repentance of heaven is at hand. [5.] Jonah wrought no miracle to confirm his doctrine, showed no good will to the Ninevites; but Christ wrought abundance of miracles, and all miracles of mercy: yet the Ninevites repented at the preaching of Jonas, but the Jews were not wrought upon by Christ’s preaching. Note, the goodness of some, who have less helps and advantages for their souls, will aggravate the badness of those who have much greater. These who by the twilight discover the things that belong to their peace, will shame those who grope at noon-day.

(2.) As a generation that would be condemned by the queen of the south, the queen of Sheba, v. 42. The Ninevites would shame them for not repenting, the queen of Sheba, for not believing in Christ. She came from a far country to hear the wisdom of Solomon; yet people will not be persuaded to come and hear the wisdom of Christ, though he is in every thing greater than Solomon. She had no invitation to come to Solomon, nor any promise of being welcome; but we are invited to Christ, to sit at his feet, and hear his word. [2.] Solomon was but a wise man, but Christ is Wisdom itself, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom. [3.] The queen of Sheba had many difficulties to break through; she was a woman unfit for travel, the journey long and perilous; she had no guide, and what would become of her own country in her absence? We have no such cares to hinder us. [4.] She could not be sure that it would be worth her while to go so far on this errand; fame uses to flatter men, and perhaps she might have in her own country or court wise men sufficient to instruct her: yet, having heard of Solomon’s fame, she would see him. Neither was she in any danger of being at home. [5.] She came from the uttermost parts of the earth, but we have Christ among us, and his word nigh us: Behold, he stands at the door, and knocketh. [6.] It should seem, the wisdom the queen of Sheba came for, was only philosophy and politics; but the wisdom that is to be had with Christ, is wisdom to salvation. [7.] She could only hear Solomon’s wisdom; she could not give her wisdom: but Christ will give wisdom unto those who come to him: nay, he will himself be made of God to them Wisdom: so that upon all these accounts, if we do not hear the wisdom of Christ, the forwardness of the queen of Sheba to come and hear the wisdom of Solomon will rise up in judgment against us and condemn us; for Jesus Christ is greater than Solomon.

(3.) As a generation that were resolved to continue in the possession, and to the power, of Satan, notwithstanding all the methods that were used to dispossess him and rescue them. They are compared to one out of whom the Devil is gone, but returns with double force, v. 43—45. The Devil is here called the uncircumcised spirit, for he has cast all his purity, and delights in and promotes all manner of impurity among men. Now,

[1.] The devil represents his possessing men’s houses. Christ having lately cast out a devil, and they having said, he had a devil, gave occasion to show how much they were under the power of Satan. This is a further proof that Christ did not cast out devils by compact with the Devil, for then he would soon have returned again; but Christ’s ejectment of him was final, and such as barred a re-entry: we find him charging the evil spirit to go out; and he must needs have gone, and did, and would not sometimes thus to sport with those who had possession of; he would go out, and then return again with more fury; hence the lucid intervals of those in that condition were commonly followed with the more violent fits. When the Devil is gone out, he is uneasy, for he sleeps not except he have done mischief; (Prov. 4. 16.) he walks in dark places, like one that is blind; but when he has driven a man out, he stays not till he returns again. When Christ cast the legion out of the man, they begged leave to enter into the swine, where they went not long in dry places, but into the lake presently.

[2.] The application of the parable makes it to represent the case of the body of the Jewish church and nation: So shall it be with this wicked generation, that now resist, and will finally reject, the gospel of Christ. The Devil, who by the labour of Christ and his disciples, had been cast out of many of the Jews, sought for rest among the heathen, from whose temples the christians would every where expel him: so Dr. Whitby: or finding no where else in the heathen world such pleasant, desirable habitations, to his satisfaction, as here in the heart of the Jews; so Dr. Hammond, he shall therefore enter again into them, for Christ had not found admission among them, and they, by their prodigious wickedness and obstinate infidelity, were still more ready than ever to receive him. And thus shall they have a durable possession here, and the state of this people is likely to be more desperately damnable (so Dr. Hammond) than it was before Christ came among them, or would have been if Satan had never been cast out.

The body of that nation is here represented, First, As an apostate people. After the captivity in Babylon, they began to reform, left their idols, and appeared with some face of religion; but they soon corrupted themselves again: though they never relapsed into idolatry, they fell into all manner of impiety and profaneness, grew worse and worse, and added to all the rest of their wickedness a wilful contempt of, and opposition to, Christ and his gospel. Secondly, As a people marked for ruin. A new commission was passing the seals against that hypocritical nation, the people of God's wrath (like that, Isa. 6.) and Satan's wrath, had been for so many years likely to be greater than any other, as their sins had been more flagrant: then it was that wrath came upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. 2. 15, 16. Let this be a warning to all nations and churches, to take heed of hering their first love, of letting fall a good work of reformation begun among them, and returning to that wickedness which they seemed to have forsaken; for the last state of such will be worse than the first.

46. While he yet talked to the people, behold, his mother and his brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him. 47. Then one said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee. 48. But he answered and said unto him that told him, Who is my mother? and who are my brethren? 49. And he stretched forth his hand toward his disciples, and said, Behold, my mother and my brethren! 50. For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.

Many excellent, useful sayings came from the mouth of our Lord Jesus upon particular occasions; even his digressions were instructive, as well as his set discourses: as here, Others, 1. How Christ was interrupted in his preaching by his mother and his brethren, that stood without, desiring to speak with him; (v. 46, 47.) which desire of theirs was conveyed to him through the crowd. It is needless to inquire which of his brethren they were that came along with his mother: perhaps they were those who did not believe in him; (John 7. 5.) or what their business was; perhaps it was only designed to oblige him to break off, for fear he should fatigue himself, or to caution him to take heed of giving occasion by his discourse to the Pharisees, and of involving himself in a difficulty, as if they could teach him wisdom. 1. He was as yet talking to the people. Note, Christ's preaching was talking: it was plain, easy, and familiar, and suited to their capacity and ease. What Christ had delivered had been cavilled at, and yet he went on. Note, The opposition we meet with in our work, must not drive us from it. He left off talking with the Pharisees, for he saw he could do no good with them; but continued to talk to the common people, who, not having such a conceit of their knowledge as the Pharisees had, were willing to learn. 2. His mother and brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him, when they should have been standing within, desiring to hear him. They had the advantage of his daily converse in private, and therefore were less mindful to attend upon his public preaching. Note, Frequently those who are nearest to the means of knowledge and grace are most negligent. Familiarity and easiness of access breed some degree of contempt. We are apt to neglect that this day, which we think we may have any day, forgetting that it is only the present time we can be sure of; to-morrow is none of ours. There is too much truth in that common proverb, "The nearer the church, the further from God;" it is pity it should be so.

3. They not only would not hear him themselves, but they interrupted others that heard him gladly. The Devil was a sworn enemy to our Saviour's interest, that hated and sought to harm him by the unreasonable cavils of the Scribes and Pharisees, and when he could not gain his point that way, he endeavoured to break it off, by the unseemly visits of relations. Note, We often meet with hindrances and obstructions in our work, by our friends that are about us, and are taken off by civil respects from our spiritual concerns. These, who really wish well to us and to our work, may sometimes, by their indiscretion, prevent our hearing the voices of our friends, and impede us in our duty; as Peter was offensive to Christ, with his Master, spare thyself, when he thought himself very officious. The mother of our Lord desired to speak with him; it seems she had not then learned to command her Son, as the iniquity and idolatry of the church of Rome has since pretended to teach her; nor was she so free from fault and folly as they would make her. It was Christ's prerogative, and not his mother's, to do as he pleased wisely and well, in its season. Christ once said to his mother, How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not, that I must be about my Father's business? And it was then said, she laid up that saying in her heart; (Luke 2. 49.) but if she had remembered it now, she would not have given him this interruption when he was about his Father's business. Note, There is many a good truth, that we thought was well laid up, when we heard it, which yet is out of the way, when we have occasion to use it. 4. How he resisted this interruption, v. 48—50. 1. He would not hearken to it; he was so intent upon his work, that no natural or civil respects should take him off from it. Who is my mother and who are my brethren? Not that natural affection is to be put off, or that, under pretence of religion, we may be disrespectful to parents or unkind to other relations; but every thing is beautiful in its season, and the lesser duty must stand by, while the greater is done. When our regard to our relations comes in competition with the service of God, and the improving of an opportunity to do good, in such a case, we must say to our Father, I have not seen him, as Levi did, Dent. 33. 9. The nearest relations must be comparatively hated, that is, we must love them less than Christ, (Luke 14. 26.) and our duty to God must have the preference. This Christ has here given us an example of; the zeal of God's house did so far eat him up, that it made him not only forget himself, but forget his dearest relations.
And we must not take it ill of our friends, nor put it upon the score of their wickedness, if they prefer the pleasing of God before the pleasing of us; but we must readily forgive those neglects, which may be easily imputed to a pious zeal for God’s glory and others’ good. Nay, We must deny ourselves and our own satisfaction, rather than do that which may any way divert our friends from, or distract them in, their duty to God.

To this occasion to prefer his disciples, who were his spiritual kindred, before his natural relations as such; which was a good reason why he would not leave preaching to speak with his brethren. He would rather be profiting his disciples, than pleasing his relations. Observe,

(1.) The description of Christ’s disciples. They are such as do the will of his Father; not only hear it, and believe it, but do it, and act upon it, because the will of God is the best preparative for discipleship, (John 7. 17.) and the best proof of it; (ch. 7. 21.) that denominates us his disciples indeed. Christ does not say, “Whosoever shall do my will,” for he came not to seek or do his own will distinct from his Father’s; his will and his Father’s are the same; but he refers us to his Father’s will, because now in his present state and work he referred himself to it, John 17. 33.

(2.) The dignity of Christ’s disciples: The same is my brother, and sister, and mother. His disciples, that had left all to follow him, and embraced his doctrine, were dearer to him than any that were akin to him according to the flesh. They had preferred Christ before relations; they left their Father, (ch. 4. 22.—10. 37.) and now to make them amends, and to show that there was no love lost, he preferred them to his relations. Daughters and others hereby receive, in point of honour, an hundred fold? ch. 19. 29. It was very endearing and very encouraging for Christ to say, Behold my mother and my brethren; yet it was not their privilege alone, this honour have all the saints. Note, All obedient believers are near akin to Jesus Christ. They wear his name, bear his image, have his nature, are of his family. He loves them more than they do their relations. He bids them welcome to his table, takes care of them, provides for them, sees that they want nothing that is fit for them; when he died, he left them rich legacies, now he is in heaven he keeps up a correspondence with them, and will have them all with him at last, and will in nothing fail to do the kineman’s part, (Ruth 3. 13.) nor will ever be ashamed of his poor relations, but will confess them before men, before the angels, and before his Father.

CHAP. XIII.

In this chapter, we have, 1. The favours which Christ did to his countrymen in preaching the kingdom of heaven to them, v. 1, 2. He preached to them in parables, and here gives the reason why he chose that way of instructing, v. 10. And the evangelist gives another reason, v. 32. 33. There is in this chapter the parables of the kingdom of heaven, which are designed to represent the kingdom of heaven, the method of planting the gospel-kingdom in the world, and of its growth and success. The great truths and laws of that kingdom are in other scriptures laid down plainly and without parables; but some circumstances of its beginning and progress are here laid open in parables. 2. Here is one parable to show what are the great hindrances of people’s coming to the word of the gospel, and in how many it comes short of its end, through their own folly, and that is the parable of the four sorts of ground, delivered, v. 8. 9. and expounded v. 18. 24. Here are two parables which shew that the kingdom of heaven would be a mixture of good and bad in the gospel-church, which would continue till the great separation between them in the judgment-day: the parable of the tares put forth, (v. 24. 30.) and expounded at the request of the disciples: (v. 36. 43.) and that of the net cast into the sea, v. 47. 50. 3. Here are two parables intended to show that the gospel-church should be very small at first, but that in process of time it should become a considerable body; that of the grain of mustard-seed, (v. 31. 32.) and that of the heaven, v. 33. Here are two parables, intended to show that those who expect salvation by the gospel must be willing to venture all, and not all, in the prospect of it, and that they shall be no losers by the bargain; that of the treasure hid in the field, (v. 44.) and that of the pearl of great price, v. 45. 46. 5. Here is one parable intended for direction to the disciple, to make use of the instructions he had given them for the benefit of others; and that is the parable of the good householder, v. 51. 52. II. The contempt which his countrymen put upon him on account of the meanness of his parables, v. 38. 39.
them. 18. Hear ye therefore the parable of the sower. 19. When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart. This is he which received seed by the way-side. 20. But he that received the seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it: 21. Yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for a while; for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by he is offended.

22. He also that received seed among the thorns is he that heareth the word, and the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful. 23. But he that received seed into the good ground is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some an hundred-fold, some sixty, some thirty.

We have here Christ's preaching, and may observe,

1. When Christ preached this sermon; it was the same day that he preached the sermon in the foregoing chapter; so unwearied was he in doing good, and working the works of him that sent him. Note, Christ was for preaching both ends of the day, and has by his example recommended that practice to his church; we must in the morning sow our seed, and in the evening not withhold our hand, Eccl. 11.

6. An afternoon sermon well heard, will be so far from driving out the morning sermon, that it will rather clenche it, and fasten the nail in a sure place. Though Christ had been in the morning opposed and provok'd at by his enemies, and disconcerted, and interrupted by his friends, yet he went on with his work; and in the latter part of the day, we do not find that he met with such discouragements. Those who with courage and zeal break through difficulties in God's service, will perhaps find them not so apt to recur as they fear. Resist them, and they will flee.

2. To whom he preached; there were great multitudes gathered together to him, and they were the auditors; we do not find that any of the Scribes or Pharisees were present. They were willing to hear him when he preached in the synagogue, (ch. 12. 9, 14,) but they thought it below them to hear a sermon by the sea-side, though Christ himself was the Preacher; and truly he had better have their room than their company, for now they were absent, he went on quietly and without contradiction. Note, Sometimes there is most of the power of religion where there is least of the flesh of it: The sea receive the gospel. When Christ went to the sea-side, multitudes were presently gathered together to him. Where the king is, there is the court; where Christ is, there is the church, though it be by the sea-side. Note, Those who would get good by the word, must be willing to follow it in all its removings; when the ark shifts, shift after it. The Pharisees had no need of this sermon; and yet Christ had made great suggestions, to drive the people off from following Christ, but they still flocked after him as much as ever. Note, Christ will be glorified in spite of all opposition; he will be followed.

3. Where he preached this sermon. (1.) His meeting-place was the sea-side. He went out of the house (because there was no room for the auditory) into the open air. It was pity but such a Preacher should have had the most spacious, sumptuous, and convenient place to preach in, that could be devised, like one of the Roman theatres; but he was now in his state of humiliation, and in this, as in other things, he denied himself the honours due to him: as he had not a house of his own to live in, so he had not a chapel of his own to preach in. By this he taught us in the external circumstances of worship not to covet that which is stately, but to make the best of the conveniences which God in his providence allots to us. When Christ was born, he was crowned into the stable, and now to the seaside, upon the strand, where all persons might come to him with freedom. He that was Truth itself sought no corners, (no adyga,) as the pagan mystics did. Wisdom cries without, Prov. 1. 20. John 18. 20.

(2.) His pulpit was a ship; not like Ezra's pulpit, that was made for the purpose, (Neh. 8. 4,) but converted to this use for want of a better. No place amiss for such a Preacher, whose presence dignified and consecrated any place: let not those who preach Christ be ashamed, though they have mean and inconvenient places to preach in. Some observe, that when the people stood upon the seacoast, while the Preacher was upon the water in more hazard. Ministers are most exposed to trouble. Here was a true rostrum, a ship-pulpit. 4. What and how he preached. (1.) He spake many things unto them. Many more it is likely than are here recorded, but all excellent and necessary things, things that belong to our peace, things pertaining to the kingdom of heaven; they were not obscure, but things of everlasting consequence, that Christ spoke of. It concerns us to give a more earnest heed, when Christ has so many things to say to us, that we miss not any of them. (2.) What he spake was in parables: a parable sometimes signifies any wise, weighty saying that is instructive; but here in the gospels it generally signifies a continued similitude or comparison, by which spiritual and heavenly things were described in language comprehensible to the ear. It was a way of teaching used very much, not only by the Jewish Rabbins, but by the Pharisees, and the other wise men of the east; and it was found very profitable, and the more so for its being pleasant. Our Saviour used it much, and in it descended to the capacities of people, and dispensed to them in their own language. God had long used similitudes by his servants the prophets, (Hos. 12. 10,) and to little purpose; now he uses similitudes by his Son; surely they will reverence him who speaks from heaven, and of heavenly things, and yet clothes them with expressions borrowed from things earthly. See John 3. 12. So descending in a cloud. Now, I. We have here the general reason why Christ taught in parables. The disciples were a little surprised at it, for hitherto, in his preaching, he had not much used them; but therefore they ask, Why didest thou to them in parables? Because they were truly desirous that the people might hear with understanding. They do not say, Why speakest thou to us? (they knew how to get the parables explained,) but to them. Note, We ought to be concerned for the edification of others, as well as for our own, by the word preached; and if ourselves be strong, yet to hear the infirmities of the weak. He spake these parables largely, v. 11—17, where he tells them, that therefore he preached by parables, because thereby the things of God were made more plain and easy to them who were willing to be taught, and at the same time more difficult and obscure to those who were willingly ignorant; and thus the gospel would be a savour of life to some, and of death to others. A parable, like the pillar... of cloud and fire, turns a dark side towards Egyptians, which confounds them, but a light side towards Israelites, which comforts them, and so answers a double intention. The same light directs the eyes of some, but dazzles the eyes of others. Now,

1. This reason is laid down, (v. 11.) Because it is given to you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. That is, (1.) The disciples had knowledge, but the people had not. Christ's church is a school of mysteries, and need not in this familiar way to be instructed; but the people are ignorant, are yet but babes, and must be taught as such by plain similitudes, being yet incapable of receiving instruction in any other way: for though they have eyes, they know not how to use them; so some. Or, (2.) The disciples were well inclined to the knowledge of gospel-mysteries, and would search into the parables, and by that would be led into a more intimate acquaintance with those mysteries; but the carnal hearers that rested in bare hearing, and would not be at the pains to look further, nor to ask the meaning of the parables, would be never the wiser, and so would justly suffer for their remissness. A parable is a shell that keeps good fruit for the diligent, but keeps it from the slothful. Now gospel-mysteries are mysteries in the kingdom of heaven, and without understanding the mystery of godliness: Christ's incarnation, satisfaction, intercession, our justification and sanctification by union with Christ, and indeed the whole work of redemption, from first to last, are mysteries, could never have been discovered but by divine revelation. (1 Cor. 15. 51.) were at this time discovered but in part to the disciples, and will never be fully discovered till the veil be rent; but the inscrutableness of gospel-truth should not discourage us from but quicken us in, our inquiries after it and searches into it. (1.) It is graciously given to the disciples of Christ to be acquainted with these mysteries. Knowledge is the first gift of God, and it is a distinguishing gift; (Prov. 2. 6.) It was given to the apostles, because they were Christ's constant followers and attendants. Note. The nearer we draw to Christ, and the more familiar we become with these, the better acquainted we shall be with gospel-mysteries. (2.) It is given to all true believers, who have an experimental knowledge of the gospel-mysteries, and that is without doubt the best knowledge: a principle of grace in the heart is that which makes men of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, and in the faith of Christ, and so in the meaning of parables; and for want of that, Nicodemus, a master in Israel, talked of the new birth as a blind man's colours. (3.) There are those to whom this knowledge is not given, and a man can receive nothing unless it be given him from above; (John 3. 37.) and be it remembered, that God is debtor to no man; his grace is his own; he gives or withholds it at pleasure. (Rom. 11. 33.) the difference must be resolved in God's grace alone, 1 Pet. 1. 21, 22. 2. This reason is further illustrated by the rule God observes in dispensing his gifts; he bestows them on those who improve them, but takes them away from those who bury them. It is a rule among men, that they will rather intrust their money with those who have increased their estates by their industry, than with those who have diminished them by their slothfulness.

1. Here is a promise to him that has, that has true grace, pursuant to the election of grace, that has, and uses what he has; he shall have more abundance: God's favours are earnest of further favours: where he lays the foundation, he will build upon it. Christ's disciples used the knowledge they now had, and they had more abundance at the pouring out of the Spirit, Acts 2. They who have the truth of grace, shall have the increase of grace, even to an abundance in glory, Prov. 4. 18. Joseph—He will add, Gen. 30. 24.

2. Here is a threatening to him that has not, that has no desire of grace, that makes no right use of the gifts and graces he has; has no root, no solid principle; that has, but uses not what he has; from him shall be taken away that which he has, or seems to have. His leaves shall wither, his gifts decay; the means of grace he has, and makes no use of; shall be taken away out of his hands, and taken out of his hands, that are likely to become bankrupts quickly.

3. This reason is particularly explained, with reference to the two sorts of people Christ had to do with.

(1.) Some were willingly ignorant; and such were amused by the parables, (v. 13.) because they seeing, see not. They had shut their eyes against the clear light of Christ's plainer preaching, and therefore were now left in the dark. Seeing Christ's person, they see not his glory, see no difference between him and another man; seeing his miracles, and hearing his preaching, they see not, they hear not with any concern or application, they understand neither. Note, (1.) There are many that see the gospel-light, that have the gospel-gifts, that have the gospel-earnest, but never reach their hearts, nor bring it any place in them. (2.) It is just with God to take away the light from those who shut their eyes against it; that such as will be ignorant, may be so; and God's dealing thus with them magnifies his distinguishing grace to his disciples.

Now in this the scripture would be fulfilled, v. 14, 15. It is quoted from Isa. 6. 9, 10. The evangelical prophet that spoke most plainly of gospel-grace, foretold the contents of it, and the consequences of that contempt. It is referred to no less than six times in the New Testament, which intimates, that in gospel-times spiritual judgments would be most common, which make least noise, but are most dreadful. That which was spoken of the sinners in Isaiah's time, was fulfilled in those in Christ's time, and it is still fulfilling every day; while for the wicked heart of man keeps up the same sin, the righteous hand of God inflicts the same punishment. Here is,

First. A description of sinners' wilful blindness and hardness, which is their sin. This people's heart is waxed gross; it is fatted, so the word is; which denotes both sensuality and senselessness; (Ps. 119. 70.) secure under the word and rod of God, and scornful as Jeshurun, that waxed fat and kicked, Deut. 32. 15. And when the heart is this heavy, no wonder that the ears are dull of hearing; the whispers of the Spirit they hear not at all; the loud calls of the word, though the word be nigh them, they regard not. nor are at all affected with it; They stop their ears, Ps. 58. 4, 5. And because they are resolved to be ignorant, they shut both the learning senses; for their eyes also they have closed, resolved that they would not see light come into the world, while they shut, shut, shut, the right eye of their vision, their windows, because they loved darkness rather than light, John 3. 19. 2 Pet. 3. 5.

Secondly. A description of that judicial blindness, which is the just punishment of this. "By hearing, ye shall hear, and shall not understand; what means of grace you have, shall be to no purpose to you; though, in mercy to others, they are continued, yet, in judgment on you, the blessing upon them is deni-whom he has given thee hearing, and the seeing eye, in vain. Thus does God choose sinners’ delusions, (Isa. 66. 4.) and binds them over to the greatest ruin, by giving them up to their own heart’s hate; (Ps. 81. 11, 12.) Let them alone; (Hos. 4. 17.) My Spirit shall not always strive, Gen. 6. 3.

Thirdly, The woful effect and consequence of this; Let at any time they should see, They will not see, because they will not turn; and God says that they shall not see, because they shall not turn; Let they should be converted, and I should heal them.

Note, 1. That seeing, hearing, and understanding, are necessary to conversion; for God, in working grace, deals with men as men, as rational agents; he draws with the cords of a man, changes the heart by opening the eyes, and turns from the power of Satan with the eyes of them, that see, darkness to light, Acts 26. 18. 2. All those who are truly converted to God, shall certainly be healed by him. If they be converted I shall heal them, I shall save them; so that if sinners perish, it is not to be imputed to God, but to themselves; they foolishly expected to be healed, without being converted.

3. It is just with God to deny his grace to those who have long and diligently considered the proposals of it, and resisted the power of it. Pity not the reproacher, hardened his own heart, (Exod. 8. 15, 32) and afterwards God hardened it, ch. 9. 12. 10. 20. Let us therefore fear, lest by sinning against the divine grace, we sin it away.

(3.) Others were effectually called to be the disciples of Christ, and were truly desirous to be taught of him; and they were instructed, and made to improve greatly in knowledge, by these parables, especially when they were converted; and by them, the things of God were made more plain and easy, more intelligible and familiar, and more apt to be remembered, (v. 16, 17.) Your eyes see, your ears hear. They saw the glory of God in Christ’s person; they heard the mind of God in Christ’s doctrine; they saw much, and were desirous to see more, and thereby were prepared to receive further instruction; they had opportunity for it, by being constant attendants on Christ, and they should have it from day to day, and grace with it. Now this Christ speaks of,

[1.] As a blessing: "Blessed are your eyes for they see, and your ears for they hear; it is your happiness, and it is a happiness for which you are indebted to the peculiar favour and blessing of God." It is a promised blessing; that in the days of the Messiah they shall not be dim, Isa. 32. 3. The eyes of the meanest believer, who, experimentally the grace of Christ, are more blessed than those of the greatest scholars, the greatest masters in experimental philosophy, that are strangers to God; who, like the other gods they serve, have eyes, and see not. Blessed are your eyes. Note, True blessedness is entailed upon the right understanding and due improvement of the mysteries of the kingdom of God. The hearing ear and the seeing eye are God’s work in those who are sanctified; they are the work of his grace, (Prov. 20. 12.) and they are a blessed work, which shall be fulfilled with power, when those who now see through a glass darkly, shall see face to face. It was to illustrate this blessedness that Christ said so much of the misery of those who are left in ignorance; they have eyes and see not; but blessed are your eyes. Note, The knowledge of Christ, is a distinguishing favour to those who have it, and upon them it is bestowed, under the greater obligations; see John 14. 22. The apostles were to teach others, and therefore were themselves blessed with the clearest discoveries of divine truth: The watchmen shall see eye to eye, Isa. 52. 8.

[2.] As a transcendent blessing, desired by, but not granted to, many prophets and righteous men, v. 17. The Old-Testament saints, who had some glimpses, some glimmerings, of gospel-light, coveted earnestly further discoveries. They had the types, shadows, and prophecies, of those things, but longed to see the Substance, that glorious end of those things which they could not steadfastly look unto; that glorious inside of those things which they could not look upon.

The Consolation of Israel, but did not see it, because the fullness of time was not yet come. Note, First, Those who know something of Christ, cannot but covet to know more. Secondly, The discoveries of divine grace are made, even to prophets and righteous men, but according to the dispensation they are under. Though they were the favourites of Heaven, with whom God’s secret was, yet they have not seen the things which they desired, and could not see, because they were determined not to bring them to light yet; and his favours shall not anticipate his counsels. There was then, as there is still, a glory to be revealed; something in reserve, that they without us should not be made perfect, Heb. 11. 40. Thirdly, For the exciting of our thankfulness, and the quickening of our diligence, it is good for us to consider what means we enjoy, and what discoveries are daily made in the gospel, above what they had, and enjoyed, who lived under the Old-Testament dispensation, especially in the revelations of the atonement for sin; see what are the advantages of the New Testament above the Old; (2 Cor. 3. 7, &c. Heb. 12. 18.) and see that our improvements be proportionable to our advantages.

1. We have, in these verses, one of the parables which our Saviour put forth; it is that of the sower and the seeds; both the parable itself, and the explication of it. Christ’s parables are borrowed from common, ordinary things, not from any philosophical notions or speculations, or the unusual phenomena of nature, though applicable enough to the matter in hand, but from the most obvious things that are of every day’s observation, and come within the reach of the meanest capacity; many of them are fetched from the husbandman’s calling, as this of the sower, and the seed; that is, the ministration of the gospel.

That spiritual things might hereby be made more plain, and, by familiar similitudes, might be made the more easy to slide into our understandings. That common actions might hereby be spiritualized, and we might take occasion from those things which fall so often under our view, to meditate with delight on the things of God; and thus when our hands are busiest about the world, we may not only notwithstanding that, but desire with the help of God, to have our hearts in heaven. Thus the word of God shall talk with us, talk familiarly with us, Prov. 6. 22.

The parable of the sower is plain enough, v. 3—9. The exposition of it from Christ himself, who knew best what was his own meaning. The disciples, when they asked, Why speakest thou to them in parables? (v. 10.) intimated a desire to have the parable explained for the sake of their understandings, nor was it any disparagement to their own knowledge to desire it for themselves. Our Lord Jesus kindly took the hint, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the parable, directing his discourse to the disciples, but in the hearing of the multitude; for we have not the account of his dismissing them till v. 35. "Hear ye therefore the parable of the sower;" (v. 18.) you have heard it, but let us go into it and understand it. It is easy to think we contribute much to our understanding of the word and profiting by it, to hear over again what we have heard; (Phil. 3. 1.) "You have heard it, but hear the interpretation of it." Note, Then only we hear the word aright, and to good purpose, when we un-understand what we hear; it is no hearing at all, if it be not with understanding, Neh. 2, 2. It is God's grace indeed that gives the understanding, but it is our duty to give our minds to understand.

Let us therefore compare the parable and the exposition.

(1.) The seed sown is the word of God, here call ed the word of the kingdom, (v. 19.) the kingdom of heaven, that is the kingdom; the kingdoms of the world, compared with that, are not to be called kingdoms. The gospel comes from that kingdom, and duty tests it; the word of the gospel is the word of the kingdom; it is the word of the King, and where that is, there is power; it is a law, by which we must be ruled and governed. This word is the seed sown, which seems a dead, dry thing, but all the product is virtually in it. It is incorruptible seed; (1 Pet. 1, 23.) it is the gospel that brings forth fruit in souls, Col. 1, 5, 6.

(2.) The sower that scatters the seed is our Lord Jesus Christ, either by himself, or by his ministers; see v. 37. The people are God's household, his tillage, so the word is; and ministers are labourers together with God, 1 Cor. 3, 9. Preaching to a multitude is sowing the corn; we know not where it must light; only see that it be good, that it be clean, and be sure to give it seed enough. The sowing of this the sowing of a people for God's field, the corn of his floor, Isa. 21, 10.

(3.) The ground in which this seed is sown is the hearts of the children of men, which are differently qualified and disposed, and accordingly the success of the word is different. Note, Man's heart is like soil, capable of improvement, of bearing good fruit; it is pity it should lie fallow, or be like the field of the slothful, Prov. 24, 30. The soul is the proper place for the word of God to dwell, and work, and rule in; its operation is upon conscience, it is to light that candle of the Lord. Now accordingly as we are, so the word is to us: Recipiesit ad medium recipicientem —The reception depends upon the receiver. As it is with the earth; some sort of ground, take ever so much pains with it, and throw ever so good seed into it, yet it brings forth no fruit to any purpose; while the good soil brings forth peradii so forth, with the hearts of men, whose different characters are here represented by four sorts of ground, of which three are bad, and but one good. Note, The number of fruitless hearers is very great, even of those who heard Christ himself preach. Who has believed our report? It is a melancholy prospect which this parable gives us of the congregations of those who hear the gospel preached, that scarcely one in four brings forth fruit to perfection. Many are called with the common call, but in few is the eternal choice evidenced by the efficacy of that call, ch. 20, 16.

Now observe the characters of these four sorts of ground.

[1.] The highway ground, v. 4—19. They had pathways through their corn-fields, (ch. 12, 1.) and though they were not good, yet the fowls of the air and the birds picked it up. The place where Christ's hearers now stood, represented the characters of most of them, the sand on the sea-shore, which was to the seed like the highway ground.

Observe, First, What kind of hearers are compared to the highway ground; such as hear the word and understand it not; and it is their own fault. They take no heed to it, take no hold of it; they do not come with any design to get good, as the highway was never intended to be sown. They come before God as his people come, and sit before him as his people sit; but it is merely for fashion-sake, to see and be seen; they mind not what is said, it comes in at one ear and goes out at the other, and makes no impression.

Secondly, How they come to be unprofitable hearers. The wicked one, tares, the devil, cometh and catcheth away that which was sown.—Such mindless, careless, trifling hearers, are an easy prey to Satan; who as he is the great murderer of souls, so he is the great thief of sermons, and will be sure to rob us of the word, if we take not care to keep it: as the birds pick up the seed that falls on the ground that is neither ploughed before, nor harrowed after. If we break not up the fallow ground, by preparing our hearts for the word, and humbling them to it, and engaging our own attention; and if we cover not the word with much prayer and fasting; if we give not a more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, we are as the highway ground. Note, The devil is a sworn enemy to our profiting by the word of God; and none do more befriend his design than heedless hearers, who are thinking of something else, when they should be thinking of the things that belong to their peace.

[2.] The stony ground. Some fell upon stony places, (v. 6, 7,) which represents the case of hearers that go further than the former, who receive some good impressions of the word, but they are not lasting, v. 20, 21. Note, It is possible we may be a great deal better than some others, and yet not be so good as we should be; may go beyond our neighbours, and yet come short of heaven. Now observe two consequences of such hearers that are represented by the stony ground.

First, How far they went. 1. They hear the word; they turn neither their backs upon it, nor a deaf ear to it. Note, Hearing the word, though ever so frequently, ever so gravely, if we rest in that, will never bring us to heaven. 2. They are quick in hearing, swift to hear, he anon receiveth it, (v. 24,) he is ready to receive it, forthwith it springeth up, (v. 5.) It is not so with many that hear; they hear as they hear, and let it fall in stony ground. Note, Hypocrites often get the start of true christians in the shows of profession, and are often too hot to hold. He receiveth it straightway, without trying it; swallows it without chewing, and then there can never be a good digestion. Those are most likely to hold fast that which is good, that prove all things, 1 Thess. 5, 23. They receive it with joy, Note, There are many that are very glad to hear a good sermon, that yet do not profit by it; they may be pleased with the word, and yet not changed and ruled by it; the heart may melt under the word, and yet not be melted down by the word, much less into it, as into a mould. Many taste the good word of God, (Heb. 6, 5.) and say they find sweetness in it, but some beloved is rolled under the tongue, which it would not stick with, and so they spit it out again. 4. They endure for a while, like a violent motion which continues as long as the impression of the force remains, but ceases when that has spent itself. Note, Many endure for a while, that do not endure to the end, and so come short of the happiness which is promised to them only that persevere; (ch. 10, 22.) they did make a fair show, but their life was short.

Secondly, How they fell away, so that no fruit was brought to perfection; no more than the corn, that having no depth of earth from which to draw moisture, is scorched and withered by the heat of the sun. And the reason is,

1. They have gone root in themselves, no settled, fixed principles in their judgments; no firm resolution in their wills, nor any rooted habits in their affections, in which that which will be the either the sap of the strength of their profession. Note, (1.) It is possible there may be the green blade of a profession, where yet there is not the root of grace; hardness prevails in the heart, and what there is of soil and softness is only in the surface; inwardly they are no more affected than a stone; they have no root, they are not by faith united to Christ who is
Our Root: they derive not from him, they depend not on him. (2) Where there is not a principle, though there be a profession, we cannot expect perseverance. Those who have no root will endure but a while. And without root, the laden vessel, yet will certainly fall in stress of weather, and never make her port.

2. Times of trial come, and then they come to nothing. When tribulation and persecution arise because of the word, he is offended; it is a stumbling-block in his way which he cannot get over, and so he flies off, and this is all his profession comes to.

Note, (1) After a fair gale of opportunity usually followed by a tempest of trial, to try who have received the word in sincerity, and who have not. When the word of Christ’s kingdom comes to be the word of Christ’s patience, (Rev. 3. 10.) then is the trial, who keeps it, and who does not, Rev. 1. 9. It is wisdom to prepare for such a day. (2) When trying times come, those who have no root are soon offended; they first quarrel with their profession, and then quit it; first find fault with it, and then they are a fruitless work of the grace of God. Gal. 5. 11. Observe, Persecution is represented in the parable by the scorching sun; (v. 6.) the same sun which warms and cherishes that which was well rooted, withers and burns up that which wanted root. As the word of Christ, so the cross of Christ, is to some a favour of life unto life, to others a savour of death unto death; the same tribulation which dries some to apostasy and ruin, works for others far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Trials which shake some, confirm others, Phil. 1. 12. Observe how soon they fall away, by and by; as soon rotten as they were ripe; a profession taken up without consideration is commonly let fall without it: “Light come, light go.”

3. The thorny ground. Some fell among thorns, (which are a good guard to the corn when they are in the hedge, and the thorns are in the field,) and the thorns sprang up; which intimates that they did not appear, or but little, when the corn was sown, but afterwards they proved choking it, v. 7. This went farther than the former, for it had root; and it represents the condition of those who do not quite cast off their profession, and yet come short of any saving benefit by it; the good they gain by the word, being insensibly overcome and overwhelmed by the difficulties which arise, and destroys the word in the heart, as much as persecution does; and more dangerously, because more silently: the thorns spoiled the root, the thorns spoil the fruit.

Now what are these choking thorns? First, The cares of this world. Care for another world would quicken the springing of this seed, but care for this world chokes it. Worldly cares are filly compared to thorns, for they came in with sin, and are a fruit of the work of the age of the cross, to their place to stop a gap, but a man must be well armed that deals much in them; (2 Sam. 23. 6, 7.) they are entangling, vexing, scratching, and their end is to be burned, Heb. 6. 8. These thorns choke the good seed. Note, Worldly cares are great hindrances to our profiting by the word of God, and our proficiency in religion. They eat up that vigour of soul which should be spent in divine things; divert us from the work of duty; bring mischief of all afterwards; quenching the sparks of good affections, and bursting the cords of good resolutions: those who are careful and numbered among many things, commonly neglect the one thing needful.

Secondly, The deceitfulness of riches. Those who, by their care and industry, have raised estates, and so the danger that arises from care seems to be over, and they continue hearers of the word; yet are as in a snare: (Jer. 5. 4, 5;) it is hard for them to enter into the kingdom of heaven; they are apt to promise themselves that in riches which is not in them; to rely upon them, and to take an inordinate complacency in them; and this chokes the word as much as care did. Observe, It is not so much riches, as the deceitfulness of riches, that does the mischief: now they cannot be said to be deceitful to us unless we put our confidence in them, and raise our expectations from them, and then it is that they choke the good seed.

4. The good ground; (v. 18.) Others fell into good ground, and it is pity but that good seed should always meet with good soil, and then there is no loss; such are not good, but: such are unfruitful. Note, Though there are many that receive the grace of God, and the word of his grace, in vain, yet God has a remnant by whom it is received to good purpose; for God’s word shall not return empty, Isa. 55. 10, 11.

Now that which distinguished this good ground from the rest, was, in one word, fruitfulness. By this true Christians are distinguished from hypocrites, that they bring forth the fruits of righteousness, and to perfect things; so shall ye be my disciples, John 15. 8. He does not say that this good ground has no stones in it, or no thorns; but there were none that prevailed to hinder its fruitfulness. Saints, in this world, are not perfectly free from the remains of sin; but happily freed from the reign of it.

The hearers represented by the good ground are,

First, Intelligent hearers; they hear the word and understand it; they understand not only the sense and meaning of the words, but their own concern in them; they understand it as a man of business understands his business. God in his word deals with men as men, in a rational way, and gains possession of the will and affections by opening the understanding; whereas Satan, who is a thief and a robber, comes not in by that door, but climbeth up another way.

Secondly, Fruitful hearers, which is an evidence of their good understanding, which also beareth fruit. Fruit is to every seed its own body, a substantial product in the heart and life, agreeable to the seed of the word received. We then bear fruit, when we practise according to the word; when the temper of our minds and the tenor of our lives are conformable to the gospel we have received, and we do as we are taught.

Thirdly, Spotless, or alike fruitful; some an hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty. Note, Among fruitful Christians, some are more fruitful than others: where there is true grace, yet there are degrees of it; some are of greater attainments in knowledge and holiness than others; all Christ’s scholars are not in the same form. We should aim at the highest degree, to bring forth an hundred-fold, as Isaac’s ground did, (Gen. 29. 13.) abounding in the work of the Lord, John 15. 8. But if the ground be good, and the fruit right, the heart honest, and the life of a piece with it, those who bring forth but thirty-fold shall be graciously accepted of God, and it will be fruit abounding to their account, for we are under grace, and not under the law.

Lastly, He closes the parable with a solemn call to attention, (v. 9.) Who hath ears to hear, let him hear. Note, The sense of hearing cannot be better employed than in hearing the word of God. Some care for hearing sweet melody, their ears are only the daughters of music; (Ecc. 12. 4.) there is no melody like that of the word of God: others are for hearing new things; (Acts 10. 21.) no news like that.

24. Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field: 25. But while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. 26. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. 27. So the servants of the householder came and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? From whence then hath it tares? 28. He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? 29. But he said, Nay: lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. 30. Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn. 31. Another parable he put forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took and sowed in his field: 32. Which indeed is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof. 33. Another parable spake he unto them: The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened. 34. All these things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables; and without a parable spake he not unto them: 35. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables: I will utter things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world. 36. Then Jesus sent the multitude away, and went into the house: and his disciples came unto him, saying, Declare unto us the parable of the tares of the field. 37. He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man: 38. The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one: 39. The enemy that sowed them is the devil: the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. 40. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. 41. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; 42. And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. 43. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun, in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear. In these verses, we have,

I. Another reason given why Christ preached by parables, v. 34, 35. All these things he spake in parables, because the time was not yet come, for the more clear and plain discoveries of the mysteries of the kingdom. Christ, to keep the people attending and expecting, preached in parables, and without parables such he would not have said. He did not look upon the time and in this sermon. Note, Christ tries all ways and methods to do good to the souls of men, and to make impressions upon them; if men will not be instructed and influenced by plain preaching, he will try them with parables; and the reason here given is, That the scripture might be fulfilled. The passage here quoted for it, is part of the preface to that historical Psalms, 78, 2. Now shall I speak in a parable. What the Psalmist David, or Asaph, says there of his narrative, is accommodated to Christ's sermons; and that great precedent would serve to vindicate this way of preaching from the offence which some took at it. Here is, 1. The matter of Christ's preaching; he preached things which had been kept secret from the foundation of the world. The mystery of the gospel had been hid in God in his councils and decrees, from the beginning of the world, Eph. 3. 9. Compare Rom. 16. 25. 1 Cor. 2. 7. Col. 1. 26. If we delight in the records of ancient things, and in the revelation of secret things, how welcome should the gospel be to us, which has in it such antiquity and such mystery! It was from the foundation of the world, that such things were prepared; and it is now done away, and those secret things are now become such things revealed as belong to us and to our children, Deut. 29. 29. 2. The manner of Christ's preaching; he preached by parables; wise sayings, but figurative, and which help to engage attention and a diligent search. Solomon's sententious dictates, which are full of similitudes, are called Proverbs, or parables; it is the same word, what in this, as in other things, Behold, a greater than Solomon is here, in whom are hid treasures of wisdom.

II. The parable of the tares, and the exposition of it; they must be taken together, for the exposition explains the parable, and the parable illustrates the exposition.

Observe, 1. The disciples' request to their Master to have this parable explained to them; (v. 36.) The multitude which had gathered about him, and it being a great multitude, that so many of them went away no wiser than they came; they had heard a sound of words, and that was all. It is sad to think how many go away from sermons with the word of grace in their ears, but not the work of grace in their hearts. Christ went into the house, not so much for his own repose, as for particular converse with his disciples, whose instruction he chiefly intended in all his preaching. He was ready to do good in all places, the disciples laid hold on the opportunity, and they came to him. Note, Those who would be wise for every thing else, must be wise to discern and improve their opportunities, especially of converse with Christ, of converse with him alone, in secret meditation and prayer. It is very good, when we return from the solemn assembly, to sit by ourselves, and to inquire what we have heard there, and whether familiar discourse to help one another to understand and remember it, and to be affected with it; for we lose the benefit of many a sermon by vain and unprofitable discourse after it. See Luke 24. 32. Deut. 6, 6, 7. It is especially good, if it may be, to ask of the ministers of the word the meaning of the word, for their lips should keep knowledge, Mal. 2. 7. Private communion would contribute much to their benefit by public preaching. Nathan's Thou art the man, was that which touched David to the heart.

The disciples' request to their Master was, Declare unto us the parable of the tares. This implies an acknowledgment of their ignorance, which they were not ashamed to make. It is probably they apprehended the general scope of the parable, but they desired to understand it more particularly, and to be assured that they took it right. Note, They are rightly divine for Christ's teaching, but are sensible of their ignorance, and sincerely desirous to be taught. He will reach the humble, (Ps. 25. 8, 9,) but will for this be inquired of. If any man lack instruction, let him ask it of God. Christ had expounded the foregoing parable unasked, but for the exposition of this they ask him. Note, The mercies we have received must be improved, both for direct profit and for our encouragement in prayer. The first light and the first grace are given in a preventing way, further degrees of both which must be daily prayed for.

2. The exposition Christ gave of the parable, in answer to their request; so ready is Christ to answer such desires of his disciples. Now the drift of the parable is, to represent to us the present and future state of the kingdom of heaven, the gospel-church; Christ's care of it, the devil's cunniy against it, the mixture that there is in it of good and bad in this world, and the separation between them in the other world. Note, The visible church is the kingdom of heaven; though there be many hypocrites in it, Christ rules in it as a King; and there is a remnant in it, that are the subjects and heirs of heaven, from whom, as the better part, it is denominated: The church is the kingdom of heaven upon earth.

Let us go over the particulars of the exposition of the parable.

1. That he sows the good seed is the Son of man. Jesus Christ is the Lord of the field, the Lord of the harvest, the Sower of good seed. When he ascended on high, he gave gifts to the world; not only good ministers, but other good men. Note, Whatever good seed there is in the world, it all comes from the hand of Christ, and is of his sowing: truths properly and really sown, are good seed, and all owing to Christ. Ministers are instruments in Christ's hand to sow good seed; are employed by him and under him, and the success of their labours depend purely upon his blessing; so that it may well be said, It is Christ, and no other, that sows the good seed; he is the Son of man, one of us, that his terror might not make us afraid; the Son of man Mediator, and that authority.

2. The field is the world, the world over, a large field, capable of bringing forth good fruit; the more is it to be lamented that it brings forth so much bad fruit: the world here is the visible church, scattered all the world over, not confined to one nation. Observe, In the parable it is called his field; the world is Christ's field, for all things are delivered unto him of the Father; whatever power and interest the devil has in the world, it is usurped and unjust; when Christ comes to take possession, he comes where his right is; it is his field, and because it is his he took care to sow it with good seed.

3. The good seed are the children of the kingdom, true saints. They are, [1.] The children of the kingdom; not in profession only, as the Jews were, (ch. 8. 12.) but in sincerity: Jews inwardly, Israelites indeed, incorporated in faith and obedience to Jesus Christ, the King of the church. 2. They are the good seed in distinction and separation, Ps. 128. 6. The seed is the substance of the field; so the holy seed, Isa. 6. 13. The seed is scattered, so are the saints; dispersed here and there another, though in some places thicker sown than in others. The seed is that from which fruit is expected; what fruit of honour and service God has from this world he has from the saints, whom he has sowed unto himself in the earth, Hos. 2. 23.

4. The tares are the children of the wicked one. Here is the character of sinners, hypocrites, and all profane and wicked people. [1.] They are the children of the devil, as a wicked one. Though they do not own his name, yet they bear his image, do his lusts, and after him they have their education; he rules over them, he works in them, Eph. 2. 2. John 8. 44. [2.] They are tares in the field of this world; they do no good, they do hurt; unprofitable in themselves, and hurtful to the good seed, both by temptation and persecution: they are seeds in the garden, have the same rain, and sunshine, and soil, with the good plants, but are good for nothing; the tares are among the wheat. Note, God has so ordered it, that good and bad should be mixed together in this world, that the good may be exercised, the bad left inexcusable, and a difference made between earth and heaven.

Vol. v. —

5. The enemy that sowed the tares is the devil; a sworn enemy to Christ and all that is good, to the glory of the good God, and the comfort and happiness of all good men. He is an enemy to the child of the world, which he endeavours to make his own, by sowing his tares in it. Ever since he became a wicked spirit himself, he has been industrious to promote wickedness, and has made it his business, and therein to counterwork Christ.

Now concerning the sowing of the tares, observe in the parable,

1. That they were sown while men slept. Magistrates sleep, who by their power, ministers sleep, who by their preaching, should have prevented this mischief. Note, Satan watches all opportunities, and lays hold on all advantages, to propagate vice and profaneness. The prejudice he does to particular persons is when reason and conscience sleep, when they are off their guard; we have therefore need to be sober, and vigilant. It was in the night for that is the sleeping time. Note, Satan rules in the darkness of this world; that is, an opportunity,

2. The enemy, when he had sown the tares, went his way, (v. 25.) that it might not be known who did it. He is a crafty, unscrupulous emissary, he studies most to conceal himself; for his design is in danger of being spoiled if he be seen in it; and therefore when he comes to sow tares, he transforms himself into an angel of light, 2 Cor. 11. 13, 14. He went his way, as if he had done no harm; such is the way of the adulterous woman, Prov. 30. 20. Observe, Such is the pru!eness of fallen man to sin, that if the enemy sow the tares, he may even go his way, they will spring up of themselves, and do hurt; whereas, when good seed is sown, it must be tended, watered, and fenced, or it will come to nothing.

3. The tares appeared not till the blades sprung up, and brought forth fruit, v. 26. There is a great deal of secret wickedness in the hearts of men, which is long hid under the cloak of a plausible profession, but breaks out at last, as it appears in the sudden and wide spread of the tares, lie a great while under the ceds, and at first seeming so, it is hard to distinguish them; but when a trying time comes, when fruit is to be brought forth, when good is to be done that has difficulty and hazard attending it, then you will return and discern between the sincere and the hypocrite; then you may say, This is wheat, and that is tares.

3. The servants, when they were aware of it, complained to their master; [v. 26.] Sir, didst thou not sow good seed in the field? No doubt he did; whatever is amiss in the church, we are sure it is not of Christ: considering the seed which Christ sows, we may well ask, with wonder, Where should the tares come? Note, The rise of errors, the breaking out of scandals, and the growth of profanedness, are matters of great grief to all the servants of Christ; especially to his faithful ministers, who are directed to complain of it to him whose the field is. It is hard to see such tares growing so in the garden of the Lord; to see the good soil wasted, the good seed choked, and such a reflection cast on the name and honour of Christ, as if his field were no better than the field of the slothful, all grown over with thorns.

[3.] The master was soon aware whence it was; (v. 28.) An enemy had done this. He does not lay the blame upon the servants; they could not help it, but a good reason why God might sooner have chastised them. Note, The ministers of Christ, that are faithful and diligent, shall not be judged of Christ, and therefore should not be reproached by men, for the mixture of bad with good, hypocrites with the sincere, in the field of the church. It must needs be that such offences will come; and they shall not be laid to our charge, if we do our duty, though it have not the desired success. Though they shall sometimes be, if they do not love sleep; though tares be sown, if they do not sow them nor water them, nor allow of them, the blame shall not lie at their door.

[6.] The servants were very forward to have these tares rooted up. "Wilt thou that we go and do it presently?" Note, The over hasty and unconsiderate zeal of Christ's servants, before they have consulted with their Master, is sometimes ready, with some haste, to pluck up the tares, before any time is taken to view whether it be the best way to do it, or whether it be possible that they presume to be tares: Lord, wilt thou that we call for fire from heaven?

[7.] The Master very wisely prevented this; (v. 29.) Nay, lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Note, It is not possible for any man infallibly to distinguish between tares and wheat, but he may be mistaken; and therefore is it the wisdom and grace of Christ, that he will rather permit the tares, than any thing else, to grow with the wheat. It is certain, scandals offenders are to be censured, and we are to withdraw from them; those who are openly the children of the wicked ones, are not to be admitted to special ordinances; yet it is possible there may be a discipline, either so mistaken in its rules, or so over-nice in the application of them, as may prove vexatious to many that are truly distressed. But mark, it is most necessary, in the midst of families in such cases, moderation must be used in inflicting and continuing church-censures, lest the wheat be trodden down, if not plucked up. The wisdom from above, as it is pure, so it is peaceable, and those who oppose themselves must not be cut off, but instructed, and with meekness, 2 Tim. 2. 25. The tares, if continued under the means of grace, may become good corn; they therefore have patience with them.

[6.] The overseers of the world, v. 59. This world will have an end; though it continue long, it will not continue always; time will shortly be swallowed up in eternity. At the end of the world, there will be a great harvest-day, a day of judgment; at harvest all is ripe and ready to be cut down, both good and bad are ripe at the great day, Rev. 6. 11. It is the harvest of the earth, Rev. 14. 15. At harvest every man reapeth as he sowed; every man's ground, and seed, and skill, and industry, will be manifested: see Gal. 6. 7, 8. Then they who sowed precious seed, will come again with rejoicing, (Ps. 126. 5, 6.) with the joy of harvest; (Isa. 9. 3.) when the sluggard, who would not plough by reason of cold, shall beg, and have nothing; (Prov. 20. 4.) shall cry, Lord, Lord, but in vain; when the harvest of those who sowed to the flesh, shall be a day of grief, and desolate sorrow, Isa. 17. 11.

(7.) The reapers are the angels; they shall be employed, in the great day, in executing Christ's righteous sentences, both of approbation and condemnation, as name and general justice, ch. 25. 31. The angels are skilful, strong, and swift, to gather to Christ, holy enemies to the wicked, and faithful friends to all the saints, and therefore fit to be thus employed. He that receiveth receiveth wages, and the angels will not be unpaid for their attendance; for he that soweth, and he that reapeth, shall rejoice together; (John 4. 36.) that is joy in heaven for the absence of the angels of God.

He will then gather the wheat into the garner, into which the tares shall then be cast, and in which they shall be burned. At the great day a distinction will be made, and with it a vast difference; it will be a notable day indeed.

[1.] The tares will then be gathered out: The reapers (whose primary work it is to gather in the corn) shall be charged first to gather out the tares. Sinners as workers in the world of Satan, as evil doers, are the abode of the devil himself, who walks abroad in the world undistinguished, yet at the great day they shall be parted; no tares shall then be among the wheat; no sinners among the saints: then you shall plainly discern between the righteous and the wicked, which here sometimes it is hard to do, Mal. 3. 18. 24. 1. Christ will not bear always, Ps. 30. 1, &c. They shall gather out of his kingdom all wicked things that offend, and all wicked persons that do iniquity, Ps. 69. 27. Thus will they be expelled from heaven.

[2.] They will then be bound in bundles, v. 30. Sinners of the same sort will be bundled together in the great day: a bundle of atheists, a bundle of epicsures, a bundle of persecutors, and a great bundle of hypocrites. Those who have been associates in iniquity, will be expected to share in the punishment of it, as an aggravation of their misery, as the society of glorified saints will add to their bliss. Let us pray, as David, Lord, gather not my soul with sinners, (Ps. 26. 9.) but let it be bound in the bundle of life, with the Lord our God, 1 Sam. 28. 29.

[5.] They will be cast into a furnace of fire; such will be the end of wicked, miscellaneous people, that are in the church as tares in the field; they are fit for no other place. The田野, the flames of the furnace, and the dark yawning mouth of hell are fit for the wicked; they have a place to die; it shall be a day of slaughter, as in the days of Noah, Gen. 6. 13, and of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, Gen. 19. 24. Let us therefore, knowing these terrors of the Lord, be persuaded not to do iniquity.

(9.) Heaven is the barn into which all God's wheat shall be gathered in that harvest-day. But gather the wheat into my barn: so it is in the parable, v. 30. Note, [1.] In the field of this world good people are the wheat, the most precious grain, and valuable part of the field. [2.] This wheat shall shortly be gathered, gathered from among the tares and weeds; all gathered together in a general assembly, all the Old-Testament saints, all the New-Testament saints, not one missing: Gather my saints together to me, Ps. 50. 5. [3] All God's wheat shall be lodged together in God's barn: particular souls are housed at death as a shock of corn, (Job 5. 26.) but the general in-gathering will be at the end of time: God's wheat will then be put together, and no longer scattered; there will be sheaves of corn, as well as kernels of wheat, and no longer exposed to wind and weather, sin and sorrow: no longer afar off, and at a distance, in the field, but near, in the barn. Nay, heaven is a garner, (ch. 3. 12.) in which the wheat will not only be separated from the tares of ill companions, but sifted from the chaff of their own corruptions.

In the explanation of the parable, this is gloriously represented; (v. 43.) Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.

1. First, it is their present honour, that God is their Father. Now are we the sons of God; (1 John 3. 2.) our Father in heaven is King there. This, when he went to heaven, went to his Father, and our Father, John 20. 17. It is our Father's house, nay, it is our Father's palace, his throne, Rev. 5. 21.

2. Secondly, The honour in reserve for them is, that they shall shine forth as the sun in that kingdom. Here beauty is eclipsed by their poverty, and the meanness of their outward condition; their own weaknesses and infirmities, and the reproach and disgrace cast upon them, cloud them; but then they shall shine forth as the sun from behind a dark cloud: at death they shall shine forth to themselves, at the great day they will shine forth publicly before all the world, their bodies will be made like Christ's glorified body, and shall shine by reflection, with a light borrowed from the Fountain of light: their sanctification will be perfected, and their justification published; God will own them for his children, and will produce the record of all their services and sufferings for his name: they shall shine as the sun, the most glorious of all visible beings. The glory of the saints is in the Old Testament compared to that of the firmament and the stars, but here to that of the sun; for life and immortality are given with a much closer light by the gospel, than under the law.

3. Those who shine as lights in this world, that God may be glorified, shall shine as the sun in the other world, that they may be glorified. Our Saviour concludes as before, with a demand of attention: Who hath ears to hear, let him hear. These are things which it is our happiness to hear of, and our duty to hearken to.

3. Here is the parable of the grain of mustard-seed, v. 31, 32. The scope of this parable is to show that the beginnings of the gospel would be small, but that its latter end would greatly increase. In this way the gospel-church, the kingdom of God among us, would be set up in the world; in this way the work of grace in the heart, the kingdom of God within us, would be carried on in particular persons.

Now concerning the work of the gospel, observe,

1. That it is commonly very weak and small at first, like a grain of mustard-seed, which is one of the least of all seeds. The kingdom of the Messiah, which was now in the setting up, made but a small figure; Christ and the apostles, compared with the grandees of the world, appeared like a grain of mustard-seed, the weak things of the world. In particular places, the first breaking out of the gospel-light, and promulgation of the new doctrine, in particular souls, it is at first the day small things, like a bruised reed. Young converts are like lambs that must be carried in the arms, Isa. 40. 11. There is a little faith, but there is much lacking in it, (1 Thess. 2. 10.) and the groanings such as cannot be uttered, they are so small; a principle of spiritual life, and some motion, but scarcely discernible.

2. That yet it is growing and coming on. Christ's kingdom strangely got ground; great accessions were made to it: nations were born at once, in spite of all the oppositions it met with from hell and earth. In the soul where grace is true, it is growing gradually, though perhaps insensibly. A grain of mustard-seed is small, but, however, it is seed, and has in it a disposition to grow. Grace will be getting ground, shining more and more, Prov. 4. 18. Gracious habits confirmed, actions quickened, and knowledge more clear, faith more confirmed, love more inflamed; here is the seed growing.

3. That it will at last come to a great degree of strength and usefulness: when it is grown to some maturity, it becometh a tree, much large in those countries than in ours. The church, like the vine brought out of Egypt, has taken root, and filled the earth, Ps. 80. 9—11. The church is like a great tree, in which the fowls of the air do lodge; God's people have recourse to it for food and rest, shade and shelter. In particular persons, the principle of grace, if true, will persevere and be perfected at last; growing grace will be growing much more and more. Grown christians must covet to be useful to others, as the mustard-seed when grown is to the birds; that those who dwell near or under their shadow, may be the better for them, Hos. 14. 7.

IV. Here is the parable of the leaven, v. 33. The scope of this is much the same with that of the foregoing parable, to show that the gospel should prevail and be successful by degrees, but silently and insensibly; the spreading of the gospel is like leaven, and works like leaven in the hearts of those who receive it.

1. A woman took this leaven, it was her work. Ministers are employed in leavening places, in leavening souls, with the gospel. The woman is the weaker vessel, and we have this treasure in such vessels.

2. The leaven was hid in three measures of meal. The heart is, as the meal, soft and pliable; it is the vessel that is likely to profit by the word: leaven among corn unground does not work, nor does the gospel in souls unhumbled and unbroken for sin: the law grinds the heart, and then the gospel leavens it. It is three measures of meal, a great quantity, for a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. The meal must be kneaded, before it receive the leaven; our hearts, as they must be broken, so they must be moistened, and pains taken with them to prepare them for the word, that they may receive the impressions of it. This leaven must be hid in the heart, (Ps. 119. 11.) not so much for secrecy (for it will show itself) as for safety; our inward thought must be upon it, we must lay it up, as Mary laid up the savings of Christ, Luke 2. 39. When the woman hides the leaven in the meal, it is with an intention that it should communicate its taste and relish to it; so we must treasure up the word in our souls, that we may have it identified by it, John 17. 17.

3. The leaven thus hid in the dough, works there, it ferments; the word is quick and powerful, Heb. 4. 12. The leaven works speedily, so does the word, and yet gradually. What a sudden change did Eli- jah's mantle make upon Elisha! 1 Kings 19. 20. It works silently and insensibly, (Mark 4. 26.) yet strongly and irresistibly; it does its work without noise, for some are as the Sowing of the Sower, but does it with- out fail. Hide but the leaven in the dough, and all the world cannot hinder it from communicating its taste and relish to it, and yet none sees how it is done, but by degrees the whole is leavened.

(1.) Thus it was in the world. The apostles, by their preaching, hid a handful of leaven in the great mass of mankind, and it had a strange effect; it put the world into a ferment, and in a sense turned it upside down, (Acts 17. 6.) and by degrees made a wonderful change in the taste and relish of it; the savour of the gospel was manifested in every place, 2 Cor. 2. 14. Rom. 15. 19. It was thus effectual, not by outward force, and therefore not by any such force resistible and conquerable, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, who works, and none can hinder.

(2.) Thus it is in the heart. When the gospel comes into the soul, [1.] It works a change, not in the substance, the dough is the same, but in the quality; it makes us to savour otherwise than we have done, and other things to savour with us otherwise than they used to do, Rom. 8. 5. [2.] It works a universal change; it diffuses itself into all the powers and faculties of the soul, and alters the property even of the members of the body, Rom. 6. 13. [3.] This change is such as makes the soul to partake of the nature of the word, as the dough does of the leaven. We are delivered into it as into a mould, (Rom. 6. 17.) changed into the same image, (2 Cor. 3. 18.) like the impression of the seal upon the wax. The gospel savours of God, and Christ, and free grace, and another world, and these things now relish with the soul. It is a word of faith and repentance, holiness and love, and these are wrought in the soul by it. This savour is communicated insensibly, for our life is hid; but inseparably, for grace is a good part that shall never be taken away from those who have it. When the dough is leavened, then to the oven with it; trials and afflictions commonly attend this change; but thus saints are fitted to be bread for our Master's table.

44. Again: The kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field. 45. Again: The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman, seeking goodly pearls: 46. Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it. 47. Again: The kingdom of heaven is like unto a net, that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind: 48. Which, when it was full, they drew to shore, and sat down, and gathered the good into vessels, but cast the bad away. 49. So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, 50. And shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. 51. Jesus saith unto them, Have ye understood all these things? They say unto him, Yea, Lord. 52. Then said he unto them, Therefore every Scribe which is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven, is like unto a man that is an householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old.

We have four short parables in these verses:

1. That of the treasure hid in the field. Hitherto he had compared the kingdom of heaven to small things, because its beginning was small; but, lest any should hence take occasion to think meanly of it, in this parable and the next he represents it as of great value in itself, and of great advantage to those who embrace it, and are willing to come up to its terms; it is here likened to a treasure hid in the field, which, if we will, we may make our own.

1. Jesus Christ is the true Treasure; in him there is an abundance of all that which is rich and useful, and will be a portion for us; all fulness: (Col. 1. 19. John 1. 16.) treasures of wisdom and knowledge, (Col. 2. 3.) of righteousness, grace, and peace; these are laid up for us in Christ; and, if we have an interest in him, it is all our own.

2. The gospel is the field in which this treasure is hid; it is the invisible seed of both the Old Testament and the New-Testament gospel. In gospel-ordinances he is hid as the milk in the breast, the marrow in the bone, as the water in the well; (Isa. 12. 3.) as the honey in the honeycomb. It is hid, not in a garden enclosed, or a spring shut up, but in a field, an open field; whoever will, let him come, and search the scriptures; let him dig in this field; (Prov. 2. 4.) and whatever royal mines we find, they are all our own, if we take the right course.

3. It is a great thing to discover the treasure hid in this field, and the unspeakable value of it. The reason why so many slight the gospel, and will not be at the expense, and run the hazard, of entertaining it, is because they look only upon the surface of the field, and judge by that, and see only the external, material, visible, and external ordinances of the philosophers; nay, the richest mines are often in grounds that appear most barren; and therefore they will not so much as bid for the field, much less come up to the price. What is thy beloved more than another beloved? What is the Bible more than other good books? The gospel of Christ more than Plato's philosophy, or Confucius's morals? But those who in the scripture the scriptures, so as in Daniel to find Christ and eternal life, (John 5. 39.) have discovered such a treasure in this field as makes it infinitely more valuable.

4. Those who discern this treasure in the field, and value it aright, will never be easy till they have made it their own upon any terms. He that has found this treasure, hides it, which denotes a holy jealousy, lest we come short. (Heb. 4. 1.) looking at the creature, (Heb. 13. 15.) lest Satan come between us and it. He rejoices in it, though as yet the bargain be not made; he is glad there is such a bargain to be had, and that he is in a fair way to have an interest in Christ; that the matter is in treaty: their hearts may rejoice, who are yet but seeking the Lord, Ps. 105. 3. He resolves to buy this field: they who embrace gospel-offers, upon gospel-terms, buy this field: they make it their own, for the sake of the unspeakable treasure in it. It is Christ in the gospel that we are to have an eye to; we need not go up to heaven, but Christ in the word is nigh us. And so intent he is upon it, that he sells all to buy this field: they who would have saving benefit by Christ, must be willing to part with all, that they may make it sure to themselves; must count every thing but loss, that they may win Christ, and be found in him.

11. That of the pearl of price, (v. 45, 46.) which is to the same purport with the former, of the treasure. The dream is thus doubled, for the thing is certain.

Note, 1. All the children of men are busy, seeking goodly pearls: one would be rich, another would be honourable, another would be learned; but the poor are hid and conceited, and take up with counterfeits for pearls.

2. Jesus Christ is a Pearl of great price, a Jewel of inestimable value, which will make those who have it rich, truly rich, rich toward God: in having him, we have enough to make us happy here and for ever.

3. A true christian is a spiritual merchant, that seeks and finds this pearl of price; that does not take up with anything short of an interest in Christ, and, as one that is resolved to be spiritually rich, trades high: he eminent and bought that pearl, did not content for it, but purchased it. What will it avail us to know Christ, if we do not know him as ours, made to us Wisdom? 1 Cor. 1. 30.

4. Those who would have a saving interest in Christ, must be willing to part with all for him, leave all to follow him. Whatever stands in opposition to Christ, or in competition with him, for our love and service, we must cheerfully quit it, though every friend to it. A man may buy gold too dear, but not this pearl of price.

11. That of the net cast into the sea, v. 47—49.

1. Here is the parable itself. Where note, (1.) The world is a vast sea, and the children of men are things creeping innumerable, both small and great, in that sea, Ps. 104. 25. Men in their natural state are like the fishes of the sea that have no ruler over them, and the latter part refers to that which is in the casting of a net into this sea, to catch something out of it, for his glory who has the sovereignty of this sea. Ministers are fishers of men, employed in casting and drawing this net; and then they speed, when at Christ's word they let down the net; otherwise, they toil and catch nothing. (2.) This net gathers of every kind, as large drag-nets do. In the visible church there is a deal of trash and rubbish, drawn to the shore, there shall be a separation between the good and bad that were gathered in it. Hypocrites and true christians shall then be parted; the good shall be gathered into vessels, as valuable, and therefore to be carefully kept, but the bad shall be cast away, as vile and unprofitable; and miserable is the condition of those who are cast away in that day. While the net is in the sea, it is not known what is in it, but those who come can see that, did they carefully draw it, and all that is in it, to the shore, for the sake of the good that is in it. Such is God's care for the visible church, and such should ministers' concern be for those under their charge, though they are mixed.

2. Here is the explanation of the latter part of the parable, the former is obvious and plain enough: we see gathered in the visible church, some of every kind; but the latter part refers to that which is not to come, and is therefore more particularly explained, v. 49, 50. So shall it be at the end of the world: then, and not till then, will the dividing, discovering day be. We must not look for the net full of all good fish; the vessels will be so, but in the net they are mixed. See here, (1.) The distinguishing of the wicked from the righteous. The angels of heaven shall come forth to do that which the angels of hell were not debased from among the just; and we need not ask how they will distinguish them when they have both their commission and their instructions from him that knows all men, and particularly knows them that are his, and them that are not, and we may be sure there shall be no mistake or blunder either way. (2.) The doom of the wicked when they are thus severed. They shall be cast into the furnace. Note, Everlasting misery and sorrow will certainly be the portion of those who live among sanctified ones, but themselves die unsanctified. This is the same with what we had before, v. 42. Note, Christ himself preached often of hell-forms, as the everlasting punishment of hypocrites; and it is good for us to be often reminded of this unwaking, quickening truth.

IV. Here is the parable of the good-householder, which is intended to rivet all the rest.

1. The occasion of it was the good providence which the disciples had made in learning, and their profiting by this sermon in particular. (1.) He asked them, Have ye understood all these things? Intimating, that if they had not, he was ready to explain to them which they did not understand, as in the latter part of the parable. Note, It is the will of Christ, that all those who read and hear the word should understand it; for otherwise, how should they get good by it? It is therefore good for us, when we have read or heard the word, to examine ourselves, or to be examined, whether we have understood it or not. It is no disparagement to the disciples of Christ to be catechised. Christ invites us to seek to him for instruction, and ministers should proffer their service to those who have any good question to ask concerning what they have heard. (2.) They answered him, Yes, Lord: and we have reason to believe they said true, because, when they did not understand, they asked for an explication, v. 36. And the exposition of that parable was a key to the rest. Note, The right understanding of one good sermon, will very much help us to understand another; for good truths mutually explain and illustrate one another; and knowledge is easy to him that understandeth.

2. The scope of the parable itself was to give his approbation and commendation of their proficiency. Note, Christ is ready to encourage willing learners in his school, though they are but weak; and to say, Well done, well said.

(1.) He commends them as scribes instructed unto the kingdom of heaven. They were now learning as they might teach, and the teachers among the Jews were the scribes. Ezra, who prepared his heart to teach in Israel, is called a ready scribe. Ezra 7. 6, 10. Now a skilful, faithful minister of the gospel is a scribe too; but for distinction, he is called a scribe instructed unto the kingdom of heaven, well versed in the things of the gospel, and well able to teach those things. Note, (1.) That these who are to instruct others must be well instructed themselves. If the priest's lips must keep knowledge, his head must first have knowledge. (2.) The instruction of a gospel-minister must be in the kingdom of heaven, that is about which his business lies. A man may be a great philosopher and politician, and yet, if not instructed to the kingdom of heaven, he will make but a bad minister.

(2.) He compares them to a good householder, who brings forth out of his treasure things new and old; fruits of last year's growth and this year's gathering, abundance and variety, for the entertainment of his friends, Cant. 7. 13. See here, (1.) What should be a minister's furniture, a treasure of things new and old. Those who have so many and various occasions, need to stock themselves well in their gathering-days with truths new and old, out of the Old Testament, and out of the New; with ancient and modern improvements, that the man of God may be thoroughly furnished. 2 Tim. 3. 16, 17. Old experiences, and new observations, all have their use; and we must not content ourselves with old discoveries, but must be adding new. Live and learn. (2.) What use he should make of this furniture; he should bring forth: laying up is in order to laying out, for the benefit of others. So you are to lay up, but not for yourselves. Many are full, but they have no vent; (Job 52. 19.) they have a talent, but they bury it; such are unprofitable servants; Christ himself received that he might give;
so must we, and we shall have more. In bringing forth things, new and old do best together; old truths, but new methods and expressions, especially new affections.

53. And it came to pass, that when Jesus had finished these parables, he departed thence. 54. And when he was come into his own country, he taught them in their synagogue, insomuch that they were astonished, and said, Whence hath this man this wisdom, and these mighty works? 55. Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas?
56. And his sisters, are they not all with us? Whence then hath this man all these things? 57. And they were offended in him. But Jesus said unto them, A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and in his own house. 58. And he did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief.

We have here Christ in his own country. He went about doing good, yet left not any place till he had finished his testimony there at that time. His own countrymen had rejected him once, yet he came to them again. Note, Christ does not take refusers at their first word, but repeats his offers to those who have often repulsed them. Is this, as in other things, Christ was like his brethren; he had a natural affection to his own country; Patrum quaque amat, non quia pulchrum et quia suum. Even one loves his country, not because it is beautiful, but because it is his own. Sence. His treatment this time was much the same as before, scornful and spiteful.

Observe,
1. How they expressed their contempt of him.
When he taught them in their synagogue, they were astonished; not that they were taken with his preaching, or admired his doctrine in itself, but only that it should be his; looking upon him as unlikely to be such a teacher. Two things they upbraided him with:

1. His want of academical education. They owned that he had wisdom, and did mighty works; but the question was, Whence he had them? For they knew he was not brought up at the feet of their rabbins;
he had never been at the university, nor taken his degree, nor was called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi. Note, Mean and prejudiced spirits are apt to judge of men
by their education, and to inquire more into their rise than into their reasons. "Whence has this man these mighty works? Did he come honestly by them?
Has he not been studying the black art?" Thus they turned against him, which was really for him; for if they had not been wilfully blind, they must have concluded him to be divinely assisted and commissioned, who without the help of education gave such proofs of extraordinary wisdom and power.
2. The meanness and poverty of his relations, v.
55, 56.

(1.) They upbraided him with his father. Is not this the carpenter's son? Yes, it is true he was reputed so; and what harm in that? No disparagement to him to be the son of an honest tradesman.
They remember not (though they might have known it) that this carpenter was of the house of David, (Luke 1. 27.) a son of David; (ch. 1. 20.) though a carpenter, yet a person of honour. Those who are willing to pick quarrels will overlook that which is worthy and deserving, and fasten upon that only which seems mean. Some sortish spirits regard no branch, not even the Branch from the stem of Jesse,
(1. xi. 11.) if it be not the top-branch.

(2.) They upbraided him with his mother; and what quarrel have they with her? Why, truly, his mother is called Mary, and that was a very common name, and they all knew her, and knew her to be an ordinary person; she was called Mary, not Queen Mary, nor Lady Mary, nor so much as Mistress Mary, but plain Mary; and this is turned to his reproof, as men had nothing to be valued by but foreign extraction, noble birth, or splendid titles;
poor things to measure worth by.

(3.) They upbraided him with his brethren, whose names they knew, and had them ready enough to serve this turn; James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas. Instead of ch.
5. 3. how are his servants; thence. James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas, good men but poor men, and therefore despised; and Christ for their sakes. These brethren, it is probable, were Joseph's children by a former wife; or whatever their relation was to him, they seem to have been brought up with him in the same family. And therefore of the calling of three of these, who were of the twelve, to that honour (James, Simon, and Jude, the same with Thaddaeus) we read not particularly, because they needed not such an express call into acquaintance with Christ as had been the companions of his youth.

(4.) His sisters too are all with us; they should therefore have loved him and respected him the more, because he was one of themselves, but therefore they despised him. They were offended in him: they stumbled at these stumbling-stones, for he was set for a Sign that should be spoken against,

II. Some have represented this contempt, v. 57, 58.
1. It did not trouble his heart. It appears he was not much concerned at it; He despised the shame, Heb. 12. 2. Instead of aggravating the affront, or expressing an offence at it, or returning such an answer to their foolish suggestions as they deserved, he mildly imputes it to the common humour of the children of men, to undervalue excellences that are cheap, common, and home-bred. It is usually A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country. Note, (1.) Prophets should have honour paid them, and commonly have; men of God are great men, and men of honour, and challenge respect. It is strange indeed if prophets have not ho-

2. (2.) Notwithstanding this, they are commonly least regarded and reverence in their own company, not, and sometimes are most envied. Familiarity bred contempt.

2. It did for the present, (to speak with reverence,) in effect, tie his hands: He did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief. Note, Unbelief is the great obstruction to Christ's favours. All things are in general possible to God, (ch. 19. 26.)
but then it is to him that believes. He is the Mystic Mark, Mark 16. 23. The grace of God is the power of God's operations, but then it is to every one that be-

1. That if mighty works be not wrought in us, it is not for want of power or grace in Christ, but for want of faith in us. By grace ye are saved, and that is a mighty work, but it is through faith, Eph. 2. 8.

CHAP. XIV.

John the Baptist had said concerning Christ, He must increase, but I must decrease, John 3. 30. The morning-star is here described, and the Sun of righteousness rising to his meridian lustre. Here is, 1. The martyrdom of John; his imprisonment for his faithfulness to Herod, (v. 1. - 5.)
and the 'beheading' of him to please Herodias, (v. 6. - 9.) 2. The miracles of Christ. 1. His feeding five thousand men that came to him to be taught, with five loaves and two fishes, v. 13. - 21. 2. Christ's walking on the water to his
At that time Herod the tetrarch heard of the fame of Jesus; and said unto his servants, This is John the Baptist: he is risen from the dead; and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him. 3. For Herod had laid hold on John, and bound him, and put him in prison, for Herodias' sake, his brother Philip's wife. 4. For John said unto him, It is not lawful for thee to have her. 5. And when he would have put him to death, he feared the multitude, because they counted him as a prophet. 6. But when Herod's birth-day was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased Herod. 7. Whereupon he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she would ask. 8. And she, being before instructed of her mother, said, Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger. 9. And the king was sorry: nevertheless, for the oath's sake, and them which sat with him at meat, he commanded it to be given her. 10. And he sent, and beheaded John in the prison. 11. And his head was brought in a charger, and given to the damsel: and she brought it to her mother. 12. And his disciples came and took up the body, and buried it, and went and told Jesus.

We have here the story of John's martyrdom.

Observe, 1. The occasion of relating this story here, v. 1, 2. Here is,
   1. The account brought to Herod of the miracles which Christ wrought. Herod, the tetrarch and chief governor of Galilee, heard of the fame of Jesus. At that time, when his countrymen slighted him, upon the account of his meanness and obscurity, he began to be famous at court. Note, God will honour those who are despised for his sake. And the gospel, like the sea, gets in one place what it loses in another. Christ had now been preaching and working miracles above two years; yet, it should seem, Herod had not heard of him till now, and now only heard the fame of him. Note, It is the unhappiness of the great ones of the world, that they are most out of the way of hearing the best things, (1 Cor. 2. 8.) which none of the princes of this world knew, 1 Cor. 1. 26. Christ's disciples were now sent abroad to preach, and to work miracles in his name, and this spread the fame of him more than ever; which was an indication of the spreading of the gospel by their means after his ascension.
   2. The construction he puts upon this; (v. 2.) He said to his servants, that told him of the fame of Jesus, As sure as we are here, this is John the Baptist, he is risen from the dead. Either the leaving of Herod was not Sadducism, for the Sadducees say, There is no resurrection; (Acts 23. 8.) or else Herod's guilty conscience (as is usual with Atheists) did at this time get the mastery of his opinion, and now he concludes, whether there be a general resurrection or no, that John Baptist is certainly risen, and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him. John, while he lived, did no miracles; (John 10. 41.) but Herod concludes, that, being risen from the dead, he is clothed with a greater power than he had while he was living. And he very well calls his miracles those of Christ, not his own works, but mighty works showing forth themselves in him. Observe here concerning Herod,
   (1.) How he was disappointed in what he intended by beheading John. He thought if he could get that troublesome fellow out of the way, he might go on in his sins, undisturbed and uncontrolled; yet no sooner is that effected, than he hears of Jesus and his disciples preaching the same pure doctrine, that which is more, even the disciples confirming it by miracles in their master's name. Note, Ministers may be silenced, and imprisoned, and banished, and slain, but the word of God cannot be run down. The prophets live not for ever, but the word taken hold, Zech. 1. 5, 6. See 2 Tim. 2. 9. Sometimes God raises up many faithful ministers out of the ashes of one. This hope there is of God's trees, though they be cut down, Job 14. 7—9.
   (2.) How he was filled with causeless fears, merely from the guilt of his own conscience. Thus blood cries, not only from the earth on which it was shed, but from the heart of him that shed it, and makes him Mager—missab—A terror round about, a terror to himself. A guilty conscience suggests every thing that is frightful, and, like a whirlpool, gathers all itself that comes near it. Thus the water flee when none pursue; (Prov. 28. 1.) are in great fears, where no fear is, Ps. 14. 5. Herod, by a little inquiry, might have found out that this Jesus was in being long before John Baptist's death, and therefore could not be Johannes reddivius—John restored to life; and so he might have undeceived himself; but God justly left him to this infatuation.
   (3.) How, notwithstanding this, he was hardened in his wickedness; for though he was convinced that John was a prophet, and one owned of God, yet he does not express the least remorse or sorrow for his sin in putting him to death. The devils believe and tremble, but they never believe and repent. Note, There may be the terror of strong convictions, where there is not the truth of a saving conversion.
II. The story itself of the imprisonment and martyrdom of John. These extraordinary sufferings of him who was so faithful in the gospel, plainly show that bonds and afflictions will abide the professors of it. As the first Old-Testament saint, so the first New-Testament minister, died a martyr. And if Christ's forerunner was thus treated, let not his followers expect to be caressed by the world. Observe here,
   1. John's faithfulness in reproving Herod, v. 3, 4. Herod was one of John's hearers, (Mark 6. 20.) and therefore John might be the more bold with him. Note, Ministers, who are reprovers by office, are especially obliged to reprove those that are under their charge, and not to suffer sin upon them; they have the fairest opportunity of dealing with them, and with them may expect the most favourable acceptance.
   The particular sin he reproved him for, was, marrying his brother Philip's wife, not his widow, (that had not been so criminal,) but his wife. Philip was now living, and Herod inveigled his wife from him, and kept her for his own. Here was a complication of wickedness, adultery, incest, beside the wrong done to Philip, who had had a child by this woman; and it was an aggravation of the wrong, that he was his brother, his half brother by the father, but not by the mother. See Ps. 50. 20. For this sin John reproved him not by tact and oblique terms, but in plain terms, It is not lawful for thee to have her. He charges it upon him as a sin; not, It is not honourable, or, It is not safe, but, It is not lawful; the sinfulness of sin, as it is the transgression of the law, is the worst thing in it. This was Herod's own iniquity, his beloved sin, and therefore John Baptist tells him of this particularly. Note, (1.) That which by the law of God is unlawful to other people, is lawful for us; but it is to be done with reverence and the greatest of men. They who rule over men must not forget that they are themselves but men, and subject to God. "It is not lawful for thee, any more than for the meanest subject thou hast, to debauch another man's wife." There is no prerogative, no, not for the greatest and most arbitrary kings, to break the laws of God. (2.) If princes and great men cannot, or will not, be restrained from the sin of which their servants are guilty, their fault should be told of it by proper persons, and in a proper manner. As they are not above the commands of God's word, so they are not above the reproofs of his ministers. It is not fit indeed to say to a king, Thou art Belial, (Job 34. 18.) any more than to call a brother Raca, or, Thou fool: it is not fit, while they keep within the sphere of their own authority, to arraign them. But it is fit that, by those whose office it is, they should be told what is unlawful, and told with application, Thou art the man; for it follows there, (v. 19.) that God, (whose agents and ambassadors faithful ministers are) accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor.

3. The imprisonment of John for his faithfulness, v. 3. Herod laid hold on John, when he was going on to preach and baptize, put an end to his work, bound him, and put him in prison; partly to gratify his own revenge, and partly to please Herodias, who of the two seemed to be most incensed against him; it was for her sake that he did it. Note, (1.) Faithful reproofs, if they do not profit, usually provoke; if they do not do good, they are resented as affronts, and they that will not bow to the reproof, will fly in the face of the reprover and hate him, as Ahab hated Micaiah, 1 Kings 22. 8. See Prov. 9. 8.—15. 10, 12. Veritas odium parit—Truth produces hatred. (2.) It is no new thing for God's ministers to suffer ill for doing well. Troubles abide those most that are most diligent and faithful in doing their duty, Acts 20. 20. 23. It was so with the Old Testament prophets, 2 Chron. 18. 20. 21. Perhaps some of John's friends would blame him, and say it was indiscreet in reproving Herod, and tell him he had better be silent than provoke Herod, whose character he knew very well, thus to deprive him of his liberty: but away with that discretion that would hinder men from doing their duty as magistrates, ministers, or Christian friends! I believe John's own heart did not reproach him for it, but this testimony of his conscience for him made his bonds case; that he suffered for well-doing, and not as a busy-body in other men's matters, 2 Pet. 4. 15.

3. The restraint that Herod lay under from further venting of his rage against John, v. 5. (1.) He would have put him to death. That which was not intended at first when he imprisoned him, but his revenge by degrees belled up to that height. Note, The way of ungodly persecution, is down-hill; and when once a respect to Christ's ministers is cast off and broken, though in one instance, that is at length done, which the man would sooner have thought himself a dog than to have been guilty of, 2 Kings 8. 13.

(2.) That which hindered him was his fear of the multitude, that hated theJroasted. John as a firebrand. It was not because he feared God, for he had been before his eyes he would not have imprisoned him; nor because he feared John, though formerly he had had a reverence for him, (his sins had overcome that,) but because he feared the people; he was afraid for himself, his own safety, and the safety of his government, his abuse of which he knew had already rendered him odious to the people, whose resentments being so far heated already, would be apt, upon such a provocation as the putting of a prophet to death, to break out into a flame. Note, [1.] Tyrants have their fears. Those who are, and do, and will, always have fear of the multitude. It is the greatest terror of all to themselves; and when they are most ambitious to be feared by the people, are most afraid of them. [2.] Wicked men are restrained from the most wicked practices, merely by their secular interest, and not by any regard to God. A concern for their ease, credit, wealth, and safety, being their reigning principle, will keep them from many sins, which otherwise they would not be restrained from; and this is one means by which sinners are kept from being overmuch wicked, Eccl. 7. 17. The danger of sin that appears to sense, or to fancy only, influences men more than that which appears to faith. Herod feared that the putting of John to death might raise a mutiny among the people, which he did not; but he never feared that it might raise a mutiny in his own conscience, which it did, v. 2. Men fear being hanged for that which they do not fear being damned for.

4. The contrivance of bringing John to his death. Long he lay in prison; and against the liberty of the subject, (which, blessed be God, is secured to us of this nation by law,) might neither be tried nor bailed. It is easy to tell that he lay a year and a half a helpless prisoner, which was about as much time as he had spent in his public ministry, from his first entrance into it. Now here we have an account of his release, not by any other discharge than death, the period of all a good man's troubles, that brings the prisoners to rest together, so that they hear not the voice of the oppressor, Job 3. 18. Herodias laid the plot that he lay a year and a half a helpless prisoner, that he might thirst after John's blood, and would be satisfied with nothing less. Cross the carnal appetites, and they turn into the most barbarous passions; it was a woman, a whore, and the mother of harlots, that was drunk with the blood of the saints, Rev. 17. 5, 6. Herodias contrived how to bring about the murder of John so artificially as to save Hered's credit, and so to pacify the people. A sorry excuse is better than none; that if we cannot think, that if the truth were known, Herod was himself in the plot; and, for all his pretences of surprise and sorrow, was privy to the contrivance, and knew before what would be asked. And his pretending his oath, and respect to his guests, was all but sham and grimace. But if he were trepanned into it ere he was aware, yet because it was the thing he might have prevented, and would not, he is justly found guilty of the whole contrivance. Though Jezebel bring Naboth to his end, yet if Ahab take possession, he hath killed. So, though Herodias contrive the beheading of John, yet, if Herod consent to it, and take pleasure in it, he is not only an accessory, but a principal murderer. Well, the scene being laid behind the curtain, let us see how it was acted upon the stage, and in what manner Herod's death was consummated. (1.) The humouring of Herod by the damsel's dancing upon his birth-day. It seems, Herod's birth-day was kept with some solemnity; in honour of the day, there must needs be, as usual, a ball at court; and, to grace the solemnity, the daughter of Herodias danced before them: who, being the queen's daughter, it was more than she ordinarily engaged herself in. The scene of delicacy and jollity are convenient times for carrying on bad designs against God's people. When the king was made sick with bottles of wine, he stretched out his hand with scorners, (Hos. 7. 5.) for it is part of the spirit of a fool to do mischief, Prov. 10. 23. The Philistines, when their heart was merry, called for Samson to abuse him. The Parisian massacre was at a wedding. This young lady's dancing pleased Herod. We are not told who danced with her, but none pleased Herod like her dancing. Note, A vain and graceless heart is apt to be greatly in love with a foolish and vile passion; and though it seem to be a delight, yet it is entering into further temptation; for by that Satan gets and keeps possession. See Prov. 23. 31, 53. Herod was now in a mirthful mood, and nothing was more agreeable to him than that which fed his vanity.

(2.) The rash and foolish promise which Herod made to this wanton girl, to give her whatsoever she would ask; and this promise confirmed with an oath, v. 7. Here in very extraordinary manner, Herod here entered into, and no way becoming a prudent man that is afraid of being snared in the words of his mouth, (Prov. 6. 2.) much less a good man that fears an oath, Eccl. 9. 2. To put this blank into her hand, and enable her to draw upon him at pleasure, was too great a recompense for such a sorry piece of merit; and, I am apt to think, Herod would not have been guilty of such an absurdity. It was often the practice of Herod (as well as the damsel. Note, Promissory oaths are ensnaring things, and, when made rashly, are the products of inward corruption, and the occasions of many temptations. Therefore swear not so at all, lest thou have occasion to say, It was an error, Eccl. 5. 6.

(3.) The bloody demand the young lady made of John the Baptist's head, v. 8. She was before instructed of her mother. Note, The case of those children is very sad, whose parents are their counsellors to do wickedly, as Ahaziah's; (2 Chron. 22. 5.) who instruct them and encourage them in sin, and set them bad examples; for the corrupt nature will sooner be quickened by bad instructions than restrained and mortified by good ones. Children ought not to obey their parents against the Lord, but, if they command them to sin, must say, as Levi did to father and mother, they have not seen them.

Herod having given her her commission, and Herodias her instructions, she requires John the Baptist's head in a charger. Perhaps Herodias feared lest Herod should grow weary of her, (as lust useth to nauseate and be cloyed,) and then would make John Baptist's reproof a pretence to dismiss her; to prevent which they contrive to harden Herod in it, v. 9. Engaging him with a demand of some particular thing, be he beheaded then, that is the death by which he must glorify God; and because it was his who died first after the beginning of the gospel, the martyrs died various kinds of deaths, and not so easy and honourable as this, yet this is put for all the rest, Rev. 20. 4, where we read of the souls of those that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus. Yet this is not enough, the thing must be humoured and gratified, and not only a revenge, but a fancy must be gratified; it must be given her here in a charger, served up in blood, as a dish of meat at the feast, or sauce to all the other dishes; it is reserved for the third course, to come up with the rarities. He must have no trial, no public hearing, no forms of law or justice must add solemnity to his death; but he is tried, condemned, and executed, in a breath. It was well for him he was so mortified to the world, that death could be no surprise to him, though ever so sudden. It must be given her here, and reckoned a recompense for her dancing, and desire no more.

(4.) Herod's grant of this demand; (v. 9.) The king was sorry, at least took him on to be so, but, for the oath's sake, he commanded it to be given her. Here is

[1.] A pretended concern for John. The king was very sorry. Note, Many a man sins with regret, that never has any true regret for his sin; is sorry to sin, yet is utterly a stranger to godly sorrow; sins with reluctance, and yet goes on to sin. Dr. Ham mond suggests, that one reason of Herod's sorrow was, because it was his birth-day festival, and it would not be an ill omen to shed blood on that day which, as other days of joy, used to be graced with acts of clemency; Natumei collins, tacete lites——We are celebrating the birth-day, let there be no contentions.

[2.] Here is a pretended conscience of his oath, with a specious show of honour and honesty; he must needs do something, for the oath's sake. Note, How to great an extent doth this think, that a wicked oath will justify a wicked action, especially if it be necessary, that it needed not be expressed, that he would do any thing for her that was lawful and honest; and when she demanded what was otherwise, he ought to have declared, and he might have done it honourably, that the oath was null and void, and the obligation of it ceased. No man can lay himself under an obligation to sin, because God has already so strongly obliged every man against sin.

[3.] Here is a real baseness in compliance with wicked companions. Herod yielding, not so much for the sake of the oath, but because it was public, and in compliment to them that sat at meat with him; he granted the demand, that he might not seem, before them, to have broken his engagement. Note, A point of honour goes much further with many than a point of conscience. Those who sat at meat with him, probably, were as well pleased with the damsel's dancing as he, and therefore would have her by all means to be gratified in a frolic, and perhaps were as willing as she to see John the Baptist's head off. However, none of them had the honesty to interpose, as they ought to have done, for the preventing of it, as Jehoiakim's princes did, Jer. 36. 25. If some of the common people had been here, they would have rescued this Jonathan, as 1 Sam. 14. 45.

[4.] Here is a real malice to John, at the bottom of this concession, or else he might have found out omissions enough to have gotten clear of his promise. Note, Though a wicked mind never wants an excuse, yet the truth of the matter is, that every man is tempted when he is drawn aside of his own lusts, and enticed, Jam. 1. 14. Perhaps Herod presently reflected upon the extravagance of his promise, and when he might grant a moderate sum of money, which he loved a great deal better than John the Baptist, was glad to get clear of it so easily; and therefore immediately issues out a warrant for the beheading of John the Baptist, it should seem not in writing, but only by word of mouth; so little account is made of that precious life; he commanded it to be given her.

(5.) The execution of John, pursuant to this grant; (v. 10.) He was beheaded, and the head of John in a charger. It is probable the prison was very near, at the gate of the palace: and thither an officer was sent to cut off the head of this great man. He must be beheaded with expedition, to gratify Herodias, who was in a longing condition till it was done. It was done in the night, for it was at supper-time, after supper it is likely. It was done in the prison, not at the usual place of execution, for fear of an uproar. A great many of innocent persons were then been huddled up in corners, which, when God comes to make inquisition for blood, the earth shall dis close, and shall no more cover, Isa. 26. 21. Ps. 9. 12.

Thus was that voice silenced, that burning and shining light extinguished; thus did that prophet, that Elias, of the New Testament, fall a sacrifice to the resentments of an imperious, whorish woman. Thus did he, who was great in the sight of the Lord,
13. When Jesus heard of it, he departed thence by ship into a desert place apart; and when the people had heard thereof, they followed him on foot out of the cities.

14. And Jesus went forth, and saw a great multitude, and was moved with compassion toward them, and he healed their sick.

15. And when it was evening his disciples came to him, saying, This is a desert place, and the time is now past; send the multitude away, that they may go into the villages, and buy themselves victuals.

16. But Jesus said unto them, They need not depart; give ye them to eat. 17. And they say unto him, We have here but five loaves, and two fishes.

18. He said, Bring them hither to me. 19. And he commanded the multitude to sit down on the grass; and took the five loaves and the two fishes, and, looking up to heaven, he blessed, and brake; and gave the loaves to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude. 20. And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the fragments that remained twelve baskets full. 21. And they that had eaten were about five thousand men, besides women and children.

This passage of story, concerning Christ's feeding five thousand men with five loaves and two fishes, is recorded by all the four Evangelists, which very few, if any, of Christ's miracles are; this intimates that there is something in it worthy of special remark. Observe,

I. The great resort of people to Christ, when he was retired into a desert place, v. 13. He withdrew into a solitary place, when he heard, not of John's death, but of the thoughts Herod had concerning him, that he was John the Baptist risen from the dead, and therefore so feared by Herod as to be hated; he departed further off, to get out of Herod's jurisdiction. Note, In times of peril, when God opens a door of escape, long since directed his disciples to Christ, and turned them over to him, but they could not leave their old master while he lived; therefore he is removed that they may go to Jesus, whom they had sometimes emulated and envied for John's sake. It is better to bring them to Christ by want and loss, than not to come to him at all. If our masters be taken from our head, this is our comfort, we have a Master in heaven, who himself is our Head.
It is lawful to flee for our own preservation, unless we have some special call to expose ourselves. Christ’s hour came not yet; and therefore he would not thrust himself upon suffering. He had secured himself by divine power; he departed by ship. But a city on a hill cannot be hid; when the people heard it, they followed him on foot from all parts. Such an interest Christ had in the affections of the multitude, the more he withdrew, the more they adhered. How often, the more a man is exerted in a thing, the more it is shut out of the sight of others by the warmth of his own zeal. As often, the scripture was fulfilled, that unto him shall the gathering of the people be. It should seem, there was more crowding to Christ after John’s martyrdom than before. Sometimes the sufferings of the saints are made to further the gospel, (Phil. 1. 12.) and “the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church.” This is the testimony which was finished, it was recollected, and more might be seen of it. Note, When Christ and his word withdrew from us, it is best for us (whatever flesh and blood may object to the contrary) to follow it, preferring opportunities for our souls before any secular advantages wherewith. When the ark removes, ye shall remove, and go after it, Josh. 3. 3. 2. Those that truly believe in the sincere milk of the word, will not stick at the difficulties which may meet with in their attendance on it. The presence of Christ is a gospel makes a desert place not only tolerable, but beautiful; it makes the wilderness an Eden, Isa. 51. 3. 41, 19, 20.

11. The tender compassion of our Lord Jesus toward those who thus followed him, v. 14. He went forth, and appeared publicly among them. Though he retired for his own security, and his own repose, yet he went forth from his retirement, when he saw people desirous to hear him, and yearned both to toil himself, and to expose himself, for the good of souls; for even Christ pleased not himself. 2. When he saw the multitude, he had compassion on them. Note, The sight of a great multitude may justly move compassion. To see a great multitude, and to think how many precious, immortal souls here are, the greatest part of which, in which we have reason to fear, are neglected and left to perish, could grieve one to the heart. None like Christ for pity, nor as his compassion fail not. 3. He did not only pity them, but he helped them: many of them were sick, and he, in compassion to them, healed them; for he came into the world to be the great Healer. After a while, they were all hungry, and he in compassion to them, fed them. Note, In all the favours Christ showed himself, he was moved with compassion, Isa. 63. 9.

III. The motion which the text gives of the dismissing of the congregation, and Christ’s setting aside the motion. 1. The evening drawing on, the disciples moved it to Christ to send the multitude away; they thought there was a good day’s work done, and it was time to disperse. Note, Christ’s disciples are often more careful to show their discretion than to show their zeal; and their abundant ministering, rather than their abundant affection in the things of God. 2. Christ would not dismiss them hungry as they were, nor detain them longer without meat, nor put them upon the trouble and charge of buying meat for themselves, but orders his disciples to provide for them. Christ all along expressed more tenderness toward the people than his disciples did; for what are the compassions of the most merciful men, compared with the tender mercies of God in Christ? See how Christ and his angels are with those who are resolved to die for him, who need not depart. Note, Those who have Christ, have enough, and need not depart to seek a happiness and livelihood in the creature; they that have made sure of the one thing needful, need not be cumbered about much serving; nor will Christ put his willing followers upon a needless expense, but will make their attendance cheap to them.

But if they be hungry, they have need to depart, for that is a necessity which has no law, therefore give you them to eat. Note, The body is the temple of the body, it is the work of his hands, it is part of his purchase; he was himself clothed with a body, that he might encourage us to depend upon him for the supply of our bodily wants. But he takes a particular care of the body, when it is employed to serve the soul in his more immediate service. If we seek first the kingdom of God, and make that our chief care, we may depend upon God to order all things as well for us as he secures it, and may cast all our care of them upon him. These followed Christ but for a trial, in a present fit of zeal, and yet Christ took this care of them; much more will he provide for those who follow him fully.

IV. The slender provision that was made for this great multitude; and here we must compare the number of invite guests with the bill of fare.

1. The number of the guests was five thousand men, beside women and children; and it is probable the women and children might be as many as the men, if not more. This was a vast auditory that Christ preached to, and we have reason to think an attentive auditory; and yet, it should seem, far the greater part, notwithstanding this seeming zeal and enthusiasm, came to nothing; they went off and followed him no more for many are the chosen. We would rather perceive the acceptableness of the word by the conversations, than by the crowds, of its hearers; though that also is a good sight and a good sign.

2. The bill of fare was very disproportionate to the number of the guests, but five loaves, and two fishes. This provision the disciples carried about with them for a time of the family, now they were retired into the desert. Christ could have fed them by miracle, but to set us an example of providing for those of our own households, he will have their own camp victualled in an ordinary way. Here is neither plenty, nor variety, nor dainty; a dish of fish was no rarity to them that were fishermen, but it was food convenient for the twelve; two fishes for their supper, and bread to serve them perhaps for a day or two; here is no great strength or strong drink; fair water from the rivers in the desert was had to drink with their meat; and yet out of this Christ will have the multitude fed. Note, Those who have but a little, yet when the necessity is urgent, must relieve others out of that little, and that is the way to make it more. Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? Yes, he can, when he pleases, a plentiful table.

V. The liberal distribution of this provision among the multitude; (v. 18, 19.) Bring them hither to me. Note, The way to have our creature-comforts comforted indeed to us, is to bring them to Christ; for everything is sanctified by his word, and by prayer to him; that is likely to prosper and do well with us, which we put into the hands of our Lord Jesus, that he may dispose of it as he pleases, and that we may take it back into his hand, and then it will be doubly sweet to us. What we give in charity, we should bring to Christ first, that he may dispose of it from us, and graciously bless it to those to whom it is given; this is doing it as unto the Lord.

Now at this miraculous meal we may observe, 1. The setting of the guests; (v. 19.) He commanded them to sit down; which intimates, that while he was preaching to them they were standing, which is a posture of reverence, and readiness for motion. But what shall we do for chairs for them all? Let them sit down on the grass. When Ahasuerus would show the riches of his glorious kingdom... and the honour of his excellent majesty, in a royal feast for the great men of all his provinces, the beds or couches they sat on were of gold and silver, upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black marlins, Esther 1. 6. Our Lord Jesus did now show, in a divine feast, the riches of a more glorious kingdom than that, and the honour of a more excellent majesty, even a dominion over nature itself; but here is not so much as a cloth spread, no plates or napkins laid, no knives or forks, not so much as a bench to sit down on; but, as if Christ intended indeed to reduce the world to the plainness and simplicity, and so to the innocency and happiness, of Adam in paradise, did here serve the meat on the ground. By doing every thing thus, without any pomp or splendour, he plainly showed that his kingdom was not of this world, nor cometh with observation.

2. The craving of a blessing. He did not appoint one of his disciples to be his chaplain, but he himself looked up to heaven, and blessed, and gave thanks; he praised God for the provision they had, and prayed to God to bless it to them. His craving a blessing, was commanding a blessing; for as he preached, so he prayed, like one having authority; and in this prayer and thanksgiving, we may suppose, he had special reference to the multiplying of this food; but herein he has taught us that good duty of craving a blessing and giving thanks at our meals: God's good creatures must be received with thanksgiving, 1 Thess. 5. 18. 4. Samuel blessed the feast, 1 Sam. 9. 13. 15. Acts 2. 46, 47.—27, 34, 35. This is eating and drinking to the glory of God; (1 Cor. 10. 31.) giving God thanks, (Rom. 14. 6.) eating before God, as Moses, and his father-in-law, Exod. 18. 12, 15. When Christ blessed, he looked up to heaven, to teach us, in prayer, to eye God as a Father in heaven; and when we receive our creature-comforts to look thitherward, as taking them from God's hand, and depending on him for a blessers.

3. The carving of the meat. The Master of the feast was himself head-carver, for he brake, and gave the loaves to the disciples, and the disciples to the multitude. Christ intended hereby to put honour upon his disciples, that they might be respected as workers together with him: as also to signify in what way the spiritual food of the word should be dispensed to the world; from Christ, as the original Author, by his ministers. That Christ designed for the churches, he signified by his servant John; (Rev. 1. 1, 4.) they delivered all that, and that only, which they received from the Lord. 1 Cor. 11. 23. Ministers can never fill the people's hearts, unless Christ first fill their hands: and what he has given to the disciples, they must give to the multitude; for they are stewards, to give to every one their portion of meat, ch. 24. 45. And, blessed be God, be the multitude ever so great, there is enough for all, enough for each.

4. The increase of the meat. This is taken notice of only in the effect, not in the cause or manner of it; here is no mention of any word that Christ spoke, by which the food was multiplied; the purposes and intentions of his mind and will shall take effect, though they be not spoken out: but this is observable, that the meat was multiplied, not in the heap at first, but in the distribution of it. A widow's oil increased in the pouring out, so here the bread in the breaking. Thus grace grows by being acted, and, while other things perish in the using, spiritual gifts increase in the using. God ministers seed to the sower, and multiplies not the seed hearred, up, but the seed sown, 2 Cor. 9. 10. Thus there is the bread increased, and yet increased; that scattereth, and so increaseth.

VI. The plentiful satisfaction of all the guests with this provision. Though the disproportion was so great, yet there was enough and to spare.

1. There was enough; They did all eat and were filled. Note, Those whom Christ feeds, he fills; so runs the promise, (Psalm 37. 19.) They shall be satisfied. As there was enough for all, they did all eat, so there was enough for each, they were filled; and though there was but a little, there was enough, and that is as good as a feast. Note, The blessing of God can make a little go a great way; as, if God blasts what we have, we eat, and have not enough, Hag. 1. 9.

2. There was to spare; They took up of the fragments that remained, twelve baskets full, one basket for each apostle; thus what they gave they had again, and a greater deal more with it; and they were so far from being nice, that they could make this broken meat serve another time, and be thankful. This was to manifest and magnify the miracle, and to show that the provision Christ makes for those who are his is not bare and scanty, but rich and plentiful; bread enough, and to spare, (Luke 15. 17.) an overflowing fulness. Elisha's multiplying the loaves was somewhat like this, but far short of it; and then it was said, They shall eat and leave, 2 Kings 4. 43.

It is the same divine power, though exerted in an ordinary way, which multiplies the seed sown in the ground every year, and makes the earth yield her increase; so that what was brought out by handfuls, is brought home in sheaves: This is the Lord's doing; it is by Christ that all natural things consist, and by the word of his power that they are upheld.

22. And straightway Jesus constrained his disciples to get into a ship, and to go before him unto the other side, while he sent the multitudes away. 23. And when he had sent the multitudes away, he went up into a mountain apart to pray: and when the evening was come, he was there alone. 24. But the ship was now in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves; for the wind was contrary. 25. And in the fourth watch of the night, Jesus went unto them, walking on the sea. 26. And when the disciples saw him walking on the sea, they were troubled, saying, It is a spirit; and they cried out for fear. 27. But straightway Jesus spake unto them, saying, Be of good cheer, it is I; be not afraid. 28. And Peter answered him and said, Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee on the water. 29. And he said, Come. And when Peter was come down out of the ship, he walked on the water, to go to Jesus. 30. But when he saw the wind boisterous, he was afraid; and beginning to sink, he cried, saying, Lord, save me! 31. And immediately Jesus stretched forth his hand, and caught him, and said unto him, O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt? 32. And when they were come into the ship, the wind ceased. 33. Then they that were in the ship came and worshipped him, saying, Of a truth thou art the Son of God.

We have here the story of another miracle which Christ wrought for the relief of his friends and followers, his walking upon the water to his disciples. In the foregoing miracle he acted as the Lord of nature, improving its powers for the supply of those who were in want; in this, he acted as the Lord of nature, correcting and controlling its powers for the succour of those who were in danger and distress.

1. Christ's dismissing of his disciples and the multitude, after he had fed them miraculously. He constrained his disciples to get into a ship, and to go before him into the other side. (v. 22.) St. John gives a particular reason for the hasty breaking up of this assembly, because the people were so affected with the miracle of the loaves, that they were about to take him by force, and make him a king; (John 6.) to avoid which, he immediately scattered the people, sent away the disciples, lest they should join with them, and he himself withdrew, John 6. 15.

When they had sat down to eat and drink, they did not rise up to play, but each went to his business.

1. Christ sent the people away. It intimated somewhat of solemnity in the dismissing of them; he sent them away with a blessing, with some parting words of caution, counsel, and comfort, which might abide with them.

2. He constrained the disciples to go into a ship first, for till they were gone the people would not stir. The disciples were loath to go, and would not have gone, if he had not constrained them. They were loath to go to sea without him. If they presence go not with us, carry we not up hence, Exod. 33. 13.

They were loath to leave him alone, without any guard, or any ship to wait for him; but they did it in pure obedience to his command.

II. Christ's retirement hereupon; (v. 23.) He went up into a mountain apart to pray. Observe here,

1. That he was alone; he went apart into a solitary place, and was there all alone. Though he had so much work to do with others, yet he chose sometimes to be alone, to set us an example. Those are not the best ministers that do not care for being alone; that cannot enjoy themselves in solitude, when they have none else to converse with, none else to enjoy, but God and their own hearts.

2. That he was alone at prayer; that was his business in this solitude, to pray. Though Christ, as God, was Lord of all, and was prayed to, yet Christ, as Man, had the form of a servant, of a beggar, and prayed. Christ has herein set before us an example how to pray, in the performance of his duty, according to the rule he gave, ch. 6. 11. In this mountain there was some private oratory or convenience, provided for such an occasion; it was usual among the Jews to have such. Observe, When the disciples went to sea, their Master went to pray; when Peter was to be sifled as wheat, Christ prayed for him.

3. That he was long alone; there he was when the evening was come, and for aught that appears, there he was till towards morning; the fourth watch of the night. The night came on, and it was a stormy, tempestuous night, yet he continued instant in prayer.

Note, It is good, at least sometimes, upon special occasions, and when we find our hearts enlarged, to continue long in secret prayer, and to take full scope in pouring out our hearts before the Lord. We must not restrain prayer, Job 15. 4.

III. The condition that the poor disciples were in at this time: Their ship was now in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves, v. 24. We may observe here,

1. That they were got into the midst of the sea when the storm rose. We may have fair weather at the beginning of our voyage, and yet meet with storms before we arrive at the port we are bound for. The Lord had not him that girdeth on the harness boast as he that putteth it off; but after a long calm expect some storm or other.

2. The disciples were now where Christ sent them, and yet met with this storm. Had they been flying from their Master, and their work, as Jonah was, when he was arrested by the storm, it had been no matter for their complaint; but their business was to demand from their Master to go to sea at this time, and were going about their work. Note, It is no new thing for Christ's disciples to meet with storms in the way of their duty, and to be sent to sea when their Master foresees a storm; but let them not take it unkindly; what he does they know not now, but they shall know hereafter, that Christ designeth thereby to bring them into himself with the more wonderful grace to them and for them.

3. It was a great discouragement to them now that they had not Christ with them, as they had formerly when they were in a storm; though he was then asleep indeed, yet he was soon awakened, (ch. 8. 24.) but now he was not with them at all. Thus Christ uses his disciples first to lesser difficulties, and then to greater, and so trains them up by degrees to live by faith, and not by sense.

4. Though the wind was contrary, and they were tossed with waves, yet being ordered by their Master to the other side, they did not tuck about and come back again, but made the best of their way forward. Note, Though troubles and difficulties may disturb us in our duty, they must not drive us from it; but through the midst of them we must press forwards.

IV. Christ's approach to them in this condition; (v. 25.) and in this we have an instance,

1. Of his goodness, that he went unto them, as one that took cognizance of their case, and was under a concern about them, as a father about his children.

Note, The extremity of the church and people of God is Christ's opportunity to visit them and appear for them; but he came not till the fourth watch, toward three o'clock in the morning, for then the God of watchmen was there. It was a beautiful sight to see that the Lord appeared for Israel in the Red sea, (Exod. 14. 24.) so was this. He that keepeth Israel neither slumbereth nor sleepeth, but, when there is occasion, walks in darkness for their succour; helps, and that right early.

2. Of his power, that he went unto them, walking on the sea. This is a great instance of Christ's sovereign dominion over all the creatures; they are all under his command. He controls the heavens, and his creatures, and changes the qualities that we called essential. We need not inquire how this was done, whether by condensing the surface of the water, (when God pleases, the depths are congealed in the heart of the sea, Exod. 13. 8.) or by suspending his gravitation of his body, which was transfigured as he pleased; it is sufficient that it proves his divine power, for it is God's prerogative to tread upon the waves of the sea, (Job 9. 8,) as it is to ride upon the wings of the wind. He that made the waters of the sea a wall for the Redeemer of the Lord, (Isa. 51. 10.) here makes them a walk for the Redeemer himself, who, as Lord of all, appears with one foot on the sea and the other on dry land, Rev. 19. 2. The same power that made iron to swim, (2 Kings 6. 6.) did this. What alsed thee, O thou sea? Ps. 114. 5. It was at the presence of the Lord. Thy way, O God, is in the sea, Ps. 104. 8. Note, Christ can take what were pleasures to save his people.

V. Here is an account of what passed between Christ and his distressed friends upon his approach.

1. Between him and all the disciples. We are here told,

(1.) How their fears were raised; (v. 26.) When they saw him walking on the sea, they were troubled, saying, It is a spirit; gáraçcΣ, ev; - It is an apparition; so it might much better he rendered. It seems, the evidence and appearance of spirits was generally believed by all except the Sadducees.
whose doctrine Christ had warned his disciples against; yet, doubtless, many supposed apparitions have been merely the creations of men's own fear and fancy. These disciples asked, "Lord, is this spirit in the Lord?" it can be no other. Note, [1.] Even the appearances and approaches of deliverance are sometimes the occasions of trouble and perplexity to God's people, who are sometimes most frightened when they are least nay, when they are most favoured, as the Virgin Mary, Luke 1. 29. Exod. 3. 6. 7. The comforts of the Spirit of adoption are introduced in the terrors of the appearance of a spirit, or the fancy of it, cannot be frightful, and strike a terror upon us, because of the distance of the world of spirits from us, the just quarrel good spirits have with us, and the inveterate enmity evil spirits have against us: see Job 4. 14. 15. The more acquaintance we have with God, the Father of spirits, and the more careful we are to keep ourselves in his love, the better able we shall be to deal with those fears. [3.] The perplexing, disguising fears of good people, arise from their mistakes and misapprehensions concerning Christ, his person, offices, and undertakings; the more clearly and fully we know his name, with the more assurance we shall trust in him, Ps. 9. 10. [4.] A little thing frightens us in a storm. When without are frightful waves and tempest, the disciples fancied it was some evil spirit that raised the storm. Note, Most of our danger from outward troubles arises from the occasion they give for inward troubles. (2.) How these fears were silenced, v. 27. He straightway relieved them, by showing them their mistake; when they were wrestling with the waves, he declined his succour for some time; but he hastened his succour against their fright, as much the more dangerous; he straightway laid that storm with his word, Be of good cheer, it is I; be not afraid. [1.] He rectified their mistake, by making himself known to them, as Joseph to his brethren; It is I. He does not name himself, as he did to Paul, I am Jesus; for Paul as yet knew him not; but to these disciples it was enough to say, It is I; they knew his voice instantly, John 20. 16. They need not ask, Who art thou, Lord? Art thou for us, or for our adversaries? They could say with the spouse, It is the voice of my Beloved, Cant. 2. 8.—5. 2. True believers know it by a good token. It was enough to make them easy, to understand who it was they saw. Note, A right knowledge opens the door to true comfort, especially the knowledge of Christ. [2.] He encouraged them against their fright; It is I, and therefore, First, Be of good cheer; Secondly, Be courageous; pluck up your spirits, and be courageous. If Christ's disciples be not cheerful in a storm, it is their own fault, he would have them so. Secondly, Be not afraid; 1. Be not afraid of me, now that you know it is I; surely you will not fear for you know I mean you no hurt." Note, Christ will not be a terror to those to whom he manifests himself; when they come to understand him aright, the terror will be over. 2. "Be not afraid of the tempest, of the winds and waves, though noisy and very threatening; fear them not, while I am so near you. I am he that concerns himself for you, and will not stand by, and see you perish." Note, Not he, means he a terror to those that have Christ near them, and know he is theirs; no, not death itself. 2. Between him and Peter, v. 28—31. where observe, (1.) Peter's courage, and Christ's countenancing that. [1.] It was very bold in Peter, that he would venture to come to Christ upon the water; (v. 28.) Lord, if it be thou, bid me come to thee. Courage was Peter's master-grace; and that made him so forward above the rest to express his love to Christ, though others, perhaps, might have been no other. [2.] First, It is an instance of Peter's affection to Christ, that he desired to come to him. When he sees Christ, whom, doubtless, during the storm, he had many a time wished for, he is impatient to be with him. He does not say, Bid me walk on the waters, as desiring it for the miracle-sake; but, Bid me come to thee, as desiring it for Christ's sake; "Let me come to thee," says he, "how to trust, that love will break through fire and water, if duly called to it, to come to Christ. Christ was coming to them, to succour and deliver them. Lord, said Peter, bid me come to thee. Note, When Christ is coming towards us in a way of mercy, we must go forth to meet him in a way of duty; and herein we must be willing and bold to venture with him and venture for him. Those that would have benefit by Christ as a Saviour, must thus by faith come to him. Christ had been now, for some time, absent, and hereby it appears why he absentened himself; it was to endear himself so much the more to his disciples at his return, to make it highly seasonable and doubly acceptable. Note, When, for a small moment, Christ has forsaken his people, his returns are welcome, and most affectionately embraced; when gracious souls, after long seeking, find their Beloved at last, they hold him, and will not let him go, Cant. 3. 4. Secondly, It is an instance of Peter's caution and due observance of the will of Christ, that he would not come without a warrant. Not, "If it be thou, I will come;" but, If he be thou, bid me come. Note, The boldest spirits must wait for a call to hazardous enterprises, which to rashly raise, with the hope of providential hints, wisdom is profitable to direct. Thirdly, It is an instance of Peter's faith and resolution, that he ventured upon the water when Christ bid him. To quit the safety of the ship, and throw himself into the jaws of death, to despise the threatening waves he so lately dreaded, argued a very strong dependence upon the power and word of Christ. What difficulty or danger could stand before such a faith and such a zeal? [2.] It was very kind and condescending in Christ, that he was pleased to own him in it, v. 29. He might have condemned the propost as foolish and rash; nay, and as proud and assuming; "Shall Peter pretend to do as his Master does?" But Christ knew that it came from a sincere and zealous affection, and in a way which he approved of it. Christ is well pleased with the expressions of his people's love, though mixed with manifold infirmities, and makes the best of them. First, He bid him come. When the Pharisees asked a sign, they had not only a repulse, but a reproof, for it, because they did it with a design to tempt Christ; when Peter asked a sign, he had it, because he did it with a view to trust Christ. It is called, "Come, come to Christ; venture all in his hand, and commit the keeping of your souls to him; venture through a stormy sea, a troublous world, to Jesus Christ." Secondly, He bore him out when he did come; Peter walked upon the water. The communion of true believers with Christ is represented by their being quickened with him, raised up with him, made to sit with him, (Eph. 2. 5, 6,) and being crucified with him, Gal. 2. 20. Now, methinks, it is represented in Scripture as being born into the waters. Through the strength of Christ we are borne up above the world, enabled to trample upon it, kept from sinking into it, from being overwhelmed by it, obtain a victory over it, (1 John 3. 4,) by faith in Christ's victory, (John 16. 33,) and with him are crucified to it, Gal. 6. 14. See blessed Paul walking upon the water with Jesus, and more than a conqueror through him, and treading upon all the temptations of the devil, able to separate him from the love of Christ, Rom. 8. 35, &c. Thus the sea of the world is become like a sea of glass, concealed so as to bear; and they that have gotten the victory, stand upon it and sing, Rev. 15. 2, 3.

He walked upon the water, not for diversion or ostentation, but to go to Jesus; and in that he was thus wonderfully borne up. Note, When our souls are following hard after God, then it is that his right hand upholdeth us; it was David's experience, Ps. 63. 8. Special supports are promised, and are to be expected, only in spiritual pursuits. When God bears his Israel upon eagles' wings, it is to bring them to himself; (Exod. 19. 4,) nor can we ever come to Jesus, unless we be upheld by his power; it is in his own strength that we wrestle with him, that we reach after him, that we press forward toward the mark, being kept by the hour, Heb. 12. 1. By faith, and not our strength, must depend upon, as Peter when he walked upon the water: and there is no danger of sinking while underneath are the everlasting arms.

(2.) Here is Peter's cowardice, and Christ's reproving him and accusing him. Christ bid him come, not only that he might walk upon the water, and so know Christ's power, but that he might sink, and so know his own weakness; for as he would shew us his faith, so must we depend upon, as Peter when he walked upon the water: and there is no danger of sinking while underneath are the everlasting arms.

[1.] Peter's great fear; (v. 30.) He was afraid. The strongest faith and the greatest courage have a mixture of fear. Those that can say, Lord, I believe; must say, Lord, help my unbelief. Nothing but perfect love will quite cast out fear. Good men often fail in those graces which they are most eminent for, and which they have then in exercise; to see the hand of God so clearly in the proof of their faith, as it seemed at first, but afterwards his heart failed him. The lengthening out of a trial discovers the weakness of faith.

Here is, First, The cause of this fear; He saw the wind boisterous. While Peter kept his eye fixed upon Christ, and upon his word and power, he walked upon the water well enough; but when he took his eye from Christ, he knew the danger he was in, and observed how the floods lift up their waves, then he feared. Note, Looking at difficulties with an eye of sense more than at precepts and promises with an eye of faith, is at the bottom of all our inordinate fears, both as to public and personal concerns. Abraham was strong in faith, because he considered not his own body; (Rom. 4. 19,) he minded not the discouraging insuperabilities which the promise lay under, but kept his eye upon God's power; and so, with as great hope, believed in his promise, as when he saw the wind boisterous, should have remembered what he had seen, (ch. 8. 27,) when the winds and the sea obeyed Christ; but therefore we fear continually every day, because we forget the Lord our Maker, Isa. 51. 12, 13.

Secondly, The effect of this fear; He began to sink. While faith kept up, he kept above water; but when faith staggered, he began to sink. Note, The sinking of our spirits is owing to the weakness of our faith; we are upheld, but if we are saved) through faith; (1 Pet. 1. 5,) and therefore, when our souls are cast down and dismayed, the sovereign remedy is, to hope in God, Ps. 43. 5. It is the great duty of the regenerate to be strong in the faith, to be strong to believe, and to have the spirit of power, and of might, and of understanding, (2 Tim. 1. 7, 8;) for we all have not an equal share of faith, nor can it be equally strong in all. The unbelief of Peter was a strength to the faith of Christ, and the faith of Christ was a support to the unbelief of Peter.

Thirdly, The remedy he had recourse to in his distress, the old tried, approved remedy, and that was prayer; he cried, Lord, save me. Observe, 1. The manner of his praying; it is fervent and important; He cried. Note, When faith is weak, prayer should be strong. Our Lord Jesus has taught us in the day of our fear to offer up strong cries, Hcb. 5. 7. Sense of danger will make us cry, sense of duty and dependence on God should make us cry to him. 2. The matter of his prayer was pertinent, and to the purpose; he was afraid, and the great Saviour, he came to save; these that would be saved, must not only come to him, but cry to him, for salvation; but we are never brought to this, till we find ourselves sinking; sense of need will drive us to him.

[2.] Christ's great favour to Peter, in this fright. Though there was a mixture of presumption with Peter's faith in his first adventure, and of unbelief with his faith in his after-fainting, yet Christ did not cast him off for his fear.

First, He saved him; he answered him with the saving strength of his right hand, (Ps. 20. 6,) for immediately he stretched forth his hand, and caught him. Note, Christ's time to save is, when we sink, (Ps. 18. 4–7,) he helps at a dead lift. Christ's hand is still stretched out to all believers, to keep them from sinking, these whom he hath once apprehended as his own, and has called to his name, to the end of the world, he will catch out of the water too. Though he may seem to have left his hold, he doth but seem to do so, for they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of his hand, John 10. 28. Never fear, he will hold his own. Our deliverance from our own fears, which else would overwhelm us, is owing to the hand of his power and grace, Ps. 34. 4.

Secondly, He rebuked him; for as many as he loves and saves, he reproves and chides; O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt? Note, 1. Faith may be true, and yet weak; at first, like a grain of mustard-seed. Peter had faith enough to bring him upon the water, yet, because not enough to carry him through, Christ tells him he had but little. 2. Our discouraging doubts and fears are all owing to the weakness of our faith: therefore we doubt, because we are not of little faith. It is the weakness of faith to resolve doubts, the doubts of sense, in a stormy day, so as even then to keep the head above water. Could we but believe more, we should doubt less. 3. The weakness of our faith, and the prevalence of our doubts, are very displeasing to our Lord Jesus. It is true, he doth not cast off weak believers, but it is as true, that he is not pleased with weak faith, no, not in those that are nearest to him. Wherefore didst thou doubt? What reason was there for it? Note, Our doubts and fears would soon vanish before a strict inquiry into the cause of them; for, all things considered, there is no good reason why Christ's disciples should be of a doubtfull mind, no, not in a stormy day, because he is ready to help them, a very present Help.

The reason of the storm coming into the ship, Peter was there. When Christ was come into the ship, they were presently at the shore. Christ walked upon the water till he came to the ship, and then went into that, when he could as easily have walked to the shore; but when ordinary means are to be had, miracles are not to be expected. Though Christ needs not instruments for the doing of his work, he is pleased to use them. Observe, WHEN the storm came into the ship, Peter came in with him. Companions with Christ in his patience, shall be companions in his kingdom, Rev. 1. 9. Those that walk with him, shall reign with him; those that are exposed, and that suffer with him, shall triumph with him.

When they were come into the ship, immediately the storm ceased, for it had done its work, its trying work. He that has gathered the wind into his fists, and bound the waters in a garment, is the same that ascended and descended; and his word even stormy winds fulfil, Ps. 148. 8. When Christ comes into a soul, he makes winds and storms to cease there, and commands peace. Welcome Christ, and the noise of her waves will soon be quelled. The way to be still is, to know that he is God, that he is the Lord with thee.

VII. The adoration paid to Christ hereupon; (v. 33.) They that were in the ship came and worshipped him, and said, Of a truth, thou art the Son of God. Two good uses they made of this distress, and this deliverance.

1. It was a confirmation of their faith in Christ, and abundantly convinced them that the fulness of the Godhead dwelt in him; for none but the world's Creator could multiply the leaves, none but his Governor could tread upon the waters of the sea; they therefore yield to the evidence and make confession of their faith; Thou truly art the Son of God. They knew before that he was the Son of God, but now they know it better. Faith, after a conflict with unbelief, is sometimes the more active, and gains to greater degrees of strength by being exercised. Note, The breaker knows it of a truth. When. It is good for us to know more and more of the excellency of those things wherein we have been instructed, Luke 1. 4. Faith then grows, when it arrives at a full assurance, when it sees clearly, and saith, Of a truth.

2. They took occasion from it to give him the glory due unto his name. They not only owned that great truth, but were suitably affected by it; they worshipped Christ. Note, When Christ manifests his glory for us, we ought to return to it him; (Ps. 50. 15.) I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me. Their worship and adoration of Christ were thus expressed, Of a truth thou art the Son of God. Note, The matter of our creed may and must be made the matter of our praise. Faith is the very root, foundation, and means of worship, and worship the genuine product of faith. He that comes to God must believe; and he that believes in God, will come, Heb. 11. 6.

34. And when they were gone over, they came into the land of Gennesaret, 35. And when the men of that place had knowledge of him, they sent out into all that country round about, and brought unto him all that were diseased; 36. And besought him that they might only touch the hem of his garment: and as many as touched were made perfectly whole.

We have here an account of miracles by wholesale, which Christ wrought on the other side the water, in the land of Gennesaret. Whithersoever Christ went, he was doing good. Gennesaret was called Petrah, or Bethsaida, and Capernaum, and either gave the name to, or took the name from, this sea, which is called, (Luke 5. 1.) The lake of Gennesaret; it signifies the valley of branches. Observe here, 1. The forwardness and faith of the men of that place. These were more noble than the Gergesenes, their neighbours, who were borderers upon the same lake. These besought Christ to depart from them, they had no occasion for him; these besought him to help them, they had need of him. Christ reckons it the greatest honour we can do him, to make use of him. Now here we are told,

1. How the men of that place were brought to Christ; they had knowledge of him. It is probable that his miraculous passage over the sea, which they that were in the ship would industriously spread the report of, might help to make way for his entertainment in those parts; and perhaps it was one thing Christ intended in it, for he has great reaches in what he does. This they had knowledge of, and of the other miracles Christ had wrought, and therefore they flocked to him. Note, They that know Christ's name, will make their application to him: if Christ were better known, he would not be neglected; he is trusted as far as he is known.

They had knowledge of him, that is, of his being among them, and that he would be but a while among them. Note, The discerning of the day of our opportunities is a good step toward the improvement of it. This was the condemnation of the world, that Christ was in the world, and the world knew him not; (John 1. 10.) Jerusalem knew him not, (v. 19, 42.) but there were some who, when he was among them, had knowledge of him. It is better to know that there is a prophet among us than that there has been one, Ezek. 2. 5.

2. How they brought others to Christ, by giving notice to their neighbours of Christ's being come into those parts; They sent out into all that country. Note, Those that have got the knowledge of Christ themselves, shun not to declare it to all that come near them. We must eat these spiritual morsels alone; there is in Christ enough for us all, so that there is nothing got by monopolizing. When we have opportunities of getting good to our souls, we should bring as many as we can to share with us. More than we think of would close with opportunities, if they were but called upon and invited to them. They sent into their own country, because it was their own, and they desired the welfare of it. Note, We can no better testify our love to our country than by promoting and propagating the knowledge of Christ in it. Neighbourhood is an advantage of doing good, which must be improved. Those that are near to us, we should contrive to do something for, at least by our example, to bring them nearer to Christ.

What their business was with Christ; not only, perhaps not chiefly, if at all, to be taught, but to have their sick healed; They brought unto him all that were diseased. If love to Christ and his doctrine will not bring them to him, yet self-love would. Did we but rightly seek our own things, the things of our own peace and welfare, we should seek the things of Christ. We should do him honour, and please him, by deriving grace and righteousness from him. Note, Christ is the proper Person to bring the diseased to; Whither should they go but to the Physician, to the Sun of righteousness, that hath healing under his wings?
his garment, v. 36. They applied themselves to him, (1.) With great importunity; they besought him. Well may we beseech to be healed, when God by his ministers beseecheth us that we will be healed. Note, The great importunity, and the favours and blessings are to be obtained from Christ by meekness; Ask, and it shall be given. (2.) With great humility; they came to him as those that were sensible of their distance, humbly beseeching him to help them; and their desiring to touch the hem of his garment, intimates that they thought themselves unworthy that he should take any particular notice of them, that he should so much as speak to their case, much less touch their hands by the hem of his garment; but they will look upon it as a great favour, if he will give them leave to touch the hem of his garment. The eastern nations show respect to their princes by kissing their sleeve or skirt. (3.) With great assurance of the all-sufficiency of his power, not doubting but they should be healed, even by touching the hem of his garment; that they should receive abundant communications from him by the smallest token or symbol of communion with him. They did not expect the formality of striking his hand over the place of persons diseased, as Naaman did; (2 Kings 5. 11.) but they were sure that there was in him such an overflowing fulness of healing virtue, that they could not fail of a cure, who were but admitted near him. It was in this country and neighbourhood that the woman with the bloody issue was cured by touching the hem of his garment; (Luke 8. 47.) and who admitted for that purpose; and therefore, and thence, probably, they took occasion to ask this. Note, The experiences of others in their attendance upon Christ may be of use both to direct and to encourage us in our attendance upon him. It is good using those means and methods which others before us have sped well in the use of. 11. The fruit and success of this their application to Christ. It was not in vain that these seed of Jacob sought him, for as many as touched, were made perfectly whole. Note, 1. Christ’s cures are perfect cures. Those that he heals, he heals perfectly. He doth not do his work by halves. Though spiritual healing be not perfected at first, yet, doubtless, he that has begun the good work, will perform it, Phil. 1. 6. 2. There is abundance of healing virtue in Christ for all that apply themselves to him, be they ever so many. That precious ointment which was poured upon his head for his anointing, shall be spread on the posterity of them that touch him, the more they touch him, the more shall it be; Ps. 133. 2. The least of Christ’s institutions, like the hem of his garment, is replenished with the overflowing fulness of his grace, and he is able to save to the uttermost. 3. The healing virtue that is in Christ, is put forth for the benefit of those that by a true and lively faith touch him. Christ is in heaven, but his word is nigh us, and he himself in that word. When we mix faith with the word, apply it to ourselves, and submit to its influences and commands, then we touch the hem of Christ’s garment. It is but thus touching, and we are made whole. On such easy terms are spiritual cures offered by him, that he may truly be said to heal freely; so that if our souls die of their wounds, it is not owing to our Physician, it is not for want of skill or will in him; but it is purely owing to ourselves. He could have healed us, he would have healed us, but we would not be healed; so that our blood will lie upon our own heads. 1. THEN came to Jesus Scribes and Pharisees, which were of Jerusalem, saying, 2. Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? For they wash not their hands when they eat bread. 3. But he answered and said unto them, Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your tradition? 4. For God commanded, saying, Honour thy father and mother; and, He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death. 5. But ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father or his mother, It is a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; 6. And honour not his father or his mother, he shall be free. Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition. 7. Ye hypocrites, well did Esias prophesy of you, saying, 8. This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me. 9. But in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. Evil manners, we say, beget good laws. The inattentive heat of the Jewish teachers for the support of their hierarchy, occasioned many excellent discourses of our Saviour’s for the settling of the truth, as here, 1. Here is the cavil of the Scribes and Pharisees at Christ’s disciples, for eating with unwashed hands. The Scribes and Pharisees were the great men of the Jewish church, men whose gain was godliness, great enemies to the gospel of Christ, but colouring their opposition with a pretence of zeal for the law of Moses; when really nothing was intended but the support of their own tyranny over the consciences of men. They were men of learning and men of business. These Scribes and Pharisees here introduced were of Jerusalem, the holy city, the headcity, whither the tribes went up, and where were set the thrones of judgement; they should therefore have been better than others, but they were worse. No external privileges, if they be not duly improved, commonly swell men up the more with pride and malignity. Jerusalem, which should have been a pure spring, was now become a poisoned sink. How is the faithful city become a harlot? Now if these great men be the accusers, pray what is the accusation? What articles do they exhibit against the disciples of Christ? Why, truly, the thing laid to their charge, is, nonconformity to the traditions of their church; (v. 2.) Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? This charge they make good in a particular instance; They wash not their hands when they eat bread. A very high misdemeanor! It was a sign that Christ’s disciples conducted themselves inoffensively, when this was the worst thing they could charge them with. Observe, 1. What was the tradition of the elders—That people should often wash their hands, and always at meat. This they placed a great deal of religion in, supposing that the meat they touched with unwashed hands would be defiling to them. The Pharisees practised this themselves, and with a great deal of strictness imposed it upon others, not under civil penalties, but as matter of conscience, and making it a sin against God if they did not do it. Rabbi Joshua determined, "that to eat with unwashed hands is as great a sin as adultery." And Rabbi Akiba being kept a close prisoner, having water sent him both to wash his hands with, and to drink with his meat, the greatest part being accidentally shed, he washed it himself, and thus would not have himself alone to drink, saying he would rather die than transgress the tradition of the elders. Nay, they would not eat meat with one that did not wash before meat. This mighty zeal in so small a matter would appear very strange, if we did not still see it incident to church-oppressors, not only to be found of practising their own inventions, but to be furious in pressing their own imposition.

2. What was the transgression of this tradition or injunction by the disciples; it seems, they did not wash their hands when they ate bread, which was the more offensive to the Pharisees, because they were men who in other things were strict and conscientious. The custom was innocent enough, and had a decency in its civil use. We read of the water for purifying at the marriage where Christ was present, and they put it into a kist, that it might not be drunk, and so put an end to that use of it. But when it came to be practised and imposed as a religious rite and ceremony, and such a stress laid upon it, the disciples, though weak in knowledge, yet were so well taught as not to comply with it, or observe it; no, not when the Scribes and Pharisees had their eye upon them. They had already learned St. Paul's lesson. All things are lawful for me; yet, I will not be brought under the power of any; especially not of those who sell to their souls, Bow down, that we may go over, 1 Cor. 6. 12.

3. What was the complaint of the Scribes and Pharisees against them. They quarrel with Christ about it, supposing that he allowed them in it, as he did, no doubt, by his own example; Why do thy disciples transgress the commandments of God? And why dost thou suffer them to do it?" It was well that the complaint was made to Christ; for the disciples themselves, though they knew their duty in this case, were perhaps not so well able to give a reason for what they did as were to be wished.

II. Here is Christ's answer to this cavil, and his justification of the disciples in that which was chargeable against them. Note, While we stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, he will be sure to bear us out in it.

Two ways Christ replies upon them:

1. By way of reprimand, v. 3-6. They were saying in the eyes of his disciples, but Christ shows them a beam in their own. But that which he charges upon them, is, not bare a reprimand, for it will be no vindication of ourselves to condemn our neighbours for an evil; but there is such a closure of their tradition (and the authority of that was it they built their charge upon) as makes not only a non-compliance lawful, but an opposition a duty. That human authority must never be submitted to, which sets up in competition with divine authority.

(1.) The charge in general is, You transgress the commandment of God by your tradition. They called it the tradition of the elders. A tradition is an imposition, without the antiquity of the usage, and the authority of them that imposed it, as the church of Rome does upon fathers and councils; but Christ calls it their tradition. Note, Illegal impositions will be laid to the charge of those who support and maintain them, and keep them up, as well as of those who first invented and enjoined them: Mic. 6. 16. You transgress the commandment of God. Note, Those who are most zealous of their own impositions, are most careless of God's commandments; which is a good reason why Christ's disciples should stand upon their guard against such impositions, lest though at first they seem only to infringe the liberty of Christians, they come at length to confront the authority of Christ. Though the Pharisees, in this command of washing before meat, did not intervene upon any command of God; yet, because in other instances they did, he justifies Christ's disciples' disobedience to this.

(2.) The proof of this charge is, a particular instance, that of their transgressing the fifth commandment. [171]

1. Let us see what the command of God is, (v. 4.) what the precept, and what the sanction of the law is.

The precept is, Honour thy father and thy mother; this is enjoined by the common Father of man kind, and by owing respect to them whom Providence has made the instruments of our being, we give honour to him who is the Author of it, who has thereby, as to us, put some of his image upon them. The whole of a child's duty to its parents is included in this of honouring them, which is the spring and foundation of all the rest. If I be a Father, where is my honour? Our Saviour here supposes it to mean the duty of children to maintain their parents in a decent provision, ministering to their wants, if there be occasion, and being every way serviceable to their comfort. Honour widows, that is, maintain them, 1 Tim. 5. 3.

The sanction of this law in the fifth commandment, is, a promise, that thy days may be long; but our Saviour waves that, lest any should thence infer it to be only a thing commendable and praisable, and insists upon the penalty annexed to the breach of this commandment in another scripture, which denotes the duty to be highly and indispensably necessary; He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death; this law we have, Exod. 21. 17. The sin of cursing parents is here opposed to the duty of honouring them. Those who speak ill of their parents, or wish ill to them, who mock at them, or give them taunting and opprobrious language, break this law. If to call a brother Raca be so penal, what is it to call a father so? By our Saviour's application of this law, it appears, that denying service or relief to parents is included in cursing them. Though the language be respectful enough, and nothing abusive in it, yet what will that avail, if the deeds be not agreeable? It is but like him that said, I go, Sir, and went not, ch. 21. 30.

[172] Let us see what was the contradiction which the tradition of the elders gave to this command. It was not direct and downright, but implicit; their casuists gave them such rules as furnished them with an easy evasion from the obligation of this commandment, v. 5, 6. You hear what God saith, but ye say so and so. Note, That which men say, even great men, and learned men, and men in authority, must be examined by that which God saith; and if it be found the command is contradicted, it may and must be rejected, Acts 4. 19. Observe, First, What their tradition was; That a man could not in any case bestow his worldly estate better than to give it to the priests, and devote it to the service of the temple; and that, when any thing was so devoted, it was not only unlawful to alienate it, but all other obligations, though ever so just and sacred, were thereby superseded, and a man was thereby discharged from them. And this proceeded partly from their ceremonialism, and the superstitions regard they had to the temple, and partly from their covetousness, and love of money: for what was given to the temple they were savers by. The former was, in pretence, the latter was, in truth, at the bottom of this tradition.

Secondly, How they allowed the application of this to the case of children. When their parents' necessities called for their assistance, they pleaded, that all they could spare from themselves and their children, they had devoted to the treasury of the temple; It is a gift, as whatsoever thou livest be free, and therefore their parents must expect nothing from them; suggesting, withal, that the spiritual advantage of what was so devoted, would redound to the parents, who must live upon that air. This, they taught, was a good and valid plea, and many unprofitable, unnatural children made use of it, and they justified them in it, and said, He shall be free; so we supply the sense. Some go further, and say it thus: He doth well, his days shall be long in the land, and he shall be looked upon as having duly observed the fifth commandment. The pretence of religion would make his refusal to provide for his parents not only passable but plausible. But the absurdity and impurity of this tradition were very evident; for revealed religion was intended to improve, not to overthower, natural religion; one of the fundamental laws of which is this of honouring our parents; and had they known what that meant, I will have justice, and mercy, and not sacrifice, they had not thus made the most arbitrary rites destructive of the most necessary morals. This was making the command of God of no effect. Note, Whatever leads to, or countenances, disobedience, does, in effect, make void the command; and that they take upon them to dispense with God's law, do, in Christ's account, repent, and disannul it. To break the law is hard, but to teach men so, as the Scribes and Pharisees did, is much worse, ch. 5. 19. To what purpose is the command given, if it be not obeyed? The rule is, as to us, of none effect, if we be not ruled by it. It is time for thee, Lord, to work; high time for the great Reformer, the great Refiner, to appear; for they have made void thy law; (Ps. 119. 126.) not only sinned against the commandment, but, as far as they could, nullified away the commandment. But, thanks be to God, in spite of them and all their traditions, the command stands in full force, power, and virtue.

2. The other part of Christ's answer is by way of reprehension; and that which he here charges them with, is hypocrisy; Ye hypocrites, v. 7. Note, It is the prerogative of him who searcheth the heart, and knows what is in man, to pronounce who are hypocrites. The eye of man can perceive open profaneness, but not such as of Christ that can detect hypocrisy, Luke 16. 15. And as it is a sin which his eye discovers, so it is a sin which all others of his soul hates.

Now Christ fetches his reproof from Isa. 29. 13. Well did Esai prophesy of you. Isaiah spoke it of the men of that generation to which he prophesied, yet Christ applies it to these Scribes and Pharisees. Note, The reproofs of sin and sinners, which we find in the old Scripture, are proved to apply to present persons and practices to the end of the world; for they are not of private interpretation, 2 Pet. 1. 20. The sinners of the latter days are prophesied of, 1 Tim. 4. 1. 2 Tim. 3. 1. 2 Pet. 3. 3. Threatenings directed against others, belong to us, if we be guilty of the same sins. Isaiah prophesied not of them only, but of all other hypocrites, against whom that word of his is still levelled, and stands in force. The prophets of old, thus, said, if the Lord be not with us, we are undone. This prophecy exactly denounces a hypocritical nation, Isa. 9. 17.—10. 6. Here is, (1.) The description of hypocrites, in two things. [1.] To their own performances of religious worship, v. 8. When they draw nigh to God with their mouth, and honour him with their lips, their heart is far from him. Observe, First, How far a hypocrite goes; he draws nigh to God, and honours him; he is, in profession, a worshipper of God. The Pharisees went up to the temple, to pray; he does not stand at that distance which those are at, who live without God in the world, but has a name among the people here. They honour him; that is, they take on them to honour God, they join with those that do so. Some honour God has even from the services of hypocrites, as they help to keep up the face and form of godliness in the world, whence God fetches honour to himself, though they intend it not to him. When God's enemies submit themselves but feignedly, when they lie unto him, so the word is, (Ps. 60.) he redounds to his honour, and he gets himself a name.

Secondly, Where he rests and takes up; this is done but with his mouth and with his lips. It is pieti but from the teeth outwards; he shows much love, and that is all, there is in him his heart no true love; they make their voice to be heard, (Isa. 38. 4.) mention the name of the Lord, Isa. 48. 1. Hypocrites are those that only make a lip-labour of religion and religious worship. In word and tongue, the worst hypocrites may do as well as the best saints, and speak as fair with Jacob's voice.

Thirdly, What that is wherein he comes short; it is in the main matter; Their heart is far from me, habitually alienated and estranged, (Eph. 4. 18.) actually wandering and dwelling upon something else; no serious thoughts of God, no pious affection; no fixed purpose to keep God in heart and head, eternity, no thoughts agreeable to the service. God is near in your mouth, but far from their reins, Jer. 12. 2. Ezek. 33. 31. The heart, with the fool's eyes, is in the ends of the earth. It is a silly dove that is without heart, and so it is a silly dutv, Hos. 7. 11. A hypocrite says one thing, but thinks another. The great thing that God looks at and requires, is, the heart; (Prov. 23. 26.) if he be far from him, it is not a reason for slighting it, and therefore not an acceptable one, it is the sacrifice of fools, Eccl. 5. 1.

[2.] In their prescriptions to others. This is an instance of their hypocrisy, that they teach for doctrines the commandments of men. The Jews then, as the Papists since, paid the same respect to oral tradition that they did to the word of God, receiving it pari atestis actus at reverentia—with the same pious affection and reverence. Conc. Trident. Sess. 4. Decr. 1. When men's inventions are tacked to God's institutions, and imposed accordingly; this is hypocrisy, a mere human religion. The commandments of men are properly conversant about the things of men, but God will have his own work done by his own rules, and accepts not that which he did not himself appoint. That only comes to him, that comes from him.

(2.) The doom of hypocrites; it is put in a little compass; In vain do they worship me. Their worship does not attain the end for which it was appointed; it will neither please God, nor profit themselves. If it be not in spirit, it is not in truth, and so it is all nothing. That man who only seems to be religious, but is not so, his religion is vain; (James 1. 26.) and if our religion be a vain occupation, a vain religion, how great is that vanity! How sad is it to live in an age of prayers and sermons, and sabbaths and sacraments, in vain, because he has not the heart of God in them. Lip-labour is lost labour, Isa. 1. 11. Hypocrites sow the wind and reap the whirlwind; they trust in vanity and vanity will be their recompense.

Thus Christ justified his disciples in their disdaine to the traditions of the elders; and this the Scribes and Pharisees not by their cavilline. We read not of any reply they made; if they were not satisfied, yet they were silenced; and could not resist the power with which Christ spake.
10. And he called the multitude, and said unto them, Hear, and understand: 11. Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man. 12. Then came his disciples, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended, after they heard this saying? 13. But he answered and said, Every plant which by nature Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. 14. Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch. 15. Then answered Peter and said unto him, Declare unto us this parable. 16. And Jesus said, Are ye also yet without understanding? 17. Do not ye yet understand, that whatsoever entereth in at the mouth goeth into the belly, and is cast out into the draught? 18. But those things which proceed out of the mouth come forth from the heart; and they defile the man. 19. For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies. 20. These are the things which defile a man; but to eat with unwashed hands defileth not a man.

Christ having proved that the disciples, in eating with unwashed hands, were not to be blamed, as transgressing the traditions and injunctions of the elders, comes here to show that they were not to be blamed, as having done any thing that was in itself evil. In the former part of his discourse he overturned the authority of the law, and in this the reason of it. Observe, 1. The solemn introduction to this discourse; (v. 16.) He called the multitude. They were withdrawn while Christ discoursed with the Scribes and Pharisees; probably those proud men ordered them to withdraw, as not willing to talk with Christ in their hearing; Christ must favour them at their pleasure with a discourse in private. But Christ had a regard to the multitude; he soon despatched the Scribes and Pharisees, and then turned them off, and invited the multitude, to be his hearers: thus the poor are evangelized; and the foolish things of the world, and things that are despised, hath Christ chosen. The humble Jesus embraced those whom the proud Pharisees looked upon with disdain, and to them he designed it for a mortification. He turns from them as wilful and unteachable, and turns to the multitude, who, though weak, were humble, and willing to be taught. To them he said, Hear, and understand. Note, What we hear from the mouth of Christ, we must give all diligence to understand. Not only scholars, but even the multitude, the ordinary people, must apply their minds to understand the words of Christ. He therefore calls upon them to understand, because the lesson he was now about to teach them, was contrary to the notions which they had sucked in with their milk from their teachers; and overturned many of the customs and usages which they were wedged to, and laid stress upon. Note, There is need of a great intention of mind and clearness of understanding, to free men from those corrupt principles and practices which they have been bred up in and long accustomed to; for in that case the understanding is commonly bribed and biased by prejudice.

II. The truth itself laid down, (v. 11.) in two propositions, which were opposite to the vulgar errors of that time, and were the more surprising in him, for the which goes into the mouth defiles the man. It is not the kind or quality of our food, nor the condition of our hands, that affects the soul with any moral pollution or defilement. The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, Rom. 14. 17. That defiles the man, by which guilt is contracted before God, and the man is rendered offensive to him, and disfigured for communion with him; now what we eat with our other senses, and our other organs, and inwardly and inwardly, does not this; for to the pure all things are pure, Tit. 1. 15. The Pharisees carried the ceremonial pollutions, by eating such and such meats, much further than the law intended, and burdened it with additions of their own, which our Saviour witnesses against; intending hereby to pave the way to a repeal of the ceremonial law in that matter. He was now beginning to teach his followers to call nothing common or unclean; and if Peter, when he was bid to kill and eat, had remembered this word, he would not have said, Not so, Lord, Acts 10. 15—15, 28.

2. But that which comes out of the mouth, this defiles a man. We are polluted, not by the meat we eat with unwashed hands, but by the words we speak from an unsanctified heart; so it is that the mouth is the seat of corruption. There are one of them that eat no flesh, Acts 15. 29. Christ, in a former discourse, had laid a great stress upon our words; (ch. 12. 36, 37.) and that was intended for reproof and warning to those that cavilled at him: this here is intended for reproof and warning to those that cavilled at the disciples, and censured them. It is not the disciples that defile themselves with what they eat, but the Pharisees that defile themselves with what they speak spitefully and censoriously of them. Note, Those who charge one another for transgressing the commandments of men, many times bring greater guilt upon themselves by transgressing the law of God against rash judging. Those most defile themselves, who are most forward to censure the defilements of others.

III. The offence that was taken at this truth, and the account brought to Christ of that offence; (v. 12.) The Pharisees said, etc. Note, That the Pharisees were offended, and didst then not foresee that they would be so, at this saying, and would think the worse of thee and of thy doctrine for it, and be the more enraged at thee? 1. It was not strange that the Pharisees should be offended at this plain truth, for they were men made up of error and enmity, mistake and malice. Sore eyes cannot bear clear light; and nothing is more provoking to proud imposers than the undeviating of those whom they have first blindfolded, and then enslaved. It should seem that the Pharisees, who were strict observers of the traditions, were more offended than the Scribes, who were the teachers of them; and perhaps they were as much galled with the latter part of Christ's doctrine, which taught a strictness in the government of his tongue, as with the former part, which taught an indifference about washing our hands; great defenders for the formalities of religion, being commonly as great enemies to the substantial parts of it.

2. The disciples thought it strange that their Master should say that which he knew would give so much offence; he did not use to do so: surely, think they, if he had considered how provoking it would be, he would not have said what he said, and to whom he said it, and what would be the effect of it; and would teach us, that though in indifferent things we must be tender of giving offence, yet we must not, for fear of that, evade our truth or duty. Truth must be owned, and duty done; and if any be offended, it is his own fault; it is scandal, not given, but taken.

Perhaps they did themselves stumble at the word Christ said, which they thought bold, and scarcely reconcileable with the difference that was put by the law of God between clean and unclean meats; and therefore objected this to Christ, that they might themselves be better informed. They seem likewise to have a concern upon them for the Pharisees, though they had quarrelled with them; which teaches us to forgo, and seek the good, not pecuniary spiritual good, of our enemies, persecutors, and slanderers. They would not have the Pharisees go away displeased at any thing Christ had said; and therefore, though they do not desire him to retract it, they hope he will explain, correct, and justify it. Weak hearers are sometimes more solicitous than they should be not to have wicked hearers offended. But if we please them with the concealment of truth, and repressing of their errors and corruptions, we are not the servants of Christ.

IV. The doom passed upon the Pharisees and their corrupt traditions; which comes in as a reason why Christ cared not though he offended them, and therefore why the disciples should not care; because they were a generation of men that hated to be reformed, and were not like to be reformed by their own repentance. The people of the Lord are planted a noble vine; but now that they are become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, God disowned them, as not of his planting. Note, (1.) In the visible church, it is no strange thing to find plants that our heavenly father has not planted. It is implied that whatever is good in the church, is of God's planting. Isa. 41. 19. But let the husbandman be ever so careful, his vineyard will cast forth weeds of and formalities. The people of God are planted a noble vine; but now that they are become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, God disowned them, as not of his planting. Note, (2.) Those that are of the spirit of the Pharisees, they are sown in the word, and sowing, what figure soever they make, and of what denomination soever they be, God will not own them as of his planting. By their fruit you shall know them. (3.) Those plants that are not of God's planting, shall not be of his protecting, but shall undoubtedly be rooted up. What is not of God shall not stand, Acts 3. 38. What things are unscriptural, will wither and die of themselves, or be justly expunged by the church; however, in the great day these tares that offend will be handled for the fire. What is become of the Pharisees and their traditions? They are long since abandoned; but the gospel of truth is great, and will remain. It cannot be rooted up.

2. The ruin of them, and their followers, who had their persons and principles in admiration, v. 14. Why?

1.) Christ bids his disciples let them alone. "Have no converse with them or concern for them; neither court their favour, nor dread their displeasure; care not though they he offended, they will take their course, and let them take the issue of it. They are wedded to their own fancies, and will have every thing their own way; let them alone. Seek not to please a generation of men that please not God, (1 Thess. 2. 15.) and will be pleased with nothing less than an absolute dominion over your consciences. They arejoin'd to idols, (Ephraim, (Hos. 4. 17.) the idols of their own fancy; let them alone, let them be filthy still," Rev. 22. 11. The case of those sinners is sad indeed, whom Christ orders his ministers to let alone.

[1.] They are proud and ignorant; two bad qualities that often meet, and render a man incurable in his folly, Prov. 26. 12. They are blind leaders of the blind. They are grossly ignorant in the things of God, and strangers to the spiritual nature of the divine law; and yet so proud, that they think they are wiser and better than others, and undertake to be leaders of others, to show others the way to heaven, when they themselves know not one step of the way; and, accordingly, they prescribe to all, and prescribe these who will not follow them. Though they were blind, if they had owned it, and come to Christ for eye-salve, they might have seen, but they disclaimed the intimation of such a thing; (John 9. 40.) Are we blind and do we also stumbled? (John 9. 41.) But they are three blind guides of the blind; (Rem. 2. 19, 20.) were appointed to be so, and fit to be so; that every thing they said, was an oracle and a law; "Therefore let them alone, their case is desperate; do not meddle with them; you may even provoke them, but never convince them." How miserable was the case of the Jewish church now when their leaders were blind, so self-conceitely foolish, as to be peremptory in their conduct, while the people were so sottishly foolish as to follow them with an implicit faith and obedience, and willingly walk after the commandment, Hos. 5. 11. Now the prophecy was fulfilled, Isa. 29. 10, 14. And it is easy to imagine what will be in the end hereof, when the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means, and the people love to have it so, Jer. 5. 31.

[2.] They are pestering to destruction, and will surely be plunged into it: Both shall fall into the ditch. This must needs be the end of it, if both be so blind, and yet both so bold, venturing forward, and yet not aware of danger. Both will be involved in the general desolation coming upon the Jews, and both drowned in eternal destruction and perdition. The blind leaders and the blind followers will perish together. We find (Rev. 22. 15.) that hell is the portion of those that are of a seditious mind, and that love it when it is thrown wide open. The deceived and the deceivers are obnoxious to the judgment of God, Job 12. 16. Note, First, Those that by their cunning craftiness draw others to sin and error, shall not, with all their craft and cunning, escape ruin themselves. If both fall together into the ditch, the blind leaders will fall undermost, and have the worst of it; see Jer. 14. 15, 16. The prophets shall be consumed first, and then the people to whom they prophesied. Jer. 20. 6. 28, 15, 16. Secondly, The sin and ruin of the deceivers will be no security to those that are deceived by them. Though the leaders of this people cause them to err, yet they that are led of them are destroyed, (Isa. 9. 16.) because they shut their eyes against the light which would have rectified their mistake. Seneca, complaining of most people's being led by common opinion and practice, (Unnatiique omnium parens—quaeque sed nuda—Trecentum accurate asserta, et praestat utrum, et praestat usu, et praestat examinare,) concludes, Inde tanta concursatio aliorum super alios ruunt—Hence crowds fall upon crowds, in vast confusion. De Vita Beata. The falling of both together will aggravate the fall of both for they that have ths mutually increased each other's sin, will mutually exasperate each other's ruin.

V. Instruction given to the disciples concerning the truth Christ had laid down, v. 10. Though Christ had said this, and taught them, yet, as ignorant were they not to be taught, he can have compassion on the ignorant who are willing to learn, Heb. 5. 2. If the Pharisees, who made void the law, be offended, let them be offended; but this great peace have they who love the law, that nothing shall offend them, but, some way or other, the offence shall be taken off, Ps. 119. 163.

Here is, 1. Their desire to be better instructed in this matter; (v. 15.) in this respect, as in many others, Peter was their speaker; the rest, it is probable, putting him on to speak, or intimating their concurrence; Declare unto us this parable. What Christ said, was plain, but, because it agreed not with the notions they had imbibed, though they would not contradict it, yet they called it a parable, and could not understand it. Note, (1.) Weak understandings are apt to turn plain truths into parables, and to seek for a knot in a burlap. The disciples often did so, as John 16. 17. even the grasshopper is a burden to a weak stomach, and babies in understanding cannot hear and digest strong meat. (2.) Where a weak head doubts concerning any word of Christ, an upright heart and a willing mind will seek for instruction. The Pharisees were offended, but kept it to the bottom of their hearts, they hated to be informed; but the disciples, though offended, sought for satisfaction, imputing the offence, not to the doctrine delivered, but to the shallowness of their own capacity.

2. The reproof Christ gave them for their weakness and ignorance; (v. 16.) Are ye also yet without understanding? As many as Christ loves and teaches, he thus rebukes. Notice, They are very ignorant indeed, who understand not that moral pollutions are abundantly worse and more dangerous than ceremonial ones. Two things aggravated their dullness and darkness.

(1.) That they were the disciples of Christ; "Are ye also without understanding? Ye whom I have admitted into so great a degree of familiarity with me, being so happy as to be made acquainted with the secrets of my love?"

Note, the ignorance of gospel grace is so great, that profess religion, and enjoy the privileges of church-membership, are justly a grief to the Lord Jesus. "Nn wonder that the Pharisees understand not this doctrine, who know nothing of the Messiah's kingdom; but ye that have heard it, and embraced it yourselves, and preached it to others, are ye also such strangers to the spirit and genius of it?"

(2.) That they had been a great while Christ's scholars; "Are ye yet so, after ye have been so long under my teaching?" Had they been but of yesterday in Christ's school, it had been another matter, but to have been for so many months Christ's constant hearers, and yet to be without understanding, was a great reproach to them. Note, Christ expects from us some proportion of knowledge, and grace, and grace, and grace, to the time and means we have had. See John 14. 9. Heb. 5. 12. 2 Tim. 3. 7, 8.

3. The explication Christ gave them of this doctrine of pollutions. Though he chid them for their dullness, he did not cast them off, but pitied them, and taught them, as Luke 24. 25—27. He here shows us,

1. What little danger we are in of pollution from that which entereth at the mouth, v. 17. Asordinate appetite, intemperance, and excess in eating, come out of the heart, and are defiling; but meat in itself is not so, as the Pharisees supposed. What there is of dregs and defilement in our meat, nature (or rather the God of nature) has provided a way to clear us of it; it goes in at the belly, and is cast out into the draught, and nothing remains to us but pure nourishment. So fearfully and wonderfully are we made and preserved and our souls held in life. The expulsive faculty is as necessary in the body as it is in the soul; for the same reason that sin is superfluous, or noxious; so happily is nature enabled to help itself, and shift for its own good: by this means nothing defiles; if we eat with unwashed hands, and so any thing unclean mix with our food, nature will separate it, and cast it out, and it will be no defilement to us. It may be a piece of cleanliness, but it is no point of conscience, to wash before meat; and we may, as the Pharisees supposed, eat with the despised; it is not the practice itself, but the opinion it is built upon, that Christ condemns, as if meat commended us to God; (1 Cor. 8. 8.) whereas christianity stands not in such observances.

(2.) What great danger we are in of pollution from that which proceeds out of the mouth, (v. 18.) out of the abundance of the heart: compare ch. 12. 4. There is no defilement in the products of God's bounty: the defilement arises from the products of our own corruption. Now here we have,

[1.] The corrupt foundation of that which proceeds out of the mouth; it comes from the heart; that is the spring and source of all sin, Jer. 8. 7. It is the heart that is so desperately wicked; (Jer. 17. 9.) for there is no sin in word or deed, which was not first in the heart. This is the root of bitterness. It is the inward part of a sinner, that is very wickedness, Ps. 5. 9. All evil speakings come forth from the heart, and are defiling; from the corrupt heart comes the corrupt communication.

[2.] Some of the corrupt streams which flow from this fountain, specified; though they do not all come out of the mouth, yet they all come out of the man, and are the fruits of that wickedness which is in the heart, and is wrought there, Ps. 58. 2. First, Evil thoughts, sins against all the commandments. Therefore David puts vain thoughts in opposition to the whole law, Ps. 119. 113. These are the first-born of the corrupt nature, the beginning of its strength, and do most resemble it. These, as the son and heir, abide in the house, and lodge within us. There is a great deal of all these things in the heart of man; and it is aggravating to it further. Carnal fancies and imaginations are evil thoughts, wickedness in the contrivance, (διασκεδασίας κακῶν,) wicked plots, purposes, and devices of mischief to others, Mic. 2. 1. Secondly, Murders, sins against the sixth commandment; these come from a malice in the heart against our brother's life, or a contempt of it. Hence he that hates his brother, is said to be a murderer; he is so by his thoughts' bar, 1 John 3. 15. War is in the heart, Ps. 55. 21. James 4. 1. Thirdly, Adulteries and fornications, sins against the seventh commandment; these come from the wanton, unclean, carnal heart; and the lust that reigns there, is conceived there, and brings forth these sins, James 1. 15. There is adultery in the heart first, and then in the act, ch. 5. 26. Fourthly, Covetousness, sins against the eighth commandment, cheats, wrongs, rapines, and all injurious contracts; the fountain of all these is in the heart, that is it that is exercised in these covetous practices, (2 Pet. 2. 14.) that is set upon riches, Ps. 62. 10. Achan coveted, and then took, Joshua 7. 20, 21. Fifthly, False witness, against the ninth commandment; it comes from a complication of falsehood and covetousness, or falsehood and malice in the heart. If truth, holiness, and love, which God requires in the inward parts, reigned as they ought, there would be no false-witness bearing, Ps. 64. 6. Jer. 9. 8.

Sixthly, Phephemes, speaking evil of God, again •
the third commandment; speaking evil of our neighbour, against the ninth commandment; these come from a contempt and disesteem of both in the heart; thence the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost proceeds (ch. 12. 33, 34.) these are the overflows of the gall within.

Now these are the things which defile a man, v. 20. Note, Sin is defiling to the soul, renders it unlovely and abominable in the eyes of the pure and holy God, unfit for communion with him, and for the enjoyment of him in the new Jerusalem, into which nothing shall enter, that defileth, or worketh uncleanness, and these are defiled by sin, and that makes every thing else so, Tit. 1. 15. This defilement by sin, was signified by the ceremonial pollutions which the Jewish doctors added to, but understood not. See Heb. 9. 13, 14. 1 John 1. 7.

These therefore are the things we must carefully avoid, and all approaches toward them, and not lay stress upon the washing of the hands. Christ doth not yet repeal the law of the division of meats, (that was not done till Acts 10.) but the tradition of the elders, which was tacked to that law; and therefore he concludes, To eat with unwashed hands, (which was the matter now in question,) this defileth not a man. If he wash, he is not the better before God; if he wash not, he is not the worse.

21. Then Jesus went thence, and departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. 22. And, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. 23. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us. 24. But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. 25. Then came she and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me! 26. But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs. 27. And she said, Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table. 28. Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour.

We have here that famous story of Christ's casting the devil out of the woman of Canaan's daughter; it has something in it singular and very surprising, and which looks favourably upon the poor Gentiles, and is an earnest of that mercy which Christ here showed, as a gleam of that light which was to lighten the Gentiles. 26. 22. Christ came to his own, and his own received him not; but many of them were grieved with him, and were offended in him; and observe what follows, v. 21. 1. Jesus went thence. Note, Justly is the light taken from those that either play by it, or rebel against it. When Christ and his disciples could not be quiet among them, he left them, and so left an example to his own people, (ch. 10. 14.) Shake off the dust of your feet. Though Christ endure long, he will not always endure the contradiction of sinners against himself. He had said, (v. 14.) Let them alone, and he did so. Note, Wifflul prejudices against the gospel, and cavils at it, often provoke Christ to withdraw, and to remove the candlestick out of its place, Acts 15. 43, 51.

11. When he went thence, he departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon; not to those cities, (they were excluded from any share in Christ's mighty works, ch. 11. 21, 22.) but into that part of the land of Israel which lay that way: thither he went, as Elisha to Saragita, a city of Sidon; (Luke 4. 23.) thither he went to look after this poor woman, whom he had mercy in reserve for. While he went about doing good, he was never out of his way. The work of the kingdom of God is so large, that he that seeketh shall find; shall have their share of his benign influences; and as now the ends of the earth, so afterward the ends of the earth, shall see his salvation, Isa. 49. 6. Here it was, that this miracle was wrought, in the story of which we may observe,

1. The address of the woman of Canaan to Christ, v. 22. She was a Gentile, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel; probably none but those accursed nations that were devoted by that word, Cursed be Canaan. Note, The doom of political bodies doth not always reach every individual member of them. God will have his remnant out of all nations, chosen vessels in all coasts, even the most unlikely; she came out of the same coasts. If Christ had not now made a visit to these coasts, though the mercy was worth travelling far for, it is probable that there might have been none to be moved by him. It is often an excitement too dormant faith and zeal, to have opportunities of acquaintance with Christ brought to our doors, to have the word nigh us.

Her address was very important, she cried to Christ, as one in earnest; cried, as being at some distance from him, not daring to approach too near, being a Canaanite, lest she should give offence. In her address,

(1.) She relates her misery: My daughter is grievously vexed with a devil, xxxi. 21, 22. She is ill-bewitched, or possessed. There were degrees of that misery, and this was the worst sort. It was a common case at that time, and very calamitous. Note, The vexations of children are the trouble of parents, and nothing should be more so than their being under the power of Satan. Tender parents very sensibly feel the miseries of these that are pieces of themselves, which are vexed with the devil, yet she is my daughter still. The greatest afflictions of our relations do not dissolve our obligations to them, and therefore ought not to alienate our affections from them. It was the distress and trouble of her family, that now brought her to Christ; she came to him, not for teaching, but for healing; yet, because she came in faith, he did not reject her. Though it is need that all be received and considered, she shall not therefore be driven from him. It was the affliction of her daughter that gave her this occasion of applying to Christ. It is good to make the afflictions of others our own, in sense and sympathy, that we may make them our own, in improvement and advantage.

(2.) She requests for mercy: Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David. In calling him Lord, she calls him, Son of David; that is the great thing which faith should fasten upon, and fetch comfort from. From the Lord we may expect acts of power, he can command deliverances; from the Son of David we may expect all the mercy and grace which were foretold concerning him. Though a Gentile, she owns the promise made to the fathers of the Jews, and the honour of the house of David. The Gentiles must receive christianity, not as an improvement of natural religion, but as the perfection of the Jewish religion, with an eye to the Old Testament.

Her petition is, Have mercy on me. She doth not limit Christ to this or that particular instance of mercy, but mercy, mercy is the thing she begs; she pleads not merely, but depends upon mercy;

Have mercy upon me. Mercies to the children are mercies to the parents; favours to ours are favours to us, and are so to be accounted. Note, It is the duty of parents always to intercede for their children, and to beseech and pray for them, especially for their souls; "I have a son, a daughter, grievously vexed with a proud will, an unclean devil, a malicious devil, led captive by his will; Lord, help them." This is a case more deplorable than that of a bodily possession. Bring them to Christ by faith and prayer, who alone is able to heal them. Parents should look upon it as a great mercy to the souls of their children, to have their power broken in the souls of their children.

2. The discouragements she met with in this address: in all the story of Christ's ministry we do not meet with the like. He was wont to countenance and encourage all that came to him, and either to answer before they called, or to hear while they were yet speaking; but here was one otherwise treated; and what could be the reason of it? (1.) Some think that Christ showed himself backward to gratify this poor woman, because he would not give offence to the Jews, by being as free and as forward in his favour to the Gentiles as to them. He had bid his disciples not go into the way of the Gentiles, (ch. 10. 5.) and therefore would not himself seem so inculcable to them as to others, but rather more shy. Or rather, it may be thought, he was so moved by her heart; he knows what is in the heart, knew the strength of her faith, and how well able she was, by his grace, to break through such discouragements; he therefore met her with them, that the trial of her faith might be found unto praise, and honour, and glory, 1 Pet. 1. 5, 7. This was like God's tempted Abraham, (Gen. 22. 1.) like the angel's wrestling with Jacob, (Gen. 32. 24.) Many of the methods of Christ's providence, and especially of his grace, in dealing with his people, which are dark and perplexing, may be explained with the key of this story, which is for that end left upon record, to teach us that there may be love in Christ's heart while there are frowns in his face, and to encourage us, therefore, though he stay us, yet he trust in him.

Observe the particular discouragements given her:

[1.] When she cried after him, he answered him not a word, v. 23. His ear was wont to be always open and attentive to the cries of poor suppliants, and his lips, which dropped as the honey-comb, always ready to give an answer of peace; but to this poor woman he turned a deaf ear, and she could give neither an alms nor an answer. It was a wonder that she did not fly off in a fret, and say, "Is this he that is so famed for clemency and tenderness? Have so many been heard and answered by him, as they talk, and must I be the first rejected sinner? Why so distant to me, if it be true that he hath stooped to so many?" But Christ knew what he did, and therefore did not answer, that she might be the better prepared to see, when he should appear to her, whether she had a true heart, or whether he made the most of it, and was pleased with her, and strengthened her with strength in her soul to prosecute her request, (Ps. 138. 3. Job 23. 6.) though he did not immediately give her the answer she expected. By seeming to draw away the desired mercy from her, he drew her on to be so much the more importunate for it.

Note, Every accepted prayer is not immediately an answered prayer. Sometimes (He heard her heart,) he seems not to regard his people's prayers, like a man asleep or astonished, (Ps. 44. 23. Jer. 14. 9. Ps. 22. 1, 2.) nay, to be angry at them; (Ps. 80. 4. Lam. 3. 8, 44.) but it is to prove, and so to improve, their faith, and to make his after-appearances for them more glorious to himself, and the more welcome to them; for the vision, at the end, shall speak, and shall not lie, Hab. 2. 3. See Job 35. 14.

But Christ was more careful, that the disciples interposed on her behalf; they said, Send her away, for she crieth after us. It is desirable to have an interest in the prayers of good people, and we should be desirous of it. Yet the disciples, though wishing she might have what she came for, yet therein consulted rather their own ease than the poor woman's satisfaction; "Send her away with a cure, for she crieth, and with good earnest; she crieth after us, and is troublesome to us, and shames us." Continued importunity sometimes be uneasy to men, even to good men; but Christ loves to be cried after.

Secondly, Christ's answer to the disciples quite dashed her expectations; "I am not sent, but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel;" you know I am not, she is none of them, and would you have me go beyond my commission?" Importunity seldom conquers the settled reason of a wise man; and those refusals are most silencing, which are so backed. He doth not only answer her, but he argues against her, and stops her mouth with a reason. It is true, she is a lost sheep, and hath as much need of his care as any, but she is not of the house of Israel, to whom he was first sent, (Acts 5. 26.) and therefore, while he was not interested in the case of the Gentiles (which most of those who would have occasioned our question whether we be of those to whom Christ was sent, But, blessed be God, no room is left for that doubt; the distinction between Jew and Gentile is taken away; we are sure that he gave his life a ransom for many, and if for many, why not for me?" But, blessed be God, no room is left for that doubt; the distinction between Jew and Gentile is taken away; we are sure that he gave his life a ransom for many, and if for many, why not for me?" But, blessed be God, no room is left for that doubt; the distinction between Jew and Gentile is taken away; we are sure that he gave his life a ransom for many, and if for many, why not for me?"

Thirdly, When she continued her importunity, he insisted upon the importunity of the thing, and gave her a most strong, and, are they not upon the same level with that rain from heaven, and those fruitful seasons, which God gave to the nations whom he suffered to walk in their own ways; (Acts 14. 16, 17.) no, these were peculiar favours, appropriated to the peculiar people, the garden inclosed. Christ preached to the Samaritans, (John 4. 41.) but we read not of any cures he wrought among them; that salvation was of the Jews; (John 4. 42.) and no more of those times, which were called doves, and, in comparison with the house of Israel, who were so dignified and privileged. Christ here seems to allow it, and therefore thinks it not meet that the Gentiles should share in the favours bestowed on the Jews. But see how the tables are turned; after the bringing of the Gentiles into the camp of the children of Israel, the Decree for the law are called doves, Phil. 3. 2.

Now this Christ urgeth against this woman of Canaan; "How can she expect to eat of the children's bread, who is not of the family?" Note, Those whom Christ intends most signally to honour, he first humbles and lays low in a sense of their own meanness and unworthiness. We must first see ourselves to be as dogs, less than the least of all God's creation, and then humbly conciliatory, and not offended with them. 2. Christ delights to express great faith with great trials, and sometimes reserves the sharpest for the last, that, being tried, we may come forth like gold. This general rule is applicable to other cases for direction, though here used only for trial. Special ordinances and church-privileges are children's bread, and must not be prostituted to the grossly ignorant and profane. Christ, thus true to all, but spiritual dignities are appropriated to the household of faith; and therefore promiscuous admission to them, without distinction, wastes the children's bread, and is the giving of that which is holy to the dogs, ch. 7. 6. Procul hone, procul inde, profani—Off, ye profane.

3. Here is the strength of her faith and resolution, in breaking through all these discouragements. Many a one, thus tried, would either sink down into silence, or broken out into passion. "Here is cold comfort," might she have said, "for a poor distressed creature; as good for me to have staid at home, as come hither to be taunted at and abused at this rate; not only to have a pitious case slighted, but to be called a dog!" A proud, unheated heart would not have borne it. The reputation of the house of Israel was not now so great in the world, but Christ might manifest a partial regard to the people of Israel. It is not within the power of being retorted, had the poor woman been so minded. It might have occasioned a reflection upon Christ, and might have been a blemish upon his reputation, as well as a shock to the good opinion she had entertained of him; for we are apt to judge of persons as we ourselves find them; and think that they are what they are to us. "Is this the son of David?" (might she have said.) Is this he that should reign? Does he not pity that poor slighted creature? I am sure I have no reason to give him that character, for I was never treated so roughly in my life; he might have done as much for me as for others; or, if not, he needed not to have set me with the dogs of his flock. I am not a dog, I am a woman, and an honest woman, and a woman in misery; and I am sure it is not meet to call me dog."

No, here is not a word of this. Note, A humble, meek, and womanly spirit ever remains the same, and takes every thing in good part, that he saith and doeth, and puts the best construction upon it. She breaks through all these discouragements,

1. With a holy earnestness of desire in prosecuting her petition. This appeared upon the former refusal; (v. 23.) Then came she, and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me. [1.] She continued to pray. What Christ said, silenced the disciples; but hear no more of them, they took the answer but the woman did not. Note, The more sensibly we feel the burden, the more resolutely we should pray for the removal of it. And it is the will of God, that we should continue instant in prayer, should always pray, and not faint. [2.] She improved in prayer. Instead of blaming Christ, or charging him with unkindness, she seems rather to suspect herself, and lay the fault upon herself. She fears lest, in her first address, she had not been humble and reverent enough, and therefore now she comes, and worshipped him, and paid him more respect than she had done; or she fears that she had not been earnest enough, and therefore now she cries, Lord, help me. Note, When the answers of prayer are deferred, God is thereby teaching us to pray more, and pray better. It is then time to inquire wherein we have gone amiss, and wherein we have been amiss may be amended for the future. Disappointments in the success of prayer, must be ex- clinations to do the duty of prayer. Christ, in his agency, prayed more earnestly. [3.] She waives the question, whether she was of those to whom Christ was sent or no; she will not argue that with him, though partly upon his own ground. One, that has been ex- cluded to the house of Israel; but, "Whether an Is- raelite or no, I come to the Son of David for mercy, and I will not let him go, except he bless me." Many weak Christians perplex themselves with questions and doubts about their election, whether they are of the house of Israel or no; such had better mind their errand to God, and continue instant in prayer for mercy and grace; throw themselves by faith at the feet of Christ. Be not shy, If Christ will have me here; and then that matter will by degrees clear itself. If we cannot reason down our unbelief, let us pray it down. A fervent, affectionate Lord, help me, will help us over many of the discouragements which are sometimes ready to bear us down and overwhelm us. [4.] Her prayer is very short, but comprehensive and fervent; Lord, help me. Take care not to be as many are here, and commencing her case: "If the Messiah may be sent only to the house of Israel, the Lord help me, what will become of me and mine." Note, It is not in vain for broken hearts to beseech themselves; God looks upon them then, Jer. 31. 18. Or, Secondly, As begging grace to assist her in this hour of temptation. She found it hard to keep up her faith when it was thus frowned upon, and therefore prays, "Lord, help me; Lord, strengthen my faith." It is by degrees to Lord, let thy right hand uphold me, while my sail is following hard after thee," Ps. 63. 8. Or, Thirdly, As enforcing her original request; "Lord, help me; Lord, give me what I come for." She believed that Christ could and would help her, though she was not of the house of Israel; else she would have dropped her petition. Still she keeps up good thoughts of Christ, and will not quit her hold. Lord, help me, is a good prayer, if well put up; and such as Be not shamed to be thus, but prevail, and obtain all that is needed of Christ. "Lord, help me," and that we should take God's name in vain in it.

2. With a holy skillfulness of faith, suggesting a very surprising plea. Christ had placed the Jews with the children, as little-plants round about God's table, and had put the Gentiles with the dogs, under the table; and she doth not deny the aptness of the similitude. Note, There is nothing but contradicting any word of Christ, though it bear ever so justly, that will remove the displeasure of God, and is not object against it, resolves to make the best of it; (v. 27.) Truth, Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs. Now here,

[1.] Her acknowledgment was very humble: Truth, Lord. Note, You cannot speak so meanly and slightly of a humble believer, but he is ready to speak as meanly and slightly of himself. Some that seem to dispraise and disparage themselves, will yet take it as an affront if others do so too; but one that is humbled aright, will subscribe to the most abusing challenges, and not call them abusing ones. "Truth, Lord; I cannot deny it; I am a dog, and have no right to the children's bread." David, Thou hast done foolishly, very foolishly: Truth, Lord, Asaph, Thou hast been as a beast before God: Truth, Lord, Agur, Thou art more brutish than any man: Truth, Lord. Paul, Thou hast been the chief of sinners, art less than the least of saints, not meet to be called an apostle: Truth, Lord.

[2.] Her improvement of this into a plea was very ingenious: Yet the dogs eat of the crumbs. It was by a singular acumen, and spiritual quickness and sagacity, that she discerned matter of argument in that which looked like a slight. Note, A lively, active faith will make that to be us, which seems to be against us. But, as it is in a man's own interest, so in the interest of the cause, and sweetness out of the strong. Unbelief is apt to mistake recruits for enemies, and to draw dismal conclusions even from comfortable promises; (Judges 13. 22, 23,) but faith can find encouragement even in that which is discouraging, and get nearer to God by taking hold on that hand which is stretched out to push it away. So good a thing it is to be of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, Isa. 11. 3.

Her plea is, Yet the dogs eat of the crumbs. It is true, the full and regular provision is intended for the children only, but the small casual, neglected crumbs are allowed to the dogs, and are not grudged the dogs under the table, that attend there expecting the rest. Gentiles cannot expect the special ministry and miracles of the Son of David, that belongs to the Jews: but they begin now to be weary of their meat, and to play with it, they find fault with it, and curmudge it away; surely then some of the broken meat may fall to a poor Gentile; "I beg a cure by the, which is but as a crumb, though of the same precious bread, yet but a small inconsiderable piece, prepared of the loaves which they have." Note, When we are ready to surfeit on the children's bread, we should remember how many there are, that would be glad of the crumbs. Our broken meat in spiritual privileges, would be a feast to many a soul; Acts 13. 42. Observe here, First. Her humility and necessity made her glad of crumbs. Those who are conscious to themselves that they deserve nothing, will be thankful for any thing; and then we are prepared for the greatest of God's mercies, when we see ourselves less than the least of them. The least of Christ is precious to a believer, and the very crumbs of the bread of life.

Secondly. Her faith encouraged her to expect these crumbs. Why should it not be at Christ's table as at a great ban's, where the dogs are fed as sure as the children? Observe, She calls it their master's table; if she were a dog, she was his dog, and it cannot be ill with us, if we stand but in the meanest relation to Christ; "Though unworthy to be called children, yet make me as one of the hired servants; nay, rather let me be set with the dogs than turned out of the house; for in my Father's house there is not only bread enough, but to spare," Luke 15. 17, 19. It is good lying in God's house, though we lie at the threshold there.

4. The happy issue and success of all this. She came off with credit and comfort from this struggle; and, though a Canaanitish, approved herself a true daughter of Israel, who, like a prince, had power with God, and prevailed. Hitherto Christ hid his face from her, but now he reveals his heart in everlasting kindness, v. 27. Then Jesus answered and said, A woman here is thy faith. This was like Joseph's making himself known to his brethren, I am Joseph: so here, in effect, I am Jesus. Now he begins to speak like himself, and put on his own countenance. He will not contend for ever.

(1.) He commended her faith. A woman, great is thy faith. Observe, [1.] It is her faith that he commends. Then were there many gracefull other graces, and all other grace shone bright in her conduct of this affair—wisdom, humility, meekness, patience, perseverance in prayer; but these were the product of her faith, and therefore Christ fastens upon that as most commendable; because all graces faith honours Christ most, therefore of all graces Christ honours faith most. [2.] It is the greatness of her faith. Note, Faith, This is the faith of all the world; it is acknowledged, yet it is not in all alike strong; all believers are not of the same size and stature. Secondly. The greatness of faith consists much in a resolute adherence to Jesus Christ as an all-sufficient Saviour, even in the face of discouragements; to love him, and trust him, as a Friend, even then when he seems to come forth against us as an Enemy. This is great faith! Thirdly. Though weak compared with the, if true, shall not be rejected, yet great faith shall be commended, and shall appear greatly well pleasing to Christ; for in them that thus believe he is most admired. Thus Christ commended the faith of the centurion, and he was a Gentile too: he had a strong faith in the power of Christ, this woman in the good will of Christ: both were acceptable.

(2.) He cured her daughter; "Be it unto thee even as thou wilt: I can deny thee nothing, take what thou canst for." Note, Great believers may have what they will, for all the asking. When our will conforms to the will of Christ's precept, his will concurs with the will of our desire. Those that will deny Christ nothing, shall find that he will deny them nothing at last, though for a time he seems to hide his face from them. "Thou wouldst have the sins pardoned, thy corruptions mortified, thy nature sanctified; be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And what canst thou desire more?" When we come, this poor woman did, to pray against Satan and his kingdom, we concur with the intercession of Christ, and it shall be accordingly. Though Satan may sift Peter, and buffet Paul, yet, through Christ's prayer and the sufficiency of his grace, we shall be more than conquerors, Luke 22. 31, 32. 2 Cor. 12. 7, 9. Rom. 16. 20.

The event was answerable to the word of Christ. Her daughter was made whole from that very hour, from thenceforward was never vexed with the devil any more; the mother's faith prevailed for the daughter's cure. Though the patient was at a distance, that was no hinderance to the efficacy of Christ's word. He spake, and it was done.

29. And Jesus departed thence, and came nigh unto the sea of Galilee: and went up into a mountain, and sat down there. 30. And great multitudes came unto him, having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and cast them down at Jesus' feet; and he healed them: 31. Insomuch that the multitude wondered, when they saw the dumb to speak, the maimed to be whole, the lame to walk, and the blind to see: and they glorified the God of Israel. 32. Then Jesus called his disciples unto him, and said, I have compassion on the multitude, because they continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat: and I will not send them away fasting, lest they faint in the way. 33. And his disciples say unto him, Whence should we have so much bread in the wilderness, as to fill so great a multitude? 34. And Jesus saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven, and a few little fishes. 35. And he commanded the multitude to sit down on the ground. 36. And he took the seven loaves and the fishes, and gave thanks, and brake them, and gave to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude. 37. And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left, seven baskets full. 38. And they that did eat were four thousand men, besides women and children. 39. And he sent away the multitude, and took ship, and came into the coasts of Magdala.
sent his word, and healed them. Note. All diseases are at the command of Christ, to go and come as he bids them. This is an instance of Christ's power and goodness, which may comfort us in all our weaknesses; and of his pity, which may comfort us in all our miseries. 3. The influence that this had upon the people, v. 31.

(1.) They wondered, and well they might. Christ's works should be our wonder. It is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous, Ps. 118. 23. The spiritual cures that Christ works, are wonderful. When blind souls are made to see by faith, the dumb to speak in prayer, the lame to walk in holy obedience, it is to be wondered at. Sing unto the Lord a new song, for thus he has done marvelous things.

(2.) They glorified the God of Israel, whom the Pharisees, when they saw these things, blasphemed. Miracles, which are the matters of our wonder, must be the matter of our praise; and mercies, which are matter of our rejoicing, must be the matter of our thanksgiving. Those that were healed, glorified God; if he heal our diseases, all that is within us must bless his holy name; and we have reason to be grateful to God.

II. Here is a particular account of his feeding four thousand men with seven loaves, and a few little fishes, as he had lately fed five thousand with five loaves. The guests indeed were now not quite so many as then, and the provision a little more, which does not intitle that Christ's arm was shortened, but that he wrought his miracles as the occasion required, and not for ostentation, and therefore he suited them to the occasion: both then and now he took as many as were to be fed, and made use of all that was at hand to feed them with. When once the utmost powers of nature are exceeded, we must say, This is the finger of God; and it is neither here nor there how far they are outdone; so that this is no less a miracle than the other. For it is not the number of the loaves that here is, 1. Christ's pity; (v. 52.) I have compassion on the multitude. He tells his disciples this, both to try and to excite their compassion. When he was about to work this miracle, he called them to him, and made them acquainted with his purpose, and conversed with them about it, not because he needed their advice, but because he would give an instance of his compassion, and he called them at first to signify to them that it was a miracle which was peculiar, for the servant knows not what his Lord doth, but treated them as friends and counsellors. Shall I hide from Abraham the thing that I do? Gen. 18. 17. In what he said to them, observe,

(1.) The case of the multitude; They continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat. This is an instance of their zeal, and the strength of their affection to Christ, and the power he has over them. He left them not, but continued with them, to attend upon them on weekdays, but underwent a deal of hardship, to continue with him; they wanted their natural rest, and, for that appeared lay like soldiers in the field; they wanted necessary food, and had scarcely enough to keep life and soul together. In those hotter countries they could better bear long fasting than we can in those colder climates; but though it could not but be grievous to the body, and might endanger their health, yet the zeal of God's house thrust them up, and they esteemed the words of Christ more than their necessary food. We think three hours too much to attend upon public ordinances; but these people stayed together three days, and yet suffered not at it, nor said, Behold, what a seriousness is it! Observe, With what tenderness Christ spake of it; I have compassion on them. It had become to them to have compassion on him, who took so much for them. What should we have bread? Christ asked, How many loaves have ye? Note, When we cannot have what we would, we must make the best of what we have, and do good with it as far as it will go: we must not think so much of our wants as of our havings. Christ herein went according to the rule he gave to Martha, not to be troubled about many things, norumbered about much serving. Nature is content with little, grace with less, but last with nothing.

[2.] How his power was discovered to the multitude, in the plentiful provision he made for them; the manner of which is much the same as before, ch. 14. 18, &c. Observe here,

First, The provision that was at hand; seven loaves, and a few little fishes: the fish not proportionable to the bread, for bread is the staff of life. It is probable that the fish was as such as they had themselves taken; for they were fishes, and were now near the sea. Note, It is comfortable to eat the labour of our hands, (Ps. 128. 2) and to enjoy that which is any way the product of our own industry, Prov. 12. 27. And what we have got by God's blessing on our labour we should be free of; for therefore we must labour, that we may have to give, Ps. 22. 29.

Secondly, The putting of the people in a posture to receive it; (v. 35.) He commanded the multitude to sit down on the ground. They saw but very little provision, yet they must sit down, in faith that they should have a meal's meat out of it. They who would have spiritual food from Christ, must sit down at his feet, to hear his word, and expect it to come in an unseen way.

Thirdly, The distributing of the provision among them. He first gave thanks.—Grasirize. The word used in the former miracle was εὐδοκίαν—be blessed. It comes all to one; giving thanks to God is a proper way of craving a blessing from God. And when we come to ask and receive further mercy, we ought to give thanks for the mercies we have received. He then brake the loaves, (for it was in distributing the bread, that Christ first multiplieth, and sent it to his disciples, and to the multitude. Though the disciples had distrusted Christ's power, yet he made use of them now as before; he is not provoked, as he might be, by the weaknesses and infirmities of his ministers, to lay them aside; but still he gives to them, and they to his people, of the word of life.

Fourthly, The plenty there was among them; (v. 37.) They did all eat, and were filled. Note, Those whom Christ feeds, he fills. While we labour for the world, we labour for that which satisfieth not; (Isa. 55. 2) but those that duly wait on Christ shall be abundantly satisfied with the goodness of his house, Ps. 63. 4. Christ thus fed people once and again, to intimate that though he was called Jesus of Nazareth, yet he was of Bethlehem, the breed of David; or rather, that he was himself the breed of life.

To show that they had all enough, there was a great deal left—seven baskets full of broken meat; not so much as there was before, because they did not gather after so many eaters, but enough to show that with Christ there is bread enough, and to share; supplies of grace for more than seek it, and for those that seek more.
St. Matthew, XVI.

Fifthly, The account taken of the guests; not that they might pay their share, (here was no reckoning to be discharged, they were fed gratis,) but that they might be witnesses to the power and goodness of Christ, and that this might be some resemblance of that universal providence that gives food to all flesh, Ps. 104. 16. Here were four thousand men fed; but what were they to that great family which is provided for by the divine care every day? God is a great Housekeeper, on whom the eyes of all the creatures wait, and he giveth them their food in due season, Ps. 104. 27—145. 15.

Lastly, The dismissal of the multitude, and Christ’s departure to another place; (v. 39.) He sent away the people. Though he had fed them twice, they must not expect miracles to be their daily bread. Let them now go home to their callings, and to their own tables. And he himself departed by ship to another place: for, being the Light of the world, he must be still in motion, and go about to do good.

Chap. XVI.

None of Christ’s miracles are recorded in this chapter, but four of his discourses. Here is, 1. A conference with the Pharisees, who challenged him to show them a sign from heaven, v. 1. 4. 2. Another with his disciples about the least of them, v. 5. 12. 3. Another with them concerning himself, as the Christ, and concerning his church built upon him, v. 13. 20. 4. Another concerning his sufferings for them, and theirs for him, v. 21. 28. And all these are written for our learning.

1. The Pharisees also with the Sadducees came, and tempting, desired him that he would shew them a sign from heaven. 2. He answered and said unto them, When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather; for the sky is red: 3. And in the morning, It will be foul weather to day; for the sky is red and lowering. O ye hypocrites! ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times? 4. A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given unto it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas. And he left them, and departed.

We have here Christ’s discourse with the Pharisees and Sadducees, men at variance among themselves, as appears, Acts 23. 7, 8. and yet unanimous in their opposition to Christ; because his doctrine did equally overthrow the errors and heresies of the Sadducees, who denied the existence of spirits and a future state; and the pride, tyranny, and hypocrisy of the Pharisees, who were the great imposing of the traditions of the elders. Christ and Christianity meet with opposition on all hands.

I. Their demand, and the design of it.

1. The demand was of a sign from heaven; this they desired him to show them; pretending they were very willing to be satisfied and convinced, when really they were far from being so, but sought excuses for an obstinate infidelity. That which they pretended to desire, was,

(1.) Some other sign than what they had yet had. They had great plenty of signs; every miracle Christ wrought was a sign, for no man could do what he did unless God were with him. But this will not serve, they must have a sign of their own choosing; they despised those signs which relieved the necessity of the sick and sorrowful, and insisted upon some signs which would gratify the curiosity of the proud. It is fit that the proofs of divine revelation should be chosen by the wisdom of God, not by the follies and fancies of men. The evidence that is given, is sufficient to satisfy an unprejudiced understanding, but was not intended to please a vain humour. And it is an instance of the deceitfulness of the heart, to think that we should be wrought upon by the means and advantages which we have not, while we slight those which we have. If we hear not Moses and the prophets, neither would we be wrought upon though one rose from the dead.

(2.) It must be a sign from heaven, They would have such miracles to prove his commission, as were wrought at the giving of the law upon mount Sinai; thunder, and lightning, and the voice of words, were the sign from heaven they required. Whereas the sensible signs and terrible ones were not agreeable to the spiritual and comfortable dispensation of the gospel. Now the word comes more nigh us, (Rom. 10. 8.) and therefore the miracles do so, and do not oblige us to keep such a distance as these did, Heb. 12. 18.

2. The design was, to tempt him; not to be taught by him, but to ensure him. If he should show them a sign from heaven, they would attribute it to a confederacy with the prince of the power of the air; if he should shew no such sign, they would have that to say for themselves, why they did not believe on him. They now tempted Christ as Israel did. 1 Cor. 10. 9. and observe their perverseness; then, when they had signs from heaven, they tempted Christ, saying, Can he furnish a table in the wilderness? Now that he had furnished a table in the wilderness, they tempted him, saying, Can he give us a sign from heaven? If he be wise in his own counsell, he answered these fools according to their folly, Prov. 26. 5. In his answer,

1. He condemns their overlooking of the signs they had, v. 2. 3. They were seeking for the signs of the kingdom of God, when it was already among them. The Lord was in this place, and they knew it not. Thus their unbelieving ancestors, when miracles were their daily bread, asked, Is the Lord among us, or is he not?

To expose this, he observes to them,

(1.) Their skillfulness and sagacity in other things, particularly in natural prognostications of the weather; “You know that a red sky over night is a presage of fair weather, and a red sky in the morning, of foul weather. There are common rules drawn from observation and experience, by which it is easy to foretell very probably what weather it will be. When these causes have begun to work, we may easily guess at their issue, so uniform is nature in its motions, and so consistent with itself. We know not the balancings of the clouds, (Job 37. 16.) but we may spell something from the faces of them. This gives no countenance at all to the wild and ridiculous predictions of the astrologers, the star-gazers, and the monthly prognosticators, (Isa. 47. 13.) concerning the weather long before, and which foolish people are imposed upon; we are sure, in general, that seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, shall not cease. But as to the particulars, till, by the weather-glasses, or otherwise, we perceive the immediate signs and harbingers of the change of weather, it is not for us to know, no, not that concerning the times and seasons. Let it suffice, that it shall be what weather pleases God; and that which pleases God, should not displease us.

(2.) Their sottishness and stupidity in the concerns of their souls; Can ye not discern the signs of the times?

[1.] “Do you not see that the Messiah is come?” The sceptre was departed from Judah, Daniel's weeks were just expiring, and yet they regarded not. The miracles Christ wrought, and the gathering of the people to him, were plain indications that the King of grace was at hand; that this was the day of their visitation. Note, First, There are signs of the times, by which wise and upright men are enabled to make moral prognostications, and so far to understand the motions and methods of Providence, as from thence to take their measures, and to know what Israel ought to do, as the men of Israel, as the physician from some certain symptoms finds the disease, ch. 4. 12. Second, There are marks who are skilful enough in other things, and yet cannot or will not discern the day of their opportunities, are not aware of the wind when it is fair for them, and so let slip the gale. See Jer. 8. 7.

12. Against them. Here, we will slight the signs of God's ordaining, to seek for signs of our own prescribing.

[2.] Do not yourselves see your own ruin coming for rejecting him? You will not entertain the gospel of peace, and can you not evidently discern that hereby you pull an inevitable destruction upon your own heads? Note, It is the undoing of multitudes, that they are not aware what will be the end of their refusing Christ.

2. He refuses to give them any other sign, (v. 4.) as he had done before in the same words, ch. 12. 38. Those that persist in the same iniquities, must expect to meet with the same reproofs. Here, as there, (1.) He calls them an adulterous generation; because, while they professed themselves of the true church and spouse of God, they treacherously departed from him, and brake their covenants with him. The Pharisees were a generation pure in their own eyes, having the way of the adulterous woman, that thinks she has done no wickedness, Prov. 30. 20. 21. But, alas! Will they ever prove this to be true? They will not be prescribed to; we ask, and have not, because we ask amiss. (3.) He refers them to the sign of the prophet Jonas, which should yet be given them; his resurrection from the dead, and his preaching by his apostles to the Gentiles; these were reserved for the last and highest evidences of his divine mission. Note, Though the fancies of profane men may be heard, and their law broken, the humble shall be supported, and the unbelief of them that perish, left for ever inexusable, and every mouth shall be stopped.

This discourse broke off abruptly; he left them, and departed. Christ will not tarry long with those that tempt him, but justly withdraws from those that are disposed to quarrel with him. He left them as irreclaimable; Let them alone. He left them to themselves, let them in the hand of their own counsels; so he gave them up to their own hearts' lusts.

5. And when his disciples were come to the other side, they had forgotten to take bread. 6. Then Jesus said unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees. 7. And they reasoned among themselves, saying, It is because we have taken no bread. 8. Which when Jesus perceived, he said unto them, O ye of little faith, why reason ye among yourselves, because ye have brought no bread? 9. Do ye not yet understand, neither remember the five loaves of the five thousand, and how many baskets ye took up? 10. Neither the seven loaves of the four thousand, and how many baskets ye took up? 11. How is it that ye do not understand that I spake it not to you concerning bread, that ye should beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees? 12. Then understood they how that he bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees.

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples concerning bread, in which, as in many other discourses, he speaks to them of spiritual things under a similitude, and they misunderstand him of carnal things. The occasion of it was, their forgetting to victual their ship, and to take along with them provisions for their family on the other side the water; usually they carried bread along with them, because they were sometimes in desert places; and when they were not, yet this would not be burdensome. But now they forgot; we will hope it was because their minds and memories were filled with better things. Note, Christ's disciples are often such as have no great forecast for the world.

I. Here is the caution Christ gave them, to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees. He had now been discoursing with the Pharisees and Sadducees, and saw them to be men of such a spirit, that they never turned away from his discourse, but did nothing to do with them. Disciples are in most danger from hypocrites, against those that are openly vicious they stand upon their guard, but against Pharisees, who are great pretenders to devotion, and Sadducees, who pretend to a free and impartial search after truth, they commonly lie unguarded: and therefore the caution is doubled, Take heed, and beware. The current principles and prejudices of the Pharisees and Sadducees are compared to leaven; they were souring, and swelling, and spreading, like leaven; they fermented wherever they came.

II. Their mistake concerning this caution, v. 7. They thought Christ hereby upbraided them with their improvidence and forgetfulness, that they were so busy attending to his discourse with the Pharisees, that therefore they forgot the necessary things of their own concerns. Christ himself did eat with them, (Prov. 23. 6.) whereas the danger was not in their bread, (Christ himself did eat with them, Luke 7. 36.—14. 1.—11. 37.) but in their principles.

III. The reproof Christ gave them for this.

1. He reproves their distrust of his ability and readiness to supply them in this strait; (v. 8.) O ye of little faith, why are ye in such perplexity, because ye have taken no bread? that ye can mind nothing else, that ye think your Master is as full of it as you, and apply every thing he saith to that? He does not chide them for their little forecast, as they expected he would. Note, Parents and masters must not be angry at the forgetfulness of their children and servants, more than is necessary to make them take more heed another time; we are all apt to be forgetful of our duties, we should serve to Peradventure it was an oversight. See how easily Christ forgave his disciples' carelessness, though it was in such a material point as taking bread; and do likewise. But that which he chides them for, is, their little faith.

which we have thus digged for, and have been out for some mistakes. Though Christ did not the leave of the Pharisees and Sadducees, he meant their doctrine and way, which were corrupt and vicious, but, as they managed them, very apt to insi-nulate themselves into the minds of men like heaven, Mediator. He is made known, in Daniel's vision, as the Son of man, Dan. 7. 13. I am the Messiah, that Son of man that was foretold. But

2. Here, and what people's sentiments were concerning him: "Whom do men say that I am? The Son of man?" (So I think it might better be read.) "Do they own me for the Messiah?" He asks, not, "Who do the Scribes and Pharisees say that I am?" They were prejudiced against him, and said that he was a deceiver and in league with Satan; but, "But, if men, and what I am?" He referred to the common people, whom the Pharisees desired to be long from. Christ asked this question, not as one that knew not; for if he knows what men think, much more what they say; nor as one desirous to hear his own praises, but to make the disciples solicitous concerning the success of their preaching, by showing that he himself was so. The common people conversed more familiarly with the disciples than they did with their Master, and therefore from them he might better know what they said. Christ had not plainly said who he was, but left people to infer it from his works, John 10. 24, 25. Now he would know what inferences the people drew from them, and from the miracles which his apostles wrought in his name.
3. To this question the disciples gave him an answer; (ver. 14.) Some say, thou art John the Baptist, &c. Others, he is a prophet, as that said, that he was the true prophet. The disciples, however, do not mention that opinion, but only such opinions as were wide of the truth, which they had gathered up from their countrymen. Observe,
(1.) They are different opinions; some say one thing; and others another. Truth is one; but those who vary from that commonly vary one from another. Thus Christ came eventually to split division, Luke 12. 51. Being so noted a person, every one would be ready to pass his verdict upon him, and, "Many men, many minds:" those that were not willing to own him to be the Christ, wandered in endless mazes, and followed the chase of every uncertain guess and wild hypothesis.
(2.) They are honourable opinions, and bespeak the respect they had for him, according to the best of their judgment. These were not the sentiments of his enemies, but the sober thoughts of those that followed him with love and wonder. Note, It is possible for men to have good thoughts of Christ, and yet not right ones, a high opinion of him, and yet not high enough.
They suppose him to be one risen from the dead; which perhaps arose from a confused notion they had of the resurrection of the Messiah, before his public preaching, as of Jonas. Or their notions arose from an excessive value for antiquity; as if it were not possible for an excellent man to be produced in their own age, but it must be one of the ancients returned to life again.
(4.) They are all false opinions, but built upon nothing. Christ's doctrines and miracles bespeak him to be an extraordinary Person; but because of the meanness of his appearance, so different from what they expected, they would not own him to be the Messiah, but will grant him to be any thing rather than that.
[1.] Some say, Thou art John the Baptist. Herod said so; (ch. 14. 2.) and those about him would be made to own it. This was effectually carried on by an opinion they had, that those who died as martyrs, should rise again before others; which some think the second of the seven sons refers to, in his answer to Antiochus, 2 Macc. 7. 9. The King of the world shall raise us up, who have died for his laws, unto everlasting life.
[2.] Some, Elias; taking occasion, no doubt, from the prophecy of Malachi, (ch. 4. 5.) Behold, I will send you Elijah. And the rather, because Elijah (as Christ) did many miracles, and was himself, in his translation, the greatest miracle of all.
[4.] Or, one of the prophets. This shows what an honourable idea they entertained of the prophets; and yet the very men who are actuated and slew them, ch. 23. 29. Rather than they would allow Jesus of Nazareth, one of their own country, to be such an extraordinary person as his works bespake him to be, they would say, "It was not, he, but one of the old prophets.
II. He inquires what their thoughts were concerning him; "But who say ye that I am? Ye tell me what other people say of me; can ye say better?" 1. The disciples had themselves been better taught than others; had, by their intimacy with Christ, greater advantages of getting knowledge than others had. Note, It is justly expected, that those who enjoy greater plenty of the means of knowledge and grace than others, should have a more clear and distinct knowledge of the things of God than others. But Christ, who makes this the occasion to show that the common people, who had not such advantages, than others, should have truer sentences concerning him, and be able to give a better account of him than others. 2. The disciples were trained up to teach others, and therefore it was highly requisite that they should understand the truth themselves; "Ye that are to preach the gospel of the kingdom, what are your notions of him that sends you?" Note, Ministers must be examined before they be sent; that the ministers of Christ may not give a dark, and who they say that he is; for how can they be owned as ministers of Christ, that are either ignorant or erroneous concerning Christ? This is a question we should every one of us be frequently putting to ourselves, "Who do we say, what kind of one do we say, that the Lord Jesus is? Is he precious to us? Is he in our eyes the chief of ten thousand? Is he the Beloved of our souls? Is he our portion and inheritance?" We cannot have communion with us, according as our thoughts are right or wrong concerning Jesus Christ.
Well, this is the question; now let us observe,
(1.) Peter's answer to this question, v. 16. To the former question concerning the opinion others had of Christ, several of the disciples answered, according as they had heard people talk; but to this Peter answers in the name of all the rest, they are speaking to it, and concerning it in Peter. Peter's temper led him to be forward in speaking upon all such occasions, and sometimes he spake well, sometimes amiss; in all companies there are found some warm, bold men, to whom a preceidency of speech falls of course; Peter was such a one: yet we find other of the apostles sometimes speaking as the mouth of the Lord; John 14. 25. Acts 20. 29. Phil. 1. 27. Jude, John 14. 5, 8. 22. So that this is far from being a proof of such privity and superiority of Peter above the rest of the apostles, as the church of Rome ascribes to him. They will needs advance him to be a judge, when the utmost they can make of him, is, that he was but foreman of the jury, to speak for the rest, and that only for hac vice—for [for me]. And it is not strange that a steward of the house, only chairman upon this occasion.
Peter's answer is short, but it is full, and true, and to the purpose; Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God. Here is a confession of the Christian faith, addressed to Christ, and so made an act of devotion. Here is a confession of the true God as the living God, in opposition to dumb and dead idols, and of Jesus Christ whom he hath sent, whom to know is life eternal. This is the conclusion of the whole matter.

[1.] The people called him a Prophet, that Prophet; (John 6. 14.) but the disciples own him to be the Christ, the anointed One; the great Prophet, Priest, and King of the church; the true Messiah promised to the fathers, and depended on by them as He that shall come. It was a great thing to believe this concerning one whose outward appearance was so contrary to the general notion the Jews had of the Messiah.

[2.] He called himself the Son of man; but they owned him to be the Son of the living God. The people's notion of him was, that he was the ghost of a dead man, Elias or Jeremiah; but they know and believe him to be the Son of the living God, who has life in himself, and has given to his Son to have life in himself, and to be the Life of the world. If he be the Son of the living God, he is of the same nature with him; and though his divine nature was now vailed with the cloud of flesh, yet there were those who looked through it, and saw his glory, the glory as of the Only-Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. Now can we with an assurance of faith subscribe to this confession? Let us then, with an hearty avowal and acknowledgment of it, and tell him so; Lord Jesus, thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.

(2.) Christ's approbation of his answer; (v. 17—19.) in which Peter is replied to, both as a believer and as an apostle.

[1.] As a believer, v. 17. Christ shows himself well pleased with Peter's confession, that it was so clear and express, without ifs and orns. Note, the proficiency of Christ's disciples in knowledge and grace is very acceptable to him; and Christ shows him whence he received the knowledge of this truth. At the first discovery of this truth in the dawning of the gospel-day, it was a mighty thing to believe it; all men had not this knowledge, had not this faith. But, First, Peter had the happiness of it; Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona. He reminds him of his rise and original, the meanness of his parentage, the obscurity of his extraction; he was Bar-jonas—The son of a dove; so some. Let him remember the rock out of which he was hewn, that he may see he was not born to this dignity, but preferred to it by the divine favour; it was free grace that made him to differ. Those that have received the Spirit, must remember who is their Father, 1 Sam. 16. 12. Having entertained this, he makes him sensible of his great happiness as a believer; Blessed art thou. Note. True believers are truly blessed, and those are blessed indeed whom Christ pronounces blessed; his saying they are so, makes them so. "Peter, thou art a happy man, who thus knowest the joyful sound," Ps. 89. 15. Blessed are your eyes, ch. 13. 16. All happiness attends the right knowledge of Christ.

Secondly, God must have the glory of it; "For flesh and blood have not revealed it to thee. Thou hadst this neither by the invention of thy own wit and reason, nor by the instruction and information of others; this light sprang neither from nature nor from education, but from my Father, who is in heaven." Note. 1. The christian religion is a revealed religion, has its rise in heaven; it is a religion from above, given by inspiration of God, not the learning of men or the modern discovery of reason. 2. Saving faith is the gift of God, and, wherever it is, is wrought by him, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, for his sake, and upon the score of his mediation, Phil. 1. 29. Therefore thou art blessed, because my Father has revealed it to thee. Note. The revealing of Christ to us and in us is a distinguishing token of God's good will, and a firm foundation of true happiness; and blessed are they that are thus highly favoured.

Perhaps Christ discerned something of pride and vain-glory in Peter's confession; a subtle sin, and which is apt to mingle itself even with our good duties. It is hard for good men to compare themselves with others, and not to have too great a conceit of themselves; to prevent this, we should consider that our preference to others is no achievement of our own, but the free gift of God's grace to us, and not to others; so that we have nothing to boast of, Ps. 115. 1. 1 Cor. 4. 7. [2.] Christ replies to him as an apostle or minister, v. 18, 19. Peter, in the name of the church, had confessed Christ, and to him therefore the promise intended for the church by Jeremiah (Note). There is nothing lost by being forward to confess Christ; for those who thus honour him, he will honour.

Upon occasion of this great confession made of Christ, which is the church's homage and allegiance, he signed and published this royal, this divine charter, by which that body politic is incorporated. Such is the communion between Christ and the church, the Bridegroom and his Bride, in the generation of the world from the beginning, and it was built upon the rock of the promised Seed, Gen. 3. 15. But now, that promised Seed being come, it was requisite that the church should have a new charter, as christian, and standing in relation to a Christ already come. Now here we have that charter; and a thousand pities it is, that this word, which is the great support of the kingdom of Christ, should be treated with so little respect, and be passed into the service of antichrists. But the devil has employed his subtlety to pervert it, as he did that promise, Ps. 91. 11. which he perverted to his own purpose, ch. 4. 6. and perhaps both that scripture and this he thus perverted because they stood in his way, and therefore he owed them a spite.

Now the purport of this charter is,

First, To establish the being of the church; "I say also unto thee. It is Christ that makes the grant, he who is the church's Head and Ruler, to whom all judgment is committed, and from whom all power is derived; he who makes it pursuant to the authority received from the Father, and his undertaking for the salvation of the elect. The grant is put into Peter's hand: "I say it to thee. The Old-Testament promises relating to the church were given immediately to particular persons, Abraham and David; which yet gave no supremacy to them, much less to any of their successors; so the New-Testament charter is here delivered to Peter as an agent, but to the use and behoof of the church in all ages, according to the purposes therein specified and contained. Now it is here premised, 1. That Christ would build his church upon a rock. This is the title is incorporated by the style and title of Christ's church. It is a number of the children of men called out of the world, and set apart from it, and dedicated to Christ. It is not thy church, but mine. Peter remembered this, when he cautioned ministers not to lord it over God's heritage. The church is Christ's peculiar, appropriated to him. The world is God's, and they that dwell therein; but the church is a chosen remnant, that stands in relation to God through Christ the Mediator. It bears his inscribed superscription.

(1.) The Builder and Maker of the church is Christ himself; I will build it. The church is a temple which Christ is the Builder of, Zech. 6. 11, 13. Herein Solomon was a type of Christ, and Cyrus, Isa. 44. 28. The materials and workmanship are his. By the working of his Spirit with the preaching of his word he adds souls to his church, and so builds it up with living stones, 1 Pet. 2. 5.
Ye are God's building; and building is a progressive work; the church is a foundation, the building will not stand; it is composed of persons, each in its place, like a house in forming, like a house in the building. It is committed to all those who wish well to the church, that Christ, who has divine wisdom and power, undertakes to build it up.

(2.) The foundation on which it is built, is this Rock: Let the architect do his part ever so well, if the foundation is not sound, the building will not stand; let us therefore see on what foundation it is, and let us be sure it must be of Christ, for other foundation can no man lay. See Isa. 28. 16.

[1.] The church is built upon a rock; a firm, strong, and lasting foundation, which time will not waste, nor will it sink under the weight of the building. Christ would not build his house upon the sand, for he knew that storms would arise. A rock is high, Ps. 61. 2. Christ's church does not stand upon a level with this world; a rock is large, and extends far, so does the church's foundation; and the more large, the more firm; those are not the church's friends, that narrow its foundations.

[2.] It is built upon this rock; thou art Peter, which signifies a stone or rock; Christ gave him that name when he first called him, (John 1. 42.) and hence Peter, thou art Peter. "Peter, thou dost answer thy name, thou art a solid, substantial disciple, fixed and stayed, and one that there is some hold of. Peter is thy name, and strength and stability are with thee. Thou art not shaken with the waves of men's fluctuating opinions concerning me, but established in the present truth," 2 Pet. 1. 12. From the mention of this significant name, occasion is taken for this metaphor of building upon a rock.

First, Some by this rock understand Peter himself as an apostle, the chief, though not the prince, of the twelve; senior among them, but not superior over them. The church is built upon the foundation of the apostles, Eph. 2. 20. The first stones of that building were laid in and by their ministry; hence their names are said to be written in the foundations of the new Jerusalem, Rev. 21. 14. Now Peter being that apostle by whose hand the first stones of the church were laid, both in Jewish converts, (Acts 2.) and in the Gentile converts, (Acts 10.) he might in some sense be said to be the rock on which it was built. Cephas was one that seemed to be a pillar, Gal. 2. 9. But it sounds very harsh, to call a man that only lays the first stone of a building, which is a transient act, the foundation on which it is built, which lays the groundwork, which, if not well laid, would not serve to support the pretensions of the Bishop of Rome; for Peter had no such headship as he claims, much less could derive it to his successors, least of all to the Bishops of Rome, who, whether they are so in place or no, is a question, but that they are not so in the truth of Christianity, is past all question.

Secondly, Others by this rock understand Christ; "The rock was Peter, upon which he build his church," Perhaps he laid his hand on his breast, as when he said, Destroy this temple, (John 2. 19.) when he spoke of the temple of his body. Then he took occasion from the temple, where he was, so to speak of himself, and gave occasion to some to misunderstand him of that; so here he took occasion from the rock which his rock and gave occasion to some to misunderstand him of Peter. But this must be explained by those many scriptures which speak of Christ as the only Foundation of the church; see 1 Cor. 3. 11. 1 Pet. 2. 6. Christ is both its Founder and its Foundation; he draws souls, and draws them to himself; to him they are united, and on him they rest and have a constant dependence.

Thirdly, Others by this rock understand this confession which Peter made of Christ, and this comes all to one with understanding it of Christ himself: It was a good confession which Peter witnessed, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God; the rest concurred with him in it. "Now," saith Christ, "this is that great truth upon which I will build my church," 1. Take away this truth itself, and the universal church falls to the ground. If Christ be not the Son of God, Christianity is a cheat, and the church is a mere chimera; our preaching is vain, your sanctification of the powers of darkness, and your sign is vain, Col. 1. 13, 14, 17. If Jesus be not the Christ, these that own him are not of the church, but deceivers and deceived. 2. Take away the faith and confession of this truth from any particular church, and it ceases to be a part of Christ's church, and relapses to the state and character of infidelity. This is circulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae—that article, with the admission of the denial of which the church either rises or falls; "the main hinge on which this ship of salvation turns," those who let this go, do not hold the foundation; and though they may call themselves christians, they give themselves the lie; for the church is a sacred society, incorporated upon the certainty and assurance of this great truth; and great is it, and has prevailed.

2. Christ here promises to preserve and secure his church; The gates of hell shall not prevail against it; neither against this truth, nor against the church which is built upon it.

(1.) This implies that the church has enemies that fight against it, and endeavour its ruin and overthrow, here represented by the gates of hell, that is, the city of hell; (which is directly opposite to this heavenly city, this city of the living God,) the devil's interest among the children of men. The gates of hell are the powers and policies of the devil's kingdom, the dragon's head and horns, by which he makes war with the Lamb; all that comes out of hell-gates, as being hatched and contrived there. These fight against the church by opposing gospel-truths, corrupting gospel-ordinances, persecuting good ministers and good christians; drawing or driving, persuading by craft or forcing by cruelty, to that which is inconsistent with the purity of religion: this is the design of the gates of hell, to root out the name of christianity, (Ps. 83. 4;) to devour the man child, (Rev. 12. 9;) to raise this city to the ground.

(2.) This assures us that the enemies of the church shall not gain their point. While the world stands, Christ will have a church in it, in which his truths and ordinances shall be owned and kept up, in spite of the rage of the devil and his agents. They shall not prevail against it, Ps. 129. 1, 2. This gives no security to any particular church, or church-governors, that they shall never err, never apostatize or be destroyed; but that somewhere or other the christian religion shall have a being, though not always in the same degree of purity and splendour, yet so as that the entail of it shall never be quite cut off. This is a promise of a spiritual and everlasting Church, (Rev. 12. 14.) cast down, but not destroyed, (2 Cor. 4. 9.) as dying, and behold we live, 2 Cor. 6. 9. Corruptions grieving, persecutions grievous, but neither fail. The church may be failed in particular encounters, but in the main battle it shall come off more than a conqueror. Particular believers are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation, 1 Pet. 1. 5. 6.

Secondly, The other part of this charter is, to settle the order and government of the church, v. 19. When a city or society is incorporated, officers are appointed and empowered to act for the common good. A city without government is a chaos. Now this constituting of the government of the church, is here expressed by the delivering of the keys, and, with them, a power to bind and loose. This is not to be understood of any peculiar power that Peter was invested with, as if he were sole door-keeper of the kingdom of heaven, and had that key of David, which belonged only to the Son of David; so, this invests all the apostles and their successors with a ministerial power to guide and govern the church of Christ, as it exists in particular congregations or churches, according to the rules of the gospel. Christ's apostles are "The keys of the kingdom of heaven; so Ambrose De Dignit. Sacerd. Only the keys were first put into Peter's hand, because he was the first that opened the door of faith to the Gentiles, Acts 10. 28. As the king, in giving a charter to a corporation, impowers the corporation to hold courts in his name, so ministers, mastery of fact, and determine therein according to law, confirming what is done, regularly, as if done in any of the superior courts; so Christ, having incorporated his church, hath appointed the office of the ministry for the keeping up of order and government, and to see that his laws be duly served; I will give thee the keys. He doth not say, "I have given them," or "I do now;" but "I will do it," meaning to give those gifts, Ephes. 4. 8. then this power was actually given, not to Peter only, but to all the rest, ch. 28. 19, 20. John 20. 21. He doth not say, The keys shall be given, but, I will give them; for ministers derive their authority from Christ, and all their power is to be used in his name, 1 Cor. 3. 4.

Now, 1. The power here delegated, is a spiritual power; it is a power pertaining to the kingdom of heaven, that is, to the church, that part of it which is militant here on earth, to the gospel-dispensation: that is it about which the apostolical and ministerial power is wholly conversant. It is not any civil, secular power that is hereby conveyed, Christ's kingdom is not of this world; their instructions afterward were in things pertaining to the kingdom of God, Acts 1. 3.

2. The power of the keys that is given, alluding to the custom of investing men with authority in such a place, by delivering to them the keys of the place. Or as the master of the house gives the keys to the steward, the keys of the stores where the provisions are kept, that he may give to every one in the house their portion of meat in due season, (Luke 12. 42.) and so as there is occasion, according to the rules of the family. Ministers are stewards, 1 Cor. 4. 1. Tit. 1. 7. Eliakim, who had the key of the house of David, was over the household, Isa. 22. 22.

3. It is a power to bind and loose, that is, (following the metaphor of the keys,) to shut and open. Joseph, who was lord of Pharaoh's house, and steward of the stores, had power to bind his princes, and to teach his senators wisdom, Ps. 103. 21, 22. When the stores and treasures of the house are shut up from any, they are bound, interdices tibi acqua et igne — forbid thee the use of fire and water; when they are opened to them again, they are loosed from that bond, are discharged from the censure, and restored to their liberty.

4. It is a power which Christ hath promised to own the due administration of; (he will ratify the sentence of his stewards with his own approbation;) It shall be bound in heaven, and loosed in heaven: not that Christ hath hereby obliged himself to confirm all the acts of his ministers, even those that are duly passed according to the word, clave non errante — the key turning the right way, such are sealed in heaven; that is, the word of the gospel, in the mouth of faithful ministers, is to be looked upon, not as the word of man, but as the word of God, and to be received accordingly, 1 Thess. 2. 13. John 13. 20. Now the keys of the kingdom of heaven are,

(1.) The key of doctrine, called the key of knowledge; Your business shall be to explain to the world the will of God, both as to truth and duty; and for this you shall have your commissions, credentials, and full instructions, to bind and loose; these, in the common speech of the Jews, at that time, signified to prohibit and declare that, which the law of Moses was now to be allowed, as the eating of such and such meats; some things allowed there were now to be forbidden, as divorce; and the apostles were empowered to declare this to the world, and men might take it upon their words. When Peter was first called to be a minister of a new world, to bind and to loose nothing common or uncleann, this power was exercised. There is also an ordinary power hereby conveyed to all ministers, to preach the gospel as appointed officers; to tell people, in God's name, and according to the scriptures, what is good, and what the Lord requires of them; and who declare the whole counsel of God, use these keys well, Acts 20. 27.

Some make the giving of the keys to the psalmist a privilege of the church in the person of its president, or governing doctor of the law, which was to put into his hand the keys of the chest where the book of the law was kept, denoting his being authorized to take and read it: and the binding and loosing, to allude to the fashion about their books, which were in rolls; they shut them by binding them up with a string, which they untied when they opened them. Christ gives his apostles power to shut or open the book of the gospel to people, as the case required. See the exercise of this power, Acts 13. 46.—18. 6. When ministers preach pardon and peace to the penitent; wrath and the curse to the impenitent, in Christ's name, they act then pursuant to this authority of binding and loosing.

(2.) The key of discipline, which is but the application of the former to particular persons, upon a right estimate of their characters and actions. It is not legislative power that is here conferred, but judicial; the judge doth not make the law, but only declare what is law, and, upon an impartial inquiry into the merits of the cause, gives sentence accordingly. Such is the power of the keys, wherever it is lodged, with reference to church-membership and the privileges thereof. [1.] Christ's ministers have a power to admit into the church; "Go discip[le] all nations, baptizing them;" those who profess faith in Christ, and obedience to him, admit them and their spiritual members of the church by baptism. Ministers are to let in to the wedding-feast those that are bidden; and to keep out such as are apparently unfit for so holy a communion. [2.] They have a power to expel and cast out such as have forfeited their church membership, that is binding; refusing to unbelieve; the application of gospel-promises and the seals of them; and declaring to such as appear to be in the gall of bitterness and the smoke that rises out of the matter, as Peter did to Simon Magnus, though he had been baptized; and this is a binding over to the judgment of God. [3.] They have a power to restore and to receive in again, upon their repentance, such as had been thrown out; to loose those whom they had bound; declaring to them, that, if their repentance be sincere, the promise of pardon belongs to them. The apostles had a miraculous gift of healing the sick; but even the rule of outward appearances, (as Acts 8. 21. 1 Cor. 5. 1. 2 Cor. 2. 7. 1 Tim. 1. 20.) which ministers may still make a judgment upon, if they be skilful and faithful.

Lastly, Here is the charge which Christ gave his disciples, to keep this private for the present; (v. 20.) They must tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ. What they had professed to him, they must not publish to the world, for several reasons; 1. Because this was the time of preparation for his kingdom; the great thing now preached, was, that the kingdom of heaven was at hand; and therefore those things were now to be insisted on, which were proper to make way for Christ; as the doctrine of repentance; not this great truth, in and with which the kingdom of heaven was to be actually set up. Every thing is beautiful in its season, and it is good advice, Prepare thy work, and afterwards build, Prov. 24. 27. 2. Christ would have his Messiahship proved by his works, and would rather they should testify of him than that his disciples should, because their testimony was but as his own, which he insisted not on. See John 5. 31, 54. He was so secure of the demonstration of his miracles, that he waved other witnesses, John 10. 25, 38. 3. If they had known that he was Jesus the Christ, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory, 1 Cor. 2. 8. 4. Christ would not have the apostles preach this, till they had the most convincing evidence ready to allege in confirmation of it. Great truths may suffer damage by being asserted before they can be sufficiently proved. Now the great proof of Jesus being the Son of God, was his resurrection, and he declared to be the Son of God, with power; and therefore the divine wisdom would not have this truth preached, till that could be alleged for proof of it. 5. It was requisite that the preachers of so great a truth should be furnished with greater measures of the Spirit than the apostles as yet had; therefore the open asserting of it was adjourned till the Spirit should be poured out upon them. But when Christ was glorified and the Spirit poured out, we find Peter proclaiming upon the house-tops what was here spoken in a corner, (Acts 2. 36.) That God hath made this same Jesus both Lord and Christ; for as there is a time to keep silence, so there is a time to speak. 21. From that time forth began Jesus to shew unto his disciples, how that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders, and chief priests, and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day. 22. Then Peter took him, and began to rebuke him, saying, Be it far from thee, Lord: this shall not be unto thee. 23. But he turned, and said unto Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan: thou art an offence unto me: for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men. We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples concerning his own sufferings; in which observe, 1. Christ's foretelling of his sufferings. Now he began to do it, and from this time he frequently spake of them. Some hints he had already given of sufferings, as when he said, Destroy this temple: when he spake of the Son of man being lifted up, and of eating his flesh, and drinking his blood: but now he began to show it, to speak plainly and expressively of it. Hitherto he had not touched upon this, because the disciples were weak, and could not well bear the sight of him, and seeing so very melancholy; but now that they were more ripe in knowledge, and strong in faith, he began to tell them this. Note, Christ reveals his mind to his people gradually, and lets in light as they can bear it, and are fit to receive it. From that time, when they had made that full confession of Christ, that he was the Son of God, then he began to show them this. When he found them knowing in one truth, he taught them another; for to him that has, shall be given. Let them first be established in the principles of the doctrine of Christ, and then go on to perfection, Heb. 6. 1. If they had not been well grounded in the belief of Christ's being the Son of God, it would have been a great shaking to their faith. All truths are not to be spoken to all persons at all times, but such as are proper and suitable to their present state. Now observe, 1. What he foretold concerning his sufferings, the particulars and circumstances of them, are all surprising. (1.) The place where he should suffer. He must go to Jerusalem, the head city, the holy city, and suffer there. Though he lived most of his time in Galilee, he must die at Jerusalem; there all the sacrifices were offered, there therefore he must die, who is the great Saviour. (2.) The persons by whom he should suffer; the elders, and chief priests, and scribes: these made up the great sanhedrim, which sat at Jerusalem, and was had in veneration by the people. Those that should have been most forward in owning and adoring Christ, were the most bitter in persecuting him. It was strange that men of knowledge in the scriptures, and professing the coming, and pretended to have something sacred in their character, should use him thus barbarously when he did come. It was the Roman power that condemned and crucified Christ, but he lays it at the door of the chief priests and Scribes, who were the first movers. (3.) What he should suffer; He must suffer many things, and be killed. His enemies' insatiable malice, and his own invincible patience, appear in the variety and multiplicity of his sufferings, (he suffered many things,) and in the extremity of them; nothing less than his death would satisfy them, he must be killed. The suffering of many things, if not unto them, is more tolerable; for while there is life, there is hope; and death, without such prefaces, would be less terrible; but he must first suffer many things, and then be killed. (4.) What should be the happy issue of all his sufferings; he shall be raised again the third day. As the prophets, so Christ himself, when he testified beforehand his sufferings, testified, with all the glory that should follow, 1 Pet. 1. 11. His rising again the third day proved him to be the Son of God, notwithstanding his sufferings; and therefore he must be kept up. For when he spake of the cross and the shame, he spake in the same breath of the joy set before him, in the prospect of which he endured the cross, and despised the shame. Thus we must look upon Christ's suffering for us, trace it in the way to his glory; and thus we must look upon our suffering for Christ, look through it to the recompense of reward. If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him. 2. Why he foretold his sufferings. (1.) To show that they were the product of an eternal counsel and consent; were agreed upon between the Father and the Son from eternity; thus it pleased Christ to suffer. The matter was settled in the determinate counsel and foreknowledge, in pursuance of his own voluntary suspicion and undertaking for our salvation; his sufferings were no surprise to him, did not overtake him as a snare, but he had a distinct and certain foresight of them, which greatly magnifies his love, John 18. 4. (2.) To rectify the mistakes which his disciples had imbibed concerning the eternal pomp and power of his kingdom. Believing him to be the Messiah, they counted upon nothing but dignity and authority in the world; but here Christ reads them another lesson, tells them of the cross and sufferings; nay, that the chief priests are the elders, whom, it is likely, they expected to be the supports of the Messiah's kingdom, should be its great enemies and persecutors; this would give them quite another idea of that kingdom which they themselves had preached the approach of; and it was requisite that this mistake should be got of early, to make their preaching plain with, and warned not to expect great things in this world. (3.) It was to prepare them for the share, at least, of sorrow and fear, which they must have in his sufferings. When he suffered many things, the disciples could not but suffer some; if their Master be killed, they will be seized with terror; let them know it before, that they may provide accordingly, and being fore-warned, may be fore-armed.

II. The offence which Peter took at this; he said, De be it far from thee, Lord: probably he spake the sense of the rest of the disciples, as before, for he was chief speaker. He took him, and began to rebuke him. Perhaps Peter was a little elevated with the great things Christ had now said unto him, which made him more bold with Christ than did become him; so hard is it to keep the spirit low and humble in the midst of great advancements!

1. It did not become Peter to contradict his Master, or take upon him to advise him; he might have wished, that, if it were possible, this cup might pass away, without saying so peremptorily, This shall not be, when Christ had said, It must be. Shall any teach God knowledge? He that reproveth God, let him answer it. Note, When God's dispensations are either intricate or cress to us, it becomes us diligently to acquiesce in, and not to protest to, the divine will; God knows what he has to do, without our teaching. Unless we know the mind of the Lord, it is not for us to be his counsellors, Rom. 11. 34.

2. It savoured much of fleshly wisdom, for him to appear so warmly against suffering, and to startle thus at the offence of the cross. It is the corrupt part of us, that is thus solicitious to sleep in a whole day, and rather than Christ should be crucified, to have no but he may be spared. This regard not, when Christ had said, it must be. Shall any teach God knowledge? He that reproveth God, let him answer it. Note, When God's dispensations are either intricate or cress to us, it becomes us diligently to acquiesce in, and not to protest to, the divine will; God knows what he has to do, without our teaching. Unless we know the mind of the Lord, it is not for us to be his counsellors, Rom. 11. 34.

3. It was much to the advantage of Peter, if he had been disposed to acquiesce in, and not to protest to, the divine will; he would have had more opportunity of seeing Christ in the suffering, and of living under the influence of so many holy and spiritual things as they relate to this present life, to which they are unequal; but there are other rules to measure them by, which, if duly observed, will enable us cheerfully to bear them, Rom. 8. 18. See how passionately Peter speaks; "Be it far from thee, Lord. God forbid, that thou shouldst suffer and be killed; we cannot bear the thoughts of it." Master, spare thyself; so it might be read; Ἀδελφό, σώσον. Be merciful to thyself, and then this shall not be to thee. Note, A good man may by a surprise of temptation soon grow very unlike himself. He answered him as he did Satan himself, ch. 4. 10. Note, (1.) It is the subtlety of Satan, to send temptations to us by the unsuspected hands of our best and dearest friends. Thus he assaulted Adam by Eve, Job by his wife, and hurled Christ by his beloved Peter. It concerns us therefore to be ignorant of his devices, but to stand against his wiles and deceptions, by standing always upon our guard against sin, whoever moves us to it. Even the kindnesses of our friends are often abused by Satan, and made use of as temptations to us. (2.) Those who have their spiritual senses exercised, will be aware of the voice of Satan, even in a friend, a disciple, a minister, that disguises them from their duty. We must not compliment, but rebuke, mistaken courtesies. Faithful are the wounds of a friend. Such suitings must be accounted kindnesses, Ps. 141. 5. (4.) Whatever appears to be a temptation to sin, must be resisted with abhorrence, and not parleyed with.

4. What was the ground of this displeasure; why did Christ thus resent a motion that seemed not only harmless, but kind? Two reasons are given:

(1.) Thou art an offence to me; Exod. 32: 11. Thou art my hinderance; (so it may be read;) thou standest in my way. Christ was hastening on in the work of our salvation, and his heart was so much upon it, that he took it ill to be hindered, or tempted to start back from the hardest and most discouraging part of his undertaking. So strongly was he engaged for our redemption, that they who but indirectly endeavoured to divert him from it, offended him in a very tender and sensible manner. Peter was not so sharply reproved for disowning and denying his Master in his sufferings as he was for dissuading him from them; though that was the defect, this the excess, of kindness. It argues a very great firmness and resolution of mind in any business, when it is an offence to be disowned, and a man will not endure to hear any thing to the contrary; like that of Ruth, Entreat me not to leave thee, Note, Our love to Christ is often our greatest woe. We must not regard who speaks, so much as what is spoken; we must learn to know the devil's voice when he speaks in a saint as well as when he speaks in a serpent. Whoever takes us off from that which is good, and would have us afraid of doing too much for God, speaks Satan's language. (3.) We must in free and faithful in reproving the dearest friend we have, that saith or doth amiss, though he may be under colour of kindness to us. We must not compliment, but rebuke, mistaken courtesies. Faithful are the wounds of a friend. Such suitings must be accounted kindnesses, Ps. 141. 5. (4.) Whatever appears to be a temptation to sin, must be resisted with abhorrence, and not parleyed with.

See why he called Peter Satan, when he suggested this to him; because, whatever stood in the way of our salvation, he looked upon as coming from the devil, who is a sworn enemy to it. The same Satan that afterward tempted Jesus to destroy him in his undertaking, here prompted Peter plausibly to divert him from it. Thus he changes himself into an angel of light. Thou art an offence to me. Note, [1.] Those that engage in any great and good work, must expect to meet with hindrance and opposition from friends and foes, from within and without. [2.] Those that obstruct our progress in any work for Christ, may be looked upon as his enemies. Thou dost the will of God, as Christ did, whose meat and drink it was to do it, when it is a trouble to us to be solicited from our duty. Those that hinder us from doing or suffering for God, when we are called to it, what ever they are in other things, in that they are Satan's adversaries to us.

(2.) Thou savourrest not the things that are of God, but those that are of men. Note, [1.] The things that are of God, that is, the concerns of his will and glory, often clash and interfere with the things that are of men, that is, with our own wealth, pleasure, and reputation. While we mind christian duty as our way and work, and the divine favour as our end and portion, we savour the things of God; but if these be minded, the flesh must be denied, hazards must be run and hardships borne; and here is the trial which of the two we savour. [2.] Those that are not in Christ shall be deadening. Trouble and danger are offered for Christ, when they are called to it, savour more of the things of man than of the things of God; they relish those things more themselves, and make it appear to others that they do so.

24. Then said Jesus unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. 25. For whatsoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it. 26. For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? 27. For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. 28. Verily I say unto you, There are some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.

Christ, having showed his disciples that he must suffer, and that he was ready and willing to suffer, here shows them that they must suffer too, and must be ready and willing. It is a weighty discourse that we have in these verses:

1. Here is the law of discipleship laid down, and the terms fixed, upon which we may have the honour and benefit of it, v. 24. He said this to his disciples, not only that they might instruct others concerning it, but that by this rule they might examine their own sincerity. Observe,

1. What it is to be a disciple of Christ; it is to come after him. When Christ called his disciples, this was the word of command, Follow me. A true disciple of Christ is one that offers his life for his Master, and shall follow him to glory. He is one that comes after Christ, not one that prescribes to him, as Peter now undertook to do, forgetting his place. A disciple of Christ comes after him, as the sheep after the shepherd, the servant after his master, the soldiers after their captain; he is one that aims at the same end that Christ aimed at, the glory of God, and the glory of his name; and we that walk in the same way that he walked in, is led by his Spirit, treads in his steps, submits to his conduct, and follows the Lamb, whithersoever he goes, Rev. 14. 4.

2. What are the great things required of those that will be Christ's disciples; If any man will come, he must deny—If any man be willing to come. It denotes a deliberate choice, and cheerfulness and resolution in that choice. Many are deterred by chance or the will of others than by any act of their own will; but Christ will have his people volunteers, Ps. 110. 3. It is as if Christ had said, "If any of the people that are not my disciples, be steadfastly minded to come to me, and if you that are, be in like manner minded to adhere to me, it is upon these terms, these and no other; you must follow me in sufferings as well as in other things, and therefore when you sit down to count the cost, reckon upon it."

Now what are these terms?

1. Let him deny himself. Peter had advised Christ to spare himself, and would be ready, in the like case, to take the advice; but Christ tells them all, they must be so far from sparing themselves, that they must deny themselves. Herein they must come after Christ, for his birth, and life, and death, were all a continued act of self-denial, a self-emptying, a self-sacrificing, and self-enduring. Verily and against the grain to flesh and blood, it is no more than what our Master learned and practised before us and for us, both for our redemption and for our instruction; and the servant is not above his lord. Note, All the disciples and followers of Jesus Christ must deny themselves. It is the fundamental law of admission into Christ's school, and the first and greatest lesson which we are to learn, viz. to lay down ourselves; it is both the strait gate, and the narrow way; it is necessary in order to our learning all the other good lessons that are there taught. We must deny ourselves absolutely, we must not admire our own shadow, nor gratify our own humour; we must not lean to our own understanding, nor seek our own things, nor be our own end. We must deny our own will, and do Christ's will. To deny ourselves is to give up the old life, and take on the new; and it is the duty, the pleasure, and the service of our interest in the world; we must deny ourselves for our brethren, and for their good; and we must deny ourselves for ourselves, denying the appetites of the body for the benefit of the soul.

2. Let him take up his cross. The cross is here put for all sufferings, as men or Christians; providence and grace, afflictions, persecutions for righteousness, evil that befalls, every trouble that betides us, either for doing well or for not doing ill. The troubles of Christians are fitly called crosses, in allusion to the death of the cross, which Christ was obedient to; and it should reconcile us to troubles, and take off the terror of them, that they are what we bear in common with Christ, and such as he hath borne before us. Note, [1.] Every disciple of Christ hath his cross, and must count upon it; as each hath his special duty to be done, so each hath his special trouble to be borne, and every one feels most from his own burden. Crosses are the common lot of God's children, but of this common lot each hath his particular share. That is our cross which Infinite Wisdom has appointed for us, and a Sovereign Providence has laid on us, as fitted for us. It is good for us to call the cross were we under, and to use it as a school, and a school of grace. We are to think we could bear such a one's cross better than our own; but that is best, which is, and we ought to make the best of it. [2.] Every disciple of Christ must take up that which the wise God hath made his cross. It is an allusion to the Roman custom of compelling those that were condemned to be crucified, to carry their cross; when Simon carried Christ's cross after him, so that cross was bound up to him, and it was said, that the cross lies in our way, and is prepared for us. We must not make crosses to ourselves, but must accommodate ourselves to those which God has made for us. Our rule is, not to go a step out of the way of duty, either to meet a cross, or to miss one. We must not by our rashness and indiscretion pull crosses down upon our own heads, but must take the cross as it comes. The Roman law was, so manage an affliction, that it may not be a stumbling-block or hinderance to us in any service we have to do for God. We must take it up out of our way, by getting over the offence of the cross; None of these things move me; and we must then go on with it in our way, though it lie heavy. Secondly, That which we have to do is, not only to bear the cross, (that is a stock or a stone or a stick, etc.), but actually be bent under it, but we must take up the cross, must improve it to some good advantage
We should not say, "This is an evil, and I must bear it, because I cannot help it;" but "This is an evil, and I will bear it, because it shall work for my good." When we rejoice in our afflictions, and glory in them, we take them up in the particular of taking up the cross. Suffering saints must look unto Jesus, and take from him both direction and encouragement in suffering. Do we bear the cross? We therein follow Christ, who bears it before us, bears it for us, and so bears it from us. He bore the heavy end of the cross, the end that had the curse upon it, that was a heavy end, and so made the other light and easy for us. Or, we may take it in general, we must follow Christ in all instances of holiness and obedience. Note, The disciples of Christ must study to imitate their Master, and conform themselves in every thing to his example, and continue in well-doing, whatever crosses lie in their way. To do well and to suffer ill, is to follow Christ. If any man will come after me, let him follow me; that seems to be idem per idem— the same thing over and over again. What is the difference? Surely it is this, If any man will come after me, let him follow me; and so have the name and credit of a disciple, let him follow me in truth, and so do the work and duty of a disciple. Or thus, If any man will set out after me, in good beginnings, let him continue to follow me with all perseverance. That is following the Lord fully, as Caleb did. Those that come after Christ, must fulfil after him.

How are arguments to persuade us to submit to these laws, and come up to these terms. Self-denial, and patient suffering, are hard lessons, which will never be learned if we consult with flesh and blood; let us therefore consult with our Lord Jesus, and see what advice he gives us; and here he gives us,

1. Some considerations proper to engage us to these duties of self-denial and suffering for Christ.

Firstly, The weight of that eternity which depends upon our present choice; (v. 25.) Whosoever will save his life, by denying Christ, shall lose it; and whosoever is contented to lose his life, for owning Christ, shall find it. Here are life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, set before us. Observe,

[1.] The misery that attends the most plausible and easy way. Whosoever will save his life in this world, if be by sin, he shall lose it in another; he that forsakes Christ, to preserve a temporal life and avoid a temporal death, will certainly come short of eternal life, and will be hurt of the second death, and certainly held by it. There cannot be a fairer pretence for apostasy and iniquity than saving the life by it, so cogent is the law of self-preservation; and yet even that is folly, for it will prove in the end self-destruction; the life saved is but for a moment, and the death snuffed is but as a sleep; but life is everlasting, and the death run upon is the depth and complement of all misery, and an endless separation from all good. Now, let any rational man consider of it, take advice and speak his mind, whether there is any thing got, at long run, by apostasy, though a man save his estate, preferment, or life, by it.

[2.] The advantage that attends the most perilous and expensive course; Whosoever will lose his life for Christ's sake, shall find it in a better, infinitely to his advantage. Note, First, Many a life is lost, for Christ's sake, in doing his work, by labouring fervently for his name; in suffering work, by being patiently obedient to him in his ways. Christ's holy religion is handed down to us, sealed with the blood of thousands, that have not known their own souls, but have despised their loves, (as Job speaks in another case,) though very valuable ones, when they have stood in competition with their duty and the testimony of Jesus, Rev. 20. 4. Secondly, Though many have been losers for Christ, even of life itself, yet never any one dies, or was lost, for the present end. The loss of other comforts, for Christ, may possibly be made up in this world; (Mark 10. 30.) the loss of life cannot, but it shall be made up in the other world, in an eternal life; the believing prospect of which hath been the great support of suffering saints in all ages. An assurance of the life they should find, in lieu of the life they hazard, hath enabled them to triumph over death, in all its terrors; to go smiling to a scaffold, and stand singing at a stake, and to call the utmost instances of their enemies' rage but a light affliction.

[3.] The worth of the soul which lies at stake, and the worthlessness of the world in comparison of it; (v. 26.) What is a man profited, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?—So the same word which is translated his life, (v. 25.) for the freedom of life, God hath placed that common principle, that, whatever a man gets, if he lose his life, it will do him no good, he cannot enjoy his gains. But it looks higher, and speaks of the soul as immortal, and a loss of it beyond death, which cannot be compensated by the gain of the whole world. Note, First, Every man has a soul of his own. The soul is the spiritual and immortal part of man, which thinks and reasons, and endures and reflects and knows, and possesses the body now, and will shortly act in a separation from the body. Our souls are our own not in respect of dominion and propriety, (for we are not our own, All souls are mine, saith God,) but in respect of nearness and concern; our souls are our own, for they are ourselves. Secondly, It is possible for the soul to be lost, and there is danger of it. The soul is lost when it is eternally separated from all the good to all the evil that this world yields it; and so, when it dies, it will die at last, and cannot be separated from the favour of God, and sunk under his wrath and curse. A man is never undone till he is in hell. Thirdly, If the soul be lost, it is of the sinner's own losing. The man loses his own soul, for he does that which is certainly destroying to it, and neglects that which alone would be saving, Hos. 13. 9. The sinner dies because he will die; his blood is on his own head. Fourthly, One soul is more worth than all the world: our own souls are of greater value to us than all the wealth, honour, and pleasures of this present time, if we had them. Here is the whole world set in the scale against one soul, and Tekel written upon it; it is weighed in the balance, and found too light to weigh it down. This is Christ's judgment upon the matter, and he is a competent Judge; he had reason to know the price of souls, for he redeemed them all, nor would he undertake the matter for more made it. Fifthly, The winning of the world is often the losing of the soul. Many a one has ruined his eternal interests by his preposterous and inordinate care to secure and advance his temporal ones. It is the love of the world, and the eager pursuit of it, that drowns men in destruction and perdition. Sixthly, The loss of the soul is so great a loss, that the gain of the whole world will not counterbalance it, or make it up. He that loses his soul, though it be to gain the world, makes a very bad bargain for himself, and will sit attending him, who should live to see it. As soon was assured that he should not see death till he had seen the Lord's Christ come in the flesh; so some here are assured that they shall not taste death (death is a sensible thing, its terrors are seen, its bitterness is tasted) till they had seen the Lord's Christ coming in his kingdom. At the end of time, he shall be in his glory, but now, in the fulness of time, he was to come in his own kingdom, his mediatorial kingdom. Some little specimen was given of his glory a few days after this, in his transfiguration; (ch. 17, 1.) then he tried his robes. But this point at Christ's coming by the pouring out of his Spirit, the planting of the gospel-church, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the taking away of the place and nation of the Jews, who were the most bitter enemies to Christianity. Here was the Son of man coming in his kingdom. Many then present lived to see it, particularly John, who lived till after the destruction of Jerusalem, and saw Christianity planted in the world. Let this encourage the followers of Christ to suffer for him, [1.] That their undertaking shall be succeeded; the apostles were employed in setting up the kingdom; we shall know, for their comfort, that, whatever opposition they meet with, yet they shall carry their point. shall see of the travail of their soul. Note, It is a great encouragement to suffering saints, to be assured, not only of the safety, but of the advancement, of Christ's kingdom among men; not only notwithstanding their sufferings, but by their sufferings. A believing prospect of the kingdom of grace, as well as of our share in the kingdom of glory, may carry us cheerfully through our sufferings. [2.] That their cause shall be pleaded; their deaths shall be revenged, and their persecutors reckoned with. [3.] That this shall be done shortly, in the present age. Note, The nearer the church's deliverances are, the more cheerful should we be in our sufferings. Behold, the Judge standeth at the door. It is spoken as a favour to those that should survive the present cloudy time, that they should see better days. Note, It is desirable to share with the church in her joys, Dan. 12. 12. Observe, Christ saith, Some shall live to see those glorious days, not all; some shall enter into the promised land, but others shall fall in the wilderness. He does not tell them who should live to see this kingdom. If we had known, they should have cast off the thoughts of dying, but some of them shall; Behold, the Lord is at hand. The Judge standeth before the door; be patient, therefore, brethren.

CHAP. XVIII.

In this chapter we have, 1. Christ in his pomp and glory, transfigured, v. 1. 13. II. Christ in his power and grace casting the devil out of a child, v. 14. 21. And, III. Christ in his poverty and humiliation, 1. Foretelling his sufferings, v. 22. 23. 2. Paying tribute, v. 24. 27. So that here is Christ, the brightness of his Father's glory, by himself purging our sins, paying our debts, and destroying for us him that had the power of death, that is, the devil. Thus were the several inducements of Christ's gracious intentions admirably interwoven.

1. AND after six days Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart. 2. And was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light. 3. And, behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elias, talking with him. 4. Then answered Peter, and said unto Jesus, Lord, it is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles: one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias. 5. While he yet spake, behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them; and, behold, a voice out of the cloud, which said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him. 6. And when the disciples heard it, they fell on their face, and were sore afraid. 7. And Jesus came and touched them, and said, Arise, and be not afraid. 8. And when they had lifted up their eyes, they saw no man, save Jesus only. 9. And as they came down from the mountain, Jesus charged them, saying, Tell the vision to no man, until the Son of man be risen again from the dead. 10. And his disciples asked him, saying, Why then say the Scribes that Elias must first come? 11. And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias shall first come, and restore all things. 12. But I say unto you, That Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but they did done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them. 13. Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist.

We have here the story of Christ's transfiguration; he had said that the Son of man should shortly come in his kingdom, with which promise all the three evangelists industriously connect this story; as if Christ's transfiguration was intended for a specimen and an earnest of the kingdom of Christ, and of that light and love of his, which therein appears to his select and sanctified ones. Peter speaks of this as the power and coming of our Lord Jesus; (2 Pet. 1. 16.) because it was an emanation of his power, and a previous notice of his coming, which was fitly introduced by such prefaces.

When Christ was here in his humiliation, though his state, in the main, was a state of abasement and afflictions, there were some glimpses of his glory intensified, that he himself might be more enouraged in his sufferings, and others the less offended. His birth, his baptism, his temptation, and his death, were the most remarkable instances of his humiliation; and these were each of them attended with some signal points of glory, and the smiles of heaven. But the series of his public ministry being a continued humiliation, here, just in the midst of that, comes in this discovery of his glory. As, now, the time of his transfiguration was for the less occasions, so, when he was on earth, he had his accomplishments. Now concerning Christ's transfiguration, observe,

1. The circumstances of it, which are here noted, 1. The time; six days after he had the solemn conference with his disciples, ch. 16. 21. St. Luke saith, It was about eight days after, six whole days intervening, and this the eighth day; that day seven-light. St. Matthew repeats only that it was be said or done by our Lord Jesus for six days before his transfiguration; thus, before some great appearances, there was silence in heaven for the space of half an hour, Rev. 8. 1. Then when Christ seems to be doing nothing for his church, expect, ere long, something more than ordinary.

2. The place; it was on the top of a high mountain afar. Christ chose a mountain, (1.) As a secret place, he went apart; for though a city upon a hill can hardly be hid, two or three persons upon a hill can hardly be found; therefore their private oratories were commonly upon mountains. Christ chose a retired place to be transfigured in, because his appearing publicly in his glory was not agreeable to his present state, and thus he would show his humanity, and teach us that privacy much befriended our communion with God. Those that would maintain intercourse with heaven, must frequently withdraw from the converse and business of this world; and they will find themselves never less alone than when alone, for the Father is with them. (2.) Though a sublime place, elevated above things below. Note, Those that would have a tranquil retirement with God, must not only retire, but ascend; lift up their hearts, and seek things above. The call is, Come up hither, Rev. 6. 1.

3. The witnesses of it. He took with him Peter and James and John. (1.) He took three, a competent number to testify what they should see; for out of the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established. Christ makes his appearances certain enough, but not too common, or too visible, but to believers, (Acts 10. 41.) that they might be blessed, who have not seen, and yet have believed. (2.) He took these three because they were the chief of his disciples, the first three of the worthies of the Son of David; probably they excelled in gifts and graces; they were Christ's favourites, singled out to be the witnesses of his retirements. They were present when he raised the damsel to life, Mark 5. 42. They were afterward to be the witnesses of his agony, and this was to prepare them for that. Note, A sight of Christ's glory while we are here in this world, is a good preparative for our sufferings with him, as these are preparatives for the sight of his glory in the other world. Paul, who had abundance of trouble, had abundance of revelations.

11. The manner of it; (v. 2.) He was transfigured before them. The substance of his body remained the same, but the accidents and appearances of it were greatly altered; he was not turned into a spirit, but his body, which had appeared in weakness and dishonour, now appeared in power and glory. He was transfigured, μεταφωσθη—a man was metamorphosed. The profane poeams amused and abused the world with idle extravagant stories of metamorphoses, especially those of gods, natures disparaging and diminishing to them, equally false and ridiculous; to these some think Peter has an eye, when, being about to mention this transfiguration of Christ, he saith, We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made it known unto you. 2 Pet. 1. 16. Christ was both God and man; but, in the days of his flesh, he took on him the form of a servant—μεταφωσθη, Phil. 2. 7. He drew a veil over the glory of his godhead; but now, in his transfiguration, he put by that veil, appeared μεταφωσθη—in the form of God, (Phil. 2. 6.) and gave his disciples a glimpse of his glory, which could not but change his form.

The great truth which we declare, is, that God is Light, (1 John 1. 5.) dwells in light, (2 Tim. 6. 16.) covers himself with light; Ps. 104. 2. And therefore when Christ would appear in the form of God, he appeared in the glory of all visible beauty, the first-born of the creation, and most nearly resembling the eternal Parent. Christ is the Light; while he was in the world, he shined in darkness, and therefore the world knew him not; (John 1. 5, 10.) but, at this time, that Light shined out of the darkness.

Now his transfiguration appeared in two things:

1. His face did shine as the sun. The face is the principal part of the body, by which we are known;
therefore such a brightness was put on Christ's face, that face which afterward he hid not from shame and suffering. It shone as the sun when he goes forth in his strength made clear, so bright is the Sun of righteousness, the Light of the world. The face of Moses shone but as the moon, with a borrowed, reflected light, but Christ's shone as the sun, with an innate, inherent light, which was the more sensibly glorious, because it suddenly broke out, as it were, from behind a black cloud.

His vesture was white as the snow. All his body was altered, as his face was, so that beams of light, darting from every part through his clothes, made them white and glittering. The shining of the face of Moses was so weak, that it could easily be concealed by a thin vail; but such was the glory of Christ's body, that his clothes were enlightened by it.

III. The companions of it. He will come, at last, with ten thousands of his saints; and, as a specimen of that, there now appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him, v. 3. Observe, 1. There were glorified saints attending him, that, when there were three to bear record on earth, Peter, James, and John, there might some be to bear record from heaven too. Thus here was a lively resemblance of Christ's kingdom, which is made up of saints in heaven and on earth, and to which belong the spirits of just men made perfect. We see here, that they who are fallen asleep in Christ, are not perished, but exist in a separate state, and shall be forthcoming when there is occasion. 2. These two were Moses and Elias, men very eminent in their day. They had both fasted forty days and forty nights, as Christ did, and wrought other miracles, and were both remarkable at their going out of the world as well as in their living in the world. Elias was borne up by angels to heaven in a fiery chariot, and died not. The body of Moses was never found, possibly it was preserved from corruption, and reserved for this appearance. The Jews had great respect for the memory of Moses and Elias, and therefore they came to witness of him, they came to carry tidings concerning him to the upper world. In them they had the law and the prophets, the law and the prophets, and here testimony from them. Moses and Elias appeared to the disciples; they saw them, and heard them talk, and, either by their discourse or by information from Christ, they knew them to be Moses and Elias; glorified saints shall know one another in heaven. They talked with Christ. Note, Christ has communicated with his blessed, and will be stranger to no any of the members of that glorified corporation. Christ was now to be sealed in his prophetic office, and therefore these two great prophets were fittest to attend him, as transferring all their honour and interest to him; for in these last days God speaks to us by his Son, Heb. 1. 1.

IV. The great pleasure and satisfaction that the disciples took in the sight of Christ's glory. Peter, as usual, was full of enthusiasm, and, indeed, it is good for us to be here. Peter here expresses,

1. The delight they had in this converse; Lord, it is good to be here. Though upon a high mountain, which we may suppose rough and unpleasant, bleak and cold, yet it is good to be here. He speaks the sense of his fellow-disciples; it is good not only for them, but for us. He did not covet to monopolize this favour, but looked for us also. He saith this to Christ. Pious and devout affections love to see ourselves before the Lord Jesus. The soul that loves Christ and loves to be with him, loves to go and tell him so; Lord, it is good for us to be here. This intimates a thankful acknowledgment of his kindness in admitting them to his favour. Note, Communion with Christ is the delight of christians. All the disciples of the Lord Jesus reckon it is good for them to be with him in the holy mount. It is good to be here where Christ is, and whither he brings us along with him by his appointment; it is good to be here, retired and alone with Christ; to be here, where we may behold the beauty of the Lord Jesus, Ps. 27. 4. It is pleasant to hear Christ compare notes with Moses and the prophets, to see how all the institutions of the law, and all the predictions of the prophets, pointed at Christ, and were fulfilled in him. 2. The joy they had of the continuance of it, Lord, it is good for us to be here. There was in this, as in many other of Peter's sayings, a mixture of weakness and of good will, more zeal than discretion.

(1.) Here was a zeal for this converse with heavenly things, a laudable complacency in the sight they had of Christ's glory. Note, Those that by faith behold the beauty of the Lord in his house, cannot but desire to dwell there all the days of their life. It is good having a nail in God's holy place, (Ezra 9. 8.) a constant abode; to be in holy ordinances as a man at home, not as a wayfaring man. Peter thought this mountain was a fine spot of ground to build upon, and he was for making tabernacles there; as Moses in the wilderness made a tabernacle for the Shekinah, or divine glory.

In another place, Peter saw his Master and the heavenly guests, with some commendable forgetfulness of himself and his fellow-disciples, that he would have tabernacles for Christ, and Moses, and Elias, but none for himself. He would be content to lie in the open air, on the cold ground, in such good company; if his Master have but where to lay his head, no matter whether he himself has or no.

(2.) Yet in this zeal he betrayed a great deal of weakness and inconsideration. What need had Moses and Elias of tabernacles? They belonged to that blessed world, where they hunger no more, nor doth the sun shine upon them. Christ had lately foretold his sufferings, and bid his disciples expect the like; Peter forgets that, or, to prevent it, will needs be building tabernacles in the mount of glory, out of the way of trouble. Still he harps upon, Master, spare not. Note, There is a proclivity in good men to expect the crown without the cross. Peter was for laying hold of this as the prize, though he had not as yet fought his fight, nor finished his course, as those other disciples, ch. 20. 21. We are out in our aim, if we look for a heaven here upon earth. It is not for strangers and pilgrims, (such are we in our best circumstances in this world,) to talk of building, or to expect a continuing city.

Yet it is some excuse for the inconstancy of Peter's proposal, not only that he knew not what he said, (Luke 9. 33.) but also that he submitted the proposal to the wisdom of Christ; If thou wilt, let us make tabernacles. Note, Whatever tabernacles we propose to make to ourselves in this world, we must ask it of Christ. Christ is the Master, and the servants must ask the opinions of the Master, Ps. 145. 11, 12.

Now to this which Peter said, there was no reply made; the disappearing of the glory would soon answer it. They that promise themselves great things on this earth, will soon be undeceived by their own experience.

V. The glorious testimony which God the Father gave to our Lord Jesus, in which he received from him honour and glory. (ch. 17. 5.) Note, These things were said in the excellent glory. This was like proclaiming the titles of honour or the royal style of a prince, when, at his coronation, he appears in his robes of state; and be it known, to the comfort of mankind, the royal style of Christ is taken from his mediation. Thus, in vision, he appeared with a rainbow, the seal of the covenant, about his throne; (Rev. 4. 3.) for it is his glory to be our Redeemer.
Now concerning this testimony from heaven to Christ, observe,

1. How it came, and in what manner it was introduced.

(1.) There was a cloud. We find often in the Old Testament, that a cloud was a visible token of God's presence; he came down upon mount Sinai in a cloud, (Exod. 19. 9.) and so to Moses, Exod. 34. 5. Num. 11. 23. He took possession of the tabernacle and the temple, with a cloud that went with him, where Christ was in his glory, the temple was, and there God showed himself present. We know not the balancings of the clouds, but we know that much of the intercourse and communication between heaven and earth is maintained by them. By the clouds evaporis ascend, and rains descend; therefore God is said to make the clouds his chariots; so he did here when he descended upon this mount.

(2.) Under the law it was commonly a thick and dark cloud that God made the token of his presence; he came down upon mount Sinai in a thick cloud, (Exod. 19. 16.) and said he would dwell in thick darkness; see 1 Kings 8. 12. But we are now come, not to the mount that was covered with blackness and darkness, (Heb. 12. 18.) but to the mount that is crowned with a bright cloud. This was given to us, not to see, but to know. This dispensation had tokens of God's presence; but that was a dispensation of darkness, and terror, and bondage; this, of light, love, and liberty.

(3.) It overshadowed them. This cloud was intended to break the force of that great light which otherwise would have overcome the disciples, and have been intolerable; it was like the veil which Moses put upon his face when it shone. God, in manifesting himself to his people, considers their frame. This cloud was to their eyes as parables to their understandings, to convey spiritual things by things sensible, as they were able to bear them.

(4.) There came a voice out of the cloud, and it was the voice of God, who now, as of old, spake in the cloudy pillar, Ps. 99. 7. Here was no thunder, or lightning, or voice of a trumpet, as there was when the law was given by Moses; but only a voice, a still small voice, as in the former, 1 Kings 19. 11, 12. Moses then and Elias were witnesses, that in these last days God hath spoken to us by his Son, in another way than he spake formerly to them. This voice came from the excellent glory, (2 Pet. 1. 17.) the glory which excelleth, in comparison of which the former had no glory; though the excellent glory was clouded, yet they came a bright, for faith cometh by hearing.

2. What testimony from heaven was; This is my beloved Son, hear ye him. Here we have,

(1.) The great gospel-mystery revealed; This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. This was the very same that was spoken from heaven at his baptism; (Luke 3. 22.) and it was the best news that ever came from heaven to earth since man sinned. This is the same with the voice given to the disciples in the garden; (2 Cor. 5. 15.) That God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto itself. Moses and Elias were great men, and favorites of Heaven, yet they were but servants, and servants that God was not always well pleased in; for Moses spake unadvisedly, and Elias was a man subject to passions; but Christ is a Son, and in him God was always well pleased. Moses and Elias were sometimes instruments of reconciliation between God and Israel; Moses was a great intercessor, and Elias a great reformer; but in Christ God is reconciling the world; his intercession is more prevalent than that of Moses, and his reformation more effectual than that of Elias. This repetition of the same voice that came from heaven at his baptism was no vain repetition; but, like the doubting of Pharaoh's dream, was to show the thing was established. What God hath this spoken once, yea, twice, no doubt he will stand to, and he expects we should take notice of it. It was spoken at his baptism, because then he was entering upon his temptation, and his public ministry; and now it was repeated, because he was entering upon his great work, which are to be dated from hence; for now, and not before, he began to foretell them, and display them. Hearken, says it, and hearken immediately; (Luke 9. 51.) that the time was come, that he should be received up; this therefore was then repeated, to arm him against the terror, and his disciples against the offence of the cross. When sufferings begin to abound, consolations are given in more abundantly, 2 Cor. 1. 3.

(2.) The great gospel-duty required, and it is the condition of our benefit by Christ. Hear ye him. God is well pleased with none in Christ but him that hear him. It is not enough to give him the hearing, (what will that avail us?) but we must hear him and believe him, as the great Prophet and Teacher; hear him, and be ruled by him, as the great Prince and Lawgiver; hear him, and heed him. Whoever would know the mind of God, must hearken to Jesus Christ; for by him God has in these last days spake, who is spoken of by all the prophets from Moses and his gospel-duty. ""The sayings of Christ as authentic as if they had been thus spoken out of a cloud. God does here, as it were, turn us over to Christ for all the revelations of his mind; and it refers to that prediction concerning the Prophet God would raise up like unto Moses; (Deut. 18. 15.) him shall ye hear.

Christ now appeared in glory; and the more we see of Christ's glory, the more cause we shall see to hearken to him; and the disciples were gazing on that glory of which they saw; they are therefore bid not to look at him but to hear him. Their sight of his glory was soon intercepted by the cloud, but their business was to hear him. We walk by faith, which comes by hearing, not by sight, 2 Cor. 5. 7.

Moses and Elias were now with him, the law and the prophets; hitherto it was said, Hear them; Luke 16. 29. The disciples were ready to equal them in Christ, when they might have the credentials for them as well as for him. They had been talking with Christ, and probably the disciples were very desirous to know what they said, and to hear something more from them; No, saith God, hear him, and that is enough; him, and not Moses and Elias, who were present, and whose silence gave consent to this voice; they had nothing to say to the contrary; whatever interest they had in the world as prophets, they were willing to see it all transferred to Christ, that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. Be not troubled that Moses and Elias make so short a stay with you; hear Christ, and you will not want them.

VI. The fright which the disciples were put into by this voice, and the encouragement Christ gave them.

1. The disciples fell on their faces, and were sore afraid. The greatness of the light, and the surprise of it might have a natural influence upon them, to dispirit them. But that was not all, ever since man sinned, and heard God's voice in the garden, extraordinary appearances of God have ever been terrible to man, who, knowing he has no reason to expect any good, has been afraid to hear anything immediately from God. Note, Even then when fair weather comes out of the secret place, yet with God is terrible majesty, Job 37. 22. See what dreadful work the voice of the Lord makes, Ps. 29. 4. It is well for us that God speaks to us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid.

2. Christ graciously raised them up, with abundance of tenderness. Note, The glories and advancements of our Lord Jesus do not at all lessen his regard to, and concern for, his people that are compassed about with infirmity. It is comfortable to think, that now, in his exalted state, he has a compassion for all conducent to, the meanest true believer. Observe here, (1.) What he did; he came, and touched them. His approaches banished their fears; and when they apprehended that they were apprehended of Christ, there needed no more to make them easy. Christ laid his right hand upon John in a like case, and upon Daniel, Rev. 1. 17. Dan. 9. 18.—10. 18. Christ's touches were often healing, and when they were strengthening and comforting; (2.) What he said; Arise, and be not afraid. Though a fear of reverence in our converse with Heaven is pleasing to Christ, yet a fear of amazement is not so, but must be strown against. Christ said, Arise. Note, It is by his word, and the power of his grace going along with it, that raises up good men from their dejections, and silences their fears; and none but Christ can do it; Arise, be not afraid. Note, Causeless fears would soon vanish, if we would not yield to them, and lie down under them, but get up, and do what we can against them. Considering what they had seen and heard, they had more reason to rejoice than to fear, and yet, it seems, they needed this caution. Note, Through the infirmity of the flesh, we often frighten ourselves with that wherewith we should encourage ourselves. Observe, He had a new dispensation to give—heaven to hear Christ, the first word they had from him, was, Be not afraid, hear that. Note, Christ's errand into the world, was to give comfort to good people, that, being delivered out of the hands of their enemies, they might serve God without fear, Luke 1. 74, 75.

VII. The disappearing of the vision; (v. 8.) They lift themselves, and then lift up their eyes, and saw no man, save Jesus only. Moses and Elias were gone, the rays of Christ's glory were laid aside, or vailed again. They hoped this had been the day of Christ's entrance into his kingdom, and his public appearance in that external splendour which they dreamed of; but see how they are disappointed. Note, It is not wisdom to raise our expectations high in this world, for the most valuable of our glories and joys have been long since vanishing even from the communion with God are not a continual feast, but a running banquet. If sometimes we are favoured with special manifestations of divine grace, glimpses and pledges of future glory, yet they are withdrawn presently; two heavens are too much for those to expect, that never deserve one. Now they saw no man, save Jesus only. Note, Christ will tarry with us when Moses and Elias are gone. The prophets do not live for ever, (Zech. 1. 3.) and we see the period of our ministers' conversation; but Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, Heb. 13. 7, 8.

VIII. The discourse between Christ and his disciples as they came down from the mountain, v. 9, 13.

Observe, 1. They came down from the mountain. Note, We must come down from the holy mountains, where we have communion with God, and continual communion, and of which we are saying, It is good to be here; even there we have no continuing city. Blessed be God, there is a mountain of glory and joy before us, whence we shall never come down. But observe, When the disciples came down, Jesus came with them. Note, When we return to the world again after an ordinance, it must be our care to take Christ with us, and then it may be said, Our Lord Jesus is with us. 2. As they came down, they talked of Christ. Note, When we are returning from holy ordinances, it is good to entertain ourselves and one another with discourse suitable to the work we have been about. That communication which is good to the use of edifying, is then in a special manner seasonable; as, on the contrary, that which is, corrupt, is worse than that at another time.

Here is, (1.) The charge that Christ gave the disciples to keep the vision very private for the present; (v. 9.) Tell it to no man till the Son of man is risen. If they had proclaimed it, the credulity of it would have been shocked by his sufferings, which were now hastening on. But let the publication of it be adjourned till after his resurrection, and then and his subsequent glory will be a great confirmation of it. Note, Christ observed a method in the manifestation of himself; would have his works put in harmony with his words, and he would illustrate each other, that they might appear in their full strength and convincing evidence. Everything is beautiful in its season. Christ's resurrection was properly the beginning of the gospel-state and kingdom, to which all before was but preparatory and by way of preface; and therefore, though this was transacted before, It must not be produced as evidence till then, and then it appears to have been much insisted on by 2 Pet. 1. 16—18.) when the religion it was designed for the confirmation of was brought to its full consistence and maturity. Christ's time is the best and fittest for the manifesting of himself, and must be attended to by us.

(2.) An objection which the disciples made against something Christ had said; (v. 10.) Where then is the sign of thy coming? If Elias make so short a stay, and is gone so suddenly, and we must say nothing of him; why have we been taught out of the law to expect his public appearance in the world immediately before the setting up of the Messiah's kingdom? Must the coming of Elias be a secret, which every body looks for? Or thus; If the resurrection of the Messiah, and with it the beginning of his kingdom, be at hand, why did not we hear of that glorious preface and introduction to it, which we expect in the coming of Elias? The scribes, who were the public expositors of the law, said this according to the scripture; (Mal. 4. 5.) Behold, I send you Elijah the prophet. The disciples spake the common language of the Jews, who made that the saying of the scribes, which was the saying of the scripture; whereas of that which ministers speak to men, it must ever be, "God speaks it to us, not the ministers;" for we must not receive it as the word of men, 1 Thess. 2. 13. Observe, When the disciples could not reconcile what Christ said with what they had heard out of the Old Testament, they desired him to explain it to them. Note, When we are puzzled with scripture-difficulties, we must apply ourselves to Christ by prayer for his Spirit to open our understandings; and to lead us into all truth.

(3.) The solving of this objection, Ask, and it shall be given; ask instruction, and it shall be given.

1. Christ allows the prediction; (v. 11.) "Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things; so far you are in the right." Christ did not come to alter or invalidate any thing foretold in the Old Testament. Note, Corrupt and mistaken guesses may be sufficiently repelled and exploded, without diminishing or derogating from the authority or dignity of the sacred text. New-Testament prophecies are true and good, and are to be received and improved, though some hot foolish men may have misinterpreted them, and drawn wrong inferences from them. He shall come, and restore all things; not restore them to their former state, (John Baptist went not to do that;) but the kingdom of heaven (so it may be read,) all things that were written of him, all the predictions of the coming of Elias. John Baptist came to restore things spiritually, to revive the decays of religion, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children; which means the same with
This he shall restore all things. John preached repentance, and that restores all things.

[2.] He asserts the accomplishment. The scriptures say true, that Elias shall come; but I say unto you, what the scriptures could not say, that Elias is come, v. 12. Note, God's promises are often fulfilled, and men perceive it not, but inquire, Where is the promise? when it is already performed. Elias is come, and they knew him not; they knew him not to be the Elias promised, the forerunner of the Messiah. The scriptures busied themselves in criticising upon the scripture, but understood not by the signs of the times the fulfilling of the scripture. Note, It is easier to explain the word of God than to apply it and make a right use of it. But it is no wonder that the morning star was not observed, when he who is the Sun itself, was in the world, and the world knew him not.

Because they knew him not, they have done to him whatsoever they listed; if they had known, they would not have crucified Christ, or beheaded John, 1 Cor. 2. 8. They ridiculed John, persecuted him, and at last put him to death; which was Herod's doing, but is here charged upon the whole generation of unbelieving Jews, and particularly the scriptures, who, though they could not prosecute John themselves, yet charge it upon them. Hence, Likewise also shall the Son of man suffer of them. Marvel not that Elias should be abused and killed by those who pretended, with a great deal of reverence, to expect him, when the Messias himself will be in like manner treated. Note, The sufferings of Christ took off the strangeness of all other sufferings; (John 15. 18.) when they had imbrued their hands in the blood of John Baptist, they were ready to do the like to Christ. Note, As men deal with Christ's servants, so they would deal with him himself: and they that are drunk with the blood of the martyrs, still cry, Give, give, Acts 12. 1-3.

(4.) The disciples' satisfaction in Christ's reply to their objection; (v. 13.) They understood that he spoke unto them of John the Baptist. He did not name John, but gives them such a description of him as would put them in mind of what he had said to them formerly concerning him; This is Elias. This is a profitable way of teaching; it engages the learners' own thoughts, and makes them, if not their own teachers, yet their own remembrancers; and thus knowledge becomes easy to him that understands. When we diligently use the means of knowledge, how strangely are misfits scattered and mistakes rectified!

14. And when they were come to the multitude, there came to him a certain man, kneeling down to him, and saying, 15. Lord, have mercy on my son; for he is lunatic, and sore vexed: for oft-times he fell into the fire, and oft into the water. 16. And I brought him to thy disciples, and they could not cure him. 17. Then Jesus answered and said, O faithless and perverse generation! how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Bring him hither to me. 18. And Jesus rebuked the devil, and he departed out of him: and the child was cured from that very hour. 19. Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could not we cast him out? 20. And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you. 21. Howbeit this kind goeth not out, but by prayer and fasting.

We have here the miraculous cure of a child that was lunatic and vexed with a devil. Observe, 1. A melancholy representation of the case of this child, while he lay under the power and malice of Satan. This was immediately upon his coming down from the mountain where he was transfigured. Note, Christ's glories do not make him mindful of us and of our wants and miseries. Christ, when he came down from the mount, where he had conversation with Moses and Elias, did not take state upon him, but was as easy of access, as ready to poor beggars, and as familiar with the multitude, as ever he used to be. This poor man's address was very important; he came kneeling to Christ. Note, Sense of misery will bring people to their knees. Those who see their need of Christ, will be earnest, will be in good earnest, in their applications to him; and he delights to be thus wrested with.

Two things the father of the child complains of. I. The distress of his child; (v. 15.) Lord, have mercy on my son. The affliction of the children cannot but affect the tender parents, for they are pieces of themselves. And the case of afflicted children should be presented to God by faithful and fervent prayer. This child's distemper, probably, disabled him to pray for himself. Note, Parents are doubly concerned to pray for their children, not only that are weak and cannot, but much more that are wicked and will not, pray for them. Note, (1.) The nature of this child's disease was very sad; He is lunatic and sore vexed. A lunatic is properly one whose distemper lies in the brain, and returns with the change of the moon. The devil, by the divine permission, either caused this distemper, or at least concurred with it, to heighten and aggravate it. The child had the falling-sickness, and the hand of Satan was in it; by it he tormented them, and made it much more grievous than ordinarily it is. These whom Satan got possession of, he afflicted by those diseases of the body which do most affect the mind; for it is the soul that he aims to do mischief to. The father, in his complaint, saith, He is lunatic, taking notice of the effect; but Christ, in the cure, rebuked the devil, and so struck at the cause. Thus he dealt in spiritual cures. (2.) The effects of the disease were very deplorable; He falls into the fire, and into the water. If the force of the disease made him fall, the malice of the devil made him fall into the fire or water; so mischievous is he where he gains possession and power in any soul. He seeks to devour, 1 Pet. 5. 8.

2. The disappointment of his expectation from the disciples; (v. 16.) I brought him to thy disciples, and they could not cure him. Then Jesus answered and said, O faithless and perverse generation! how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Bring him hither to me. And Jesus rebuked the devil, and he departed out of him: and the child was cured from that very hour. Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could not we cast him out? And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain failures of instruments shall not hinder the operations of his grace, which will work, if not by them, yet without them.

_ST. MATTHEW, XVII._

II. God in his kindness to his Church, chose the means that Christ gave to the people first, and then to the devil.

1. He chid those about him; (v. 17.) 0 faithless and perseverance! This is not spoken to the disciples, but to the people, and perhaps especially to the scribes, who are mentioned in Mark 9. 14. and who, as it should seem, insulted over the disciples, because they had now met with a case that was too hard for them. Christ has not the less cause to do not make mighty works among a people in whom unbelief reigned. It was here owing to the faithlessness of this generation, that they could not obtain those blessings from God, which otherwise they might have had; as it was owing to the weakness of the disciples' faith, that they could not do those works for God, which otherwise they might have done. Those were faithless and perseverance. Note, Those that are faithless, will be perverse; and perseverance is sin in its worst colours. Faith is compliance with God, unbelief is opposition and contradiction to God. Israel of old was perverse, because faithless, (Ps. 95. 9.) froward, for in them is no faith, Deut. 32. 20.

Two things he upbraids them with. (1.) His presence with them so long; "How long shall I be with you, and bear with you? " (v. 21.) His patience with them so long; "How long shall I suffer you? " Note, [1.] The faithlessness and perseverance of those who enjoy the means of grace are a great grief to the Lord Jesus. Thus did he suffer the manners of Israel of old, Acts 13. 18. [2.] The longer Christ has borne with a perverse and faithless people, the more he is displeased with their perseverance and unbelief; and he is God, and not man, else he would not suffer so long, nor bear so much as he doth.

2. He cured the child, and set him to rights again. He was chid, and him hitter to me. Though the people were perverse, and Christ was provoked, yet care was taken of the child. Note, Though Christ may be angry, he is never unkind, nor doth he, in the greatest of his displeasure, shut up the bowels of his compassion from the miserable; Bring him to me. Note, When all other helps and succours fail, we are welcome to Christ, and may be confident in him and his power and goodness.

See by these an emblem of Christ's undertaking as our Redeemer.

1. He breaks the power of Satan; (v. 18.) Jesus rebuked the devil, as one having authority, who could back with force his word of command. Note, Christ's victories over Satan are obtained by the power of his word, the sword that comes out of his mouth, Rev. 19. 21. Satan cannot stand before the rebukes of his Jesus; they have been so long. It is comfortable to think he is wrestling with principalities and powers, that Christ hath spoiled them, Coloss. 2. 15. The Lion of the tribe of Judah will be too hard for the roaring lion that seeks to devour.

2. He redresses the grievances of the children of men; The child was cured from that very hour. It with you? Will you take care, and a perfect one. This is an encouragement to parents to bring their children to Christ, whose souls are under Satan's power; he is able to heal them, and as willing as he is able. Not only bring them to Christ by prayer, but bring them to the word of Christ, the ordinary means by which Satan's strong holds are demolished in the soul. Christ's rebukes, brought home to the heart, will ruin Satan's power.

III. Christ's discourse with his disciples hereupon.

1. The reason why they could not cast out the devil at this time; (v. 19.) They came to Jesus afar. Note, Ministers, who are to deal for Christ in public, have need to keep up a private communion with him, that they may in secret, where no eye sees, baffle their weaknecess and straitness, their foibles and infirmities, in their public performances, and inquire into the cause of them. We could not be more careful of success with Jesus afar, where we may be free and particular with him. Such questions as the disciples put to Christ, we should put to ourselves, in communicating with our own hearts upon our beds; Why were we so dull and careless at such a time? Why came we so much short in such a duty? That which is amiss, may, when found out, be amended.

2. Christ gives them two reasons why they failed. (1.) It was because of their unbelief; v. 20. When he spake to the father of the child and to the people, he charged it upon their unbelief; when he spake to his disciples, he charged it upon theirs; for the truth was, there were faults on both sides; but we are more concerned to hear of our own faults than of other people's, and to impute what is amiss to ourselves than to others. When the preaching of the word was not in season, sometimes it has been, the people are apt to lay all the fault upon the ministers, and the ministers upon the people; whereas, it is more becoming for each to own his own faultiness, and so say, "It is owing to me." Ministers, in reproving, must learn thus to give to each his portion of the word; and to take people off from judging others, by teaching all to judge themselves; It is because of your unbelief. Though they had not done a thing to deserve it, yet that fault seems the more a reason, and so it is, because it is ineffectual. Note, [1.] As far as faith falls short of its due strength, vigour, and activity, it may truly be said, "There is unbelief." Many are chargeable with unbelief, who yet are not to be called unbelievers. [2.] It is because of our unbelief, that we bring so little to pass in religion, and so often miscarry, and come short, in that which is good.

Our Lord Jesus takes this for a general reason, that people are faithless, that they might not be defective in that, another time, as they were now; If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall do wonders, v. 20. Some make the comparison to refer to the quality of the mustard seed, which is, when bruised, sharp and penetrating; "If you have an active, growing faith, not dead, flat, or insipid, you will not be baffled thus." But it rather refers to the quantity, though you had but a grain of true faith, though so little, that it were like that which is the least of all seeds, you would do wonders. Faith in general is a firm assent to, a compliance with, and a confidence in, all divine revelation. The faith here required, is that which had for its object that particular revelation by which Christ gave his disciples power to work miracles in his name, for the confirmation of the doctrine they preached. It refers to his miracles, and not to individual instances, in either doubting the validity of their commission, or fearing that it was expired with their first mission, and was not to continue when they were returning to their Master; or that it was some way or other forfeited or withdrawn. Perhaps their Master's absence with the three chief of his disciples, with a charge to the rest not to follow them, might occasion some doubts concerning their power, or rather the power of the Lord with them, to do this; however, there were not at present, such a strong actual dependence upon, and confidence in, the promise of Christ's presence with them, as there should have been. It is good for us to be diffident of ourselves and of our own strength; but it is displeasing to Christ, when we distract any power derived from him or granted by him.

If ye have ever so little of this faith in sincerity, if ye truly rely upon the powers committed to you, shall I tell you, it were. An active proverbial expression, denoting that which follows, and no more. Nothing shall be impossible to you. They had a full commission, among other things, to cast out devils without exception; but, this devil being more than ordinarily malicious and inveterate, they distrusted the power they had received, and so failed. To convince them of this, Christ shows them what they might have done. Note, A man without a sense of及 as the virtue of a divine power engaged by a divine promise, both which faith fastens upon.

(2.) Because there was something in the kind of the malady, which rendered the cure more than ordinarily difficult; (v. 21.) "This kind goes not out but by prayer and fasting." This possession, which works by a falling sickness, or this kind of devil's that are thus furious, is not cast out ordinarily, but by great acts of devotion, and therein ye were defective." Note, [1.] Though the adversaries we wrestle with, be all principalities and powers, yet some are stronger than others, and their power more hardly broken. [2.] The extraordinary power of Satan must not discourage our faith, but quicken us to a greater intenseness in the acting of it, and more earnestness in praying to God for it. The producing of a cure more extraordinary, does not make it more miraculous, nor does it restrain it here; "This kind of faith (which removeth mountains) doth not proceed, is not obtained, from God, nor is it carried up to its full growth, nor drawn out into act and exercise, but by earnest prayer." [3.] Fasting and prayer are proper means for the bringing down of Satan's power against us, and the fetching in of divine power to our assistance. Fasting is of use to prepare the body, and prayer, to prepare the mind, both for the reception of grace, and for the exercise of faith: and is an evidence and instance of humiliation, which is necessary in prayer, and is a means of mortifying some corrupt habits, and of disposing the body to serve the soul in prayer. When the devil's interest in the soul is confirmed by the temper and constitution of the body, fasting must be joined with prayer, to keep under the body.

22. And while they abode in Galilee, Jesus said unto them, The Son of man shall be betrayed into the hands of men; 23. And they shall kill him, and the third day he shall be raised again. And they were exceeding sorry.

Christ here foretells his own sufferings; he began to do it before; (ch. 16. 21.) and, finding that it was to his disciples a hard saying, he saw it necessary to keep them from this evil, and therefore he added some things which God spakeeth once, even, twice, and yet man perceiveth it not. Observe here.

1. What he foretold concerning himself—that he should be betrayed and killed. He perfectly knew, before, all things that should come to him, and yet undertook the work of our redemption, which greatly commends his love; nay, his clear foresight of them was a kind of antetype, had not his love to man made him all this to come to pass.

(1.) He tells them that he should be betrayed into the hands of men. He shall be delivered up; (so it might be read, and understood of his Father's delivering him up by his determined counsel and foreknowledge, Acts 2. 23. Rom. 8. 32.) but as we render it, it refers to Judas's betraying him into the hands of the priests, and their betraying him into the hands of the Romans. He was betrayed into the hands of men; men, to whom he was allied by nature, and from whom therefore he might expect pity and tenderness; men, whom he had undertaken to save, and from whom therefore he might expect honour and gratitude; yet these are his persecutors and murderers.

(2.) That they should kill him; nothing less than that would satisfy their rage; it was his blood, his precious blood, that they thirsted after. This is the heir, come, let us kill him. Nothing less would satisfy God's justice, and answer his undertaking; if he be a Sacrifice of atonement, he must be killed; without blood no remission.

(3.) That he shall be raised again the third day. Still, when he spoke of his death, he gave a hint of his resurrection, the joy set before him, in the prospect of which he endured the cross, and despised the shame. This was an encouragement, not only to him, but to his disciples; for if he rise the third day, his absence from them will not be long, and his return to them will be glorious.

2. How the disciples received this; They were exceeding sorry. Herein appeared their love to their Master's person, but with all their ignorance and mistake concerning his undertaking. Peter indeed durst not say anything against it, as he had done before, (ch. 16. 22.) having then been severely chidden for it; but he, and the rest of them, greatly lamented it, as it would be their own loss, their Master's grief, and the sin and ruin of them that did it.

24. And when they were come to Capernaum, they that received tribute-money came to Peter, and said, Dost not thy master pay tribute? 25. He saith, Yes. And when he was come into the house, Jesus prevented him, saying, What thinkest thou, Simon? of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute of their own children, or of strangers? Peter saith unto him, Of strangers. Jesus saith unto him, Then are the children free. 27. Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money: that take, and give unto them for me and thee.

We have here an account of Christ's paying tribute.

I. Observe how it was demanded, v. 24. Christ was now at Capernaum, his head-quarters, where he mostly resided; he did not keep from thence, to decline being called upon for his dues, but the rather readiness to pay them.

1. The tribute demanded was not any civil payment to the Roman powers, that was strictly exacted by the publicans, but the church-duties, the half shekel, about fifteen pence, which was required from every person for the service of the temple, and the detracting of the expenses of the worship there; it is called a ransom for the soul, Exod. 30. 12, &c. This was not so strictly exacted now as sometimes it had been, especially not in Galilee.

2. The demand was very modest; the collectors stood in such awe of Christ, because of his mighty works, that they durst not speak to him about it, but applied themselves to Peter, whose house was in Capernaum, and probably in his house Christ lodged, he therefore was fittest to be spoken to as the housekeeper, and they presumed he knew his Master's mind. Their question is, Dost not thy master pay tribute? Some think that they sought an occasion against him, design, if he refused, to represent him as disaffected to the temple-service, and his followers as lawless people, that would pay neither toll, tribute, nor custom, Ezra 4. 13. It should rather seem, they asked this with respect, intimation of their object and view in demanding from this payment, they would not insist upon it.

Peter presently passed his word, for his Master: "Yes, certainly; my Master pays tribute; it is his principle and practice; you need not fear moving it to him." (1.) He was made under the law; (Gal. 4. 4.) therefore under this law he was paid for at forty days old, (Luke 2. 22.) and now he paid for himself, it being with his own money, taken upon him the form of a servant, Phil. 2. 7, 8. (2.) He was made sin for us, and was sent forth in the likeness of sinful flesh, Rom. 8. 3. Now this tax paid to the temple, is called an atonement for the soul, Exod. 30. 15. Christ, that in every thing he might appear in the likeness of sinners, paid it, though he had no sin to atone for. (3.) This it became him to fulfill all righteousness, ch. 4. 15. He did this, to set us an example, [1.] Of rendering to all their due; tribute to whom tribute is due, Rom. 13. 7. The kingdom of Christ not being of this world, the favourites and officers of it are so far from having a power granted them, as such, to tax other people's purses, that theirs are made liable to the powers that are. [2.] Of contributing to the support of the church and its ministry, and the poor where they are. If we reap spiritual things, it is fit that we should return carnal things. The temple was now made a den of thieves, and the temple-worship a pretence for the opposition which the chief priests gave to Christ and his doctrine; and yet Christ paid this tribute.

Note, Church-duties, legally imposed, are to be paid, notwithstanding church-corruptions. We must take care not to use our liberties as a cloak of covetousness or malice, Jas. 5. 16. If Christ pay tribute, who can pretend an exemption?

II. How it was disputed, (v. 25.) not with the collectors themselves, lest they should be irritated, but with Peter, that he might be satisfied in the reason why Christ paid tribute, and might not mistake about it. He brought the collectors into the house; but Christ anticipated him, to give him a proof of his premillennial, and that no part might be withheld from him. The disciples of Christ are never attacked without his knowledge.

Now, 1. He appeals to the way of the kings of the earth, which is, to take tribute of strangers, of the subjects of their kingdom, or foreigners that deal with them, but not of their own children that are of their families; there is such a community of goods between parents and children, and a joint interest in what they have, that it would be absurd for the parents to levy taxes upon the children, or demand any thing from them; it is like one hand taxing the other.

2. He applies this to himself; Then are the children free. Christ is the Son of God, and heir of all things; the temple is his house. (Mal. 3. 1.) his Father's house, (John 2. 16.) in it he is faithful as a Son through his house; (Heb. 3. 6.) and therefore not obliged to pay this tax for the service of the temple. This Christ asserts his right, lest his paying this tribute should be misapplied to the weakening of his title as the Son of God, and the King of Israel, and should have looked like a disowning of it himself. These immunities of the children are to be extended no further than our Lord Jesus himself.

God's children are freed by grace and adoption, frequently and expressly, from all law of life; from subjectation to civil magistrates in civil things; here the law of Christ is express; Let every soul (sanctified souls not excepted) be subject to the higher powers. Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.

III. How it was paid, notwithstanding, (v. 27.)

1. For what reason Christ waked his privilege, and paid this tribute, though he was entitled to an exemption—Let us stand alone. Few knew, as Peter did, that he was the Son of God; and it should have been a diminution to the honour of that great name. Christ might be very ready to surprise the tax-gatherer, and be sorry to disturb him, though he were the son of God, we live but from hand to mouth. Christ made the fish his cashkeeper; and why may not we make God's providence our storeroom and treasury? If we have a competency for to-day, let to-morrow take thought for the things of itself. Christ paid for himself and

2. What course he took for the payment of this tax; he furnished himself with money for it out of the mouth of a fish, (v. 27.) wherein appears,

(1.) The poverty of Christ; he had not fifteen pence at command to pay his tax with, though he cured so many that were diseased; it seems, he did all gratis; for our sakes he became poor, 2 Cor. 8. 9. In his ordinary expenses, he lived upon alms, (Luke 8. 3.) and in extraordinary ones he lived by a miracle. He did not drain out of the bag which he carried; that was for subsistence, and he would not order that for his particular use, which was intended for the benefit of the community.

(2.) The power of Christ, in fetching money out of a fish's mouth for this purpose. Whether his omnipotence put it there, or his omniscience knew that it was there, it comes all to one; no such evidence of his divinity, and that he is Lord of hosts. Those creatures that are most remote from man, are at the command of Christ, even the fishes of the sea are under his feet; (Ps. 8. 5.) and to evidence his dominion in this lower world, and to accommodate himself to his present state of humiliation, he chose to take it out of a fish's mouth, when he could have taken it out of any other bag.

[1.] Peter must catch the fish by angling. Even in miracles he would use means to encourage industry and endeavour. Peter has something to do, and it is in the way of his old calling too; to teach us diligence in the employment we are called to, and called in. Do we expect that Christ should give to us? Let us be ready to work for him.

[2.] The fish came up, with money in the mouth of it; which represents to us the reward of obedience in obedience. What work do we at Christ's command, brings its own pay along with it: In keeping God's commands, as well as after keeping them, there is great reward, Ps. 19. 11. Peter was made a fisher of men, and those that he caught thus, came up; where the heart is opened to entertain Christ's word, the hand is open to encourage his ministers.
Peter, because it is probable that here he only was assessed, and of him it was at this time demanded; perhaps the rest had paid already, or were to pay elsewhere. The papists made a great mystery of Christ's paying for Peter, as if this made him the head and representative of the whole church; whereas the payment of tribute for him, was rather a sign of subjection than of superiority. His pretended successors pay no tribute, but exact it. Peter fished for his money, and therefore part of it went for his use. Those that are workers together with Christ in winning the world, shall shine with him in his glory, and shall shine with him. Give it to thee and me. What Christ paid for himself was looked upon as a debt; what he paid for Peter, was a courtesy to him.

Note, It is a desirable thing, if God so please, to have wherewith of this world's goods, not only to be just, but to be kind; not only to be charitable to the poor, but obliging to our friends. What is a great estate good for, but that it enables a man to do so much the more good?

Lastly, Observe, The evangelist records here the orders Christ gave to Peter, the warrant; the effect is not particularly mentioned, but taken for granted, and justly; for with Christ, saying and doing are the same thing.

CHAP. XVIII.

The gospels are, in short, a record of what Jesus began both to do and to teach. In them, therefore, we have an account of his doings, in this of his teachings; probably, not all at the same time, in a continued discourse, but at several times, upon divers occasions, here put together, as not souls, shall be sharers with Christ in his glory. v. 1. 6. II. Concerning offences in general, (v. 7.) particularly offences given. 1. By us to ourselves, v. 8, 9. 2. By us to others, v. 10., 14. 3. By others to us; which are to be reproved, v. 15., 20. (2.) Personal wrongs, which are to be forgiven, v. 21., 35. See how practical Christ's preaching was; he could have revealed mysteries, but he pressed plain duties, especially those that are most displeasing to flesh and blood.

1. At the same time came the disciples unto Jesus, saying, Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven? 2. And Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them. 3. And said, Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. 4. Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven. 5. And whoso shall receive one such little child in my name, receiveth me. 6. But whoso shall offend one of these little ones among you, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.

As there never was a greater pattern of humility, so there never was a greater preacher of it, than Christ; he took all occasions to command it, to commend it, to his disciples and followers.

1. The occasion of this discourse concerning humility was, an unbecoming contest among the disciples for preeminence; they came to him, saying, among themselves, (Mark xiii. 34.) Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven? They mean not, who by character, (then the question had been good, that they might know what graces and duties to excel in,) but who by name. They had heard much, and preached much, of the kingdom of heaven, the kingdom of the Messiah, his church in this world; but as yet they were little aware of the pure spiritual and heavenly nature of that kingdom, and of the dreamt of a temporal kingdom, and the external pomp and power of it. Christ had lately foretold his sufferings, and the glory that should follow, that he should rise again, from whence they expected his kingdom would commence; and now they thought it was time to put in for their places in it; it is good, in such cases, to speak early. Upon other discourses of Christ to that purpose, debates of this kind arose; (ch. 20. 19, 20.) afterwards he spake many words of his sufferings, but only one of his glory; yet they fasten upon that, and overlook the other; and, instead of asking how they might have strength and grace to suffer with him, they ask him, Who shall be highest in reigning with him? Note, Many love to hear and speak of privileges and glory, who are willing to pass by the thoughts of work and trouble. They look so much at the crown, that they forget the yoke and the cross. So the disciples here did, when they asked, Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?

1. They suppose that all who have a place in that kingdom, are great, for it is a kingdom of priests. Note, Those are truly great, who are truly good; and they will appear so at last, when Christ shall own them as his, though ever so mean and poor in the world.

2. They suppose that there are degrees in this greatness. All the saints are honourable, but not all alike so; one star differs from another star in glory. All David's officers were not worthies, nor all his worthies of the first three.

3. They suppose it must be some of them, that must be prime ministers of state. To whom should King Jesus delight to do honour, but to them who had left all for him? and were now his companions in reverence and tribulation?

4. They strive who it should be, each having some pretence or other to it. Peter was always the chief speaker, and already had the keys given him; he expects to be lord chancellor, or lord chamberlain of the household, and so to be the greatest. Judas had the bag, and therefore he expects to be lord treasurer, which, though now he come last, he still will have; he will be sharers with him, and Judas are nearly related to Christ, and they hope to take place of all the great officers of state, as princes of the blood. John is the beloved disciple, the favourite of the Prince, and therefore hopes to be the greatest. Andrew was first called, and why should not he be first preferred? Note, We are very apt to amuse and humour ourselves with foolish fancies of things that will never be.

II. The discourse itself, which is a just refutation to the question, Who shall be greatest? We have abundant reason to think, that if Christ ever intended that Peter and his successors at Rome should be heads of the church, and his chief vicars on earth, having so far an occasion given him, he would now have let his disciples know it; but so far is he from this, that his answer disallows and condemns the thing itself. Christ will not lodge such an authority or supremacy any where in his church; whoever pretend to it, are usurpers; instead of settling any of the discourses in this dignity, he warns them all not to put in for it.

Christ here teacheth them to be humble.

1. By a sign; (v. 2.) He called a little child to him, and set him in the midst of them. Christ often taught by signs or sensible representations, (comparisons to the eye,) as the prophets of old. Note, how much we have less learned, that we are taught by all ways and means to be taught. When we look upon a little child, we should be put in mind of the use Christ made of this child. Sensible things must be improved to spiritual purposes. He set him in the midst of them; not that they might play with him that they might learn by him. Great men, and great men, should not disdain the company of little children, or think it below them to take notice of them. They may either speak to them, and give instruction to them; or look upon them, and receive instruction from them. Christ himself, when a Child, was in the midst of the doctors, Luke 2. 46.

2. By a sermon upon this sign, in which he shows the necessity of humility.

(1.) The necessity of humility, v. 3. His preface is solemn, and commands both attention and assent:

Verily I say unto you, I, the Amen, the faithful Witness, say it. Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Here observe,

[1.] What it is that he requires and intends. First, You must be converted, you must be of another mind, and in another frame and temper, must have other thoughts, both of yourselves, and of the kingdom of heaven, before you be fit for a place in it. The pride, ambition, and affectation of honour and dominion, which appear in you, must be repented of, mortified, and reformed, and you must come to yourselves. Note, Beside the first conversion of faith from a state of nature to a state of grace, there is an after-conversion to a particular path of backsliding, which are equally necessary to salvation. Every step out of the way by sin, must be a step into it again by repentance. When Peter repented of his denying his Master, he was converted. Secondly, You must become as little children. Note, Converting grace makes us like little children, not foolish as children, (1 Cor. 14. 20.) nor fickle, (Eph. 4. 14.) nor playful, (ch. 11. 16.) but, as children, we must desire the sincere milk of the word; (1 Pet. 2. 2.) as children, we must be careful for nothing, but leave it to our heavenly Father to care for us; (ch. 6. 31.) we must, as children, be harmless and inoffensive, and void of malice, (1 Cor. 14. 20.) governable, and under command; (Gal. 4. 2.) and (which is here chiefly intended) we must be humble as little children, who do not take state upon them, nor stand upon the punctilios of honour; the child of a gentleman will play with the child of a beggar, (Rom. 12. 16.) the child in rags, if it have the breast, is well enough pleased with, and envies not, the gruity of the child in silk; little children have no great aims at great places, or projects to raise themselves in the world; they exercise not themselves in things too high for their state; childlike manner behave, and quiet ourselves, Ps. 131. 1, 2. As children are little in body and low in stature, so we must be little and low in spirit, and in our thoughts of ourselves. This is a temper which leads to other good dispositions; the age of childhood is the learning age.

[2.] What stress he lays upon this; Without this you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Note, Disciples of Christ have need to be kept in awe of their Lord, that they may not be bold, that they may seem to come short, Heb. 4. 1. The disciples, when they put that question, (v. 1.) thought themselves sure of the kingdom of heaven; but Christ awakens them to be jealous of themselves. They were ambitious of being greatest in the kingdom of heaven; Christ tells them, that, except they came to a better temper, they should never come thither. Note, Many things set up for great things, which are little. Not only little, but nothing, and are found to have no part or lot in the matter. Our Lord designs here to show the great danger of pride and ambition; whatever profession men make, if they allow themselves in this sin, they will be rejected both from God's tabernacle and from his holy hill. Pride threw the angels that sinned, out of heaven, and will keep us out, if we be not converted from it. They that are lifted up with pride, fall into the condemnation of the devil; to prevent this, we must become as little children, or we shall never enter into the kingdom of heaven. We must put on the new man, must be like the holy child Jesus; so he is called even after his ascension, Acts 4. 27.

(2.) He shows the honour and advancement that attend humility, (v. 4.) thus furnishing a direct but surprising answer to their question; He that humbles himself as a little child, though he may fear he will remain among men of timid minds, who thereby throw themselves out of the way of preferment, yet the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven. Note, The humblest christians are the best christians, and most like to Christ, and highest in his favour; are best disposed for the communications of divine grace, and fittest to serve God in this world, and enjoy him in another. They are great, for God overlooks heaven and earth, to look on such; and certainly those are to be most respected and honoured in the church, that are most humble and self-denying; for though they least seek it, they best deserve it.

(3.) The special care Christ takes for those that are humble; he espouses their cause, protects them, interests himself in their concerns, and will see that they are not wronged, without being righted. Those that thus humble themselves, will be afraid.

[1.] That nobody will receive them; but, (v. 5.) Whoso shall receive one such little child in my name, receiveth me. Whatever kindesses are done to such, Christ takes as done to himself. Whoso entertains a meek and humble christian, keeps him in consequence, will not let him lose by his modesty, takes him into his love and friendship, and society and care, and studies to do him a kindeness; and doth this in Christ's name, for his sake, because he bears the image of Christ, serves Christ, and because Christ has received him; this shall be accepted, and recompensed as an acceptable piece of respect to Christ. Observe, though it be but one such little child that is received in Christ's name, it shall be accepted. Note, The tender regard Christ has to his church, extends itself to every particular member, even the meanest; not only to the whole family, but to every child of the family; the less they are in themselves, to whom we show kindeness, the more there is of good will in it to Christ; the less it is for their sakes, the more it is for his; and he takes it accordingly. If Christ were personally among us, we think we should be welcome to him; the poor, the poor in spirit, we have always with us, and they are his receivers. See ch. 25. 35-40.

[2.] They will be afraid that every body will abuse them; the basest men delight to trample upon the humble; Verax census columbas—censura pounces on doves. This objection he obviates, (v. 6.) where he says, When the son of man shall come in his kingdom, then shall ye receive the hidden treasures in heaven, Matt. 6. 19. But most peril, not to offer any injury to one of Christ's little ones. This word makes a wall of fire about them; he that touches them, touches the apple of God's eye.

Observe, First, The crime supposed; offending one of these little ones that believe in Christ. Their believing in Christ, though they be little ones, unites them to him, so that, as they partake of the benefit of his grace, they partake of his concern for theirs, and interests him in their cause. Even the little ones that believe, have the same privileges with the great ones, for they have all obtained like precious faith. There are those that offend these little ones, by drawing them to sin, (1 Cor. 8. 10. 11.) grieving and vexing their righteous souls, dis couraging them, taking occasion from their mild ness to make a prey of them in their persons, families, goods, or good name. Thus the best men have often met with the worst treatment in this world.

Secondly, The punishment of this crime; intimated in that word, Better for him that he were drowned in the depth of the sea. The sin is so heinous, and the ruin proportionably so great, that he had better undergo the sorest punishments inflicted on the worst of manufacturers, which can only kill the body. Note, 1. Hell is worse than the depth of the sea; for it is a bottomless pit, and it is a burning lake. The depth of the sea is only killing, but hell is tormenting. We meet with one that had comfort in the depth of the sea, it was Jonah; (ch. 2. 2. 4.) but never any had the least grain or glimpse of comfort in hell, nor will have to eternity. 2. The irreparable, irrevocable doom of the great Judge, will sink sooner and surer, and bind faster, than a millstone hanged about the neck. It fixes a great gulf, which can never be broken through, Luke 16. 26. Offending Christ's little ones, though by omission, is ascribed as the reason of that dreadful sentence, Go ye cursed, which will at last be the doom of proud persecutors.

7. Woe unto the world because of offences! for it must needs be that offences come; but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh! 3. Wherefore, if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life hale or maimed, rather than having two hands, or two feet, to be cast into everlasting fire. 9. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into hell-fire. 10. Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven. 11. For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost. 12. How think ye? If a man have an hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth into the mountains, and seek that which is gone astray? 13. And if so be that he find it, verily I say unto you, He rejoiceth more of that sheep, than of the ninety and nine which went not astray. 14. Even so, it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish.

Our Saviour here speaks of offences, or scandals, I. In general, v. 7. Having mentioned the offending of little ones, he takes occasion to speak more generally of offences. That is an offence, 1. Which occasions guilt, which by enticement or affrightment tends to draw men from that which is good to that which is evil. 2. Which occasions grief, which makes the heart of the righteous sad. Now, concerning offences, Christ here tells thee the only thing that is found there, it is morally impossible but that there should be offences; and God has determined to permit them for wise and holy ends, that both they which are perfect, and they which are not, may be made manifest. See 1 Cor. 11. 19. Dan. 11. 35. Being told, before, that there will be seducers, tempters, persecutors, and many bad examples, let us stand upon our guard.

(2.) That they would be woful things, and the consequence of them fatal. Here is a double woe annexed to offences:

[1.] A woe to the careless and ungodly, to whom the offence is given; Woe to the world because of offences. The obstructions and oppositions given to faith and holiness in all places, are the bane and plague of mankind, and the ruin of thousands. This present world is an evil world, it is so full of offences, of sins, and snares, and sorrows; a dangerous road we travel, full of stumbling-blocks, precipices, and false guides. Woe to the world. As for those whom God hath chosen and called out of the world, and delivered from it, they are preserved by the power of God from the prejudice of these offences, are helped over all these stones of stumbling. They that hear God's law in great peace, and nothing shall offend them, Ps. 119. 166. 167.

[2.] A woe to the wicked, who wilfully give the offence; But woe to that man by whom the offence cometh. Though it must needs be, that the offence will come, that will be no excuse for the offenders. Note, Though God makes the sins of sinners to serve his purposes, that will not secure them from his wrath: and the guilt will be laid at the door of those who give the offence, though they also fall under a judgment, who take it. Note, They who any way hinder the salvation of others will find their own condemnation the more intolerable, like Jeroboam, who sinned and made Israel to sin. This woe is the moral of that judicial law, (Exod. 21. 33. 34.—22. 6.) that he who opened the pit, and kindled the fire, was accountable for all the damage that ensued. The antichristian generation, by whom came the great offence, will fall under this woe, for their delusion of sinners, (2 Thess. 2. 11. 12.) and their persecutions of saints, (Rev. 17. 1. 2. 6.) for the righteous God will reckon with those who ruin the eternal interests of precious souls, and the temporal interests of precious saints; for precious in the sight of the Lord is the blood of souls and the blood of saints; and men will be reckoned with, not only for their doings, but for the fruit of their doings, the mischief done by their example.

II. In particular, Christ here speaks of offences given.

1. By us to ourselves, which is expressed by our hand or foot offending us; in such a case, it must be cut off, v. 8. 9. This Christ had said before, (ch. 5. 29. 30.) where it especially refers to seventh-commandments; here it is taken more generally. Note, Those hard savings of Christ, which are displeasing to carnal minds, and may be called in contemptuous speeches, are again and again, and all little enough. Now observe,

(1.) What it is that is here enjoined. We must part with an eye, or a hand, or a foot, that is, that, whatever it is, which is dear to us, when it proves unavoidably an occasion of sin to us. Note, [1.] Many prevailing temptations to sin arise from within ourselves; our own eyes and hands offend us; if there were never a devil to tempt us, we should be drawn away, of our own nature, from the good. [2.] What is itself good, and may be used as instruments of good, even those, through the corruptions of our hearts, prove snares to us, incline us to sin, and hinder us in duty. [2.] In such a case, we must, as far as lawfully we may, part with that which we cannot keep without being entangled in sin by it.

First, It is certain, the inward lust must be mortified, though it be dear to us as an eye, or a hand. The flesh, with its affections and lusts, must be mortified. Gal. 5. 24. As the body of sin must be destroyed; corrupt inclinations and appetites must be checked and crossed; the beloved lust, that has been rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, must be abandoned with abhorrence. Secondly, The outward occasions of sin must be avoided, though we thereby put as great a violence upon ourselves as it would be to cut off a hand, or pluck out an eye. When Christ, as in His body of flesh, was exposed for fear of being ensnared in the idolatry of it, and when Moses quit Pharaoh's court, for fear of being entangled in the sinful pleasures of it, there was a right hand cut off. We must think nothing too dear to part with, for the keeping of a good conscience.

(2.) Upon what inducement this is required; It is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than, having two hands, to be cast into hell. The argument is taken from the future state, from heaven and hell; thence are fetched the most cogent dissuasive from sin. The argument is the same with that of the apostle; (Rom. 8. 13.) [*1.] If we live after the flesh, we must die; having two eyes, no breaches made upon the body of sin, inbred corruption, like Adonijah, never displeased, we shall be cast into hell. Through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body, we shall not enter into life maimed, that is, the body of sin maimed; and it is but maimed at the best, while we are in this world. If the right hand of the old man be cut off, and its right eye plucked out, its chief policies blasted and powers broken, it is well; but there is still an eye and a hand remaining, with which it will struggle. They that are Christ's, have nailed the flesh to the cross, but it is not yet dead; its life is prolonged, but its dominion taken away, (Dan. 7. 12,) and the deadly wound given it, that shall not be healed.

1. Concerning offences given by us to others, especially Christ's little ones, which we are here charged to take heed of, pursuant to what he had said, v. 6. Observe,

(1.) The caution itself; Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones. This is spoken to the disciples. As Christ will be displeased with the enemies of his church, if they wrong any of the members of it, even the least, so he will be displeased with the great ones of the church, if they despise the little ones of it. "You that are striving who shall be greatest, take heed lest in this contest you perish yourselves; little ones, ye may understand it literally of little children; of them Christ was speaking, v. 2, 4. The infant seed of the faithful belong to the family of Christ, and are not to be despised. Or, figuratively; true but weak believers are these little ones, who in their outward condition, or the frame of their spirits, are like little children, the lambs of Christ's flock.

[*1.] We must not despise them, not think meanly of them, Job 12. 5. We must not make a jest of their infirmities, not look upon them with contempt, not conduct ourselves scornfully or disdainfully toward them, as if we care not what became of them; we must not say, "Though they be offended, and grieved, and stumbled, what is that to us?" Nor should make a slight matter of driving that which will entangle and perplex them. This is frequently the case; we are so largely cautions against, Rom. 14. 3, 10, 15, 20, 21. We must not impose upon the consciences of others, nor bring them into subjection to our humours, as they do who say to men's souls, Bow down that we may go over. There is a respect owing to the conscience of every man who appears to be conscientious.

[*2.] We must take heed that we do not despise them; we must be afraid of the sin, and be very cautious what we say and do, lest we should through our words or doings bring Christ's little ones into that we put contempt upon them, without being aware of it. There were those that hated them, and cast them out, and yet said, Let the Lord be glorified. And we must be afraid of the punishment; Take heed of despising them, for it is at your peril if you do.

(2.) The reasons to enforce the caution. We must not look upon these little ones as contemptible, because really they are considerable. Let not earth despise those whom heaven respects; not let those be looked upon by us with disdain, whom God has put honour upon, and looks upon with respect, as his favourites. To prove that the little ones which believe in Christ are worthy to be respected, consider,

[1.] The ministration of the good angels about them; In heaven their angels always behave the face of my Father. This Christ saith to us, and we may take it upon his word, who came from heaven to let us know what is done there by the world of angels. Two things he lets us know concerning them,

First, That they are the little ones' angels. God's angels are theirs; for all his is ours, if we be Christ's, 1 Cor. 3. 22. They are theirs; for they have a charge assigned to them, [Heb. 1. 14.] to pitch their tents about them, and bear them up in their arms. Some have imagined that every particular saint has a guardian angel; but why should we suppose that, when we are sure that every particular saint, when there is occasion, has a guard of angels? This is particularly applied here to the little ones, because they are most despised and most exposed. They have but little that they can call their own, but they can look by faith on the heavenly hosts, and call them theirs. While the great ones of the world have honourable men for their retinue and guards, the little ones of the church are attended with glorious angels; which bespeaks not only their dignity, but the danger those run themselves upon, who despise and abuse them. It is bad being enemies to those who are so guarded; and it is good having God for our God, for then we have his angels for our angels.

Secondly, That they always behold the face of the Father in heaven. This bespeaks, 1. The angels' continual felicity and honour. The happiness of heaven consists in the vision of God, seeing him face to face as he is, beholding his beauty; this the angels have without interruption, from the time when ministering to us on earth, yet even then by contemplation they behold the face of God, for they are full of eyes within. Gabriel, when speaking to Zecharias, yet stands in the presence of God, Rev. 4. 8. Luke 1. 19. The expression intimates, as some think, the special dignity and honour of the little ones' angels; the prime ministers of state are said to see the king's face, (Esth. 1. 14.) and this of the princes, and ministers of the king; upon whom the angel came and said, Behold God's face, 1 Sam. 26. 11. 2. It bespeaks their continual readiness to minister to the saints. They behold the face of God, expecting to receive orders from him what to do for the good of the saints. As the eyes of the servant are to the hand of his master, ready to go or come upon the least beck, so the eyes of the angels are upon the face of God, waiting for the intimation of his will. It is the face of God, which, as the eye of the master is to his servant, so the eyes of the angels are to the face of God, which is the face of the weakest saints; 2. It bespeaks their continual readiness to minister to the saints. They behold the face of God, expecting to receive orders from him what to do for the good of the saints.

[2.] The gracious design of Christ in concerning them; (v. 11.) For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost. This is a reason, First, Why the little ones' angels have such a charge concerning them, and attend upon them; it is in pursuance of Christ's design to save them. Note, The ministration of angels is founded in the mediation of Christ; through him angels are reconciled to us, and, when they celebrated God's good will toward men, to it they annexed their own. Secondly, Why they are not to be despised; because Christ came to save them, to save them that are lost, the little ones that are lost in their own eyes, (Isa. 66. 3.) that are at a loss within themselves. Or rather, the children of men. Note, 1. Our souls by nature are lost souls; as a traveller is lost, that is out of his way, as a convicted prisoner is lost. God lost the service of fallen man, lost the honour he should have had from him. 2. Christ's errand into the world was, to save that which was lost; to redeem us to our inheritance, to restore us to our lost rest, to our privileges, and so to put us into the right way that leads to our great end; to save those that are spiritually lost from being eternally so. 3. This is a good reason why the least and weakest believer should not be despised or offended. If Christ put such a value upon them, let us not undervalue them. If he denied himself so much for their salvation, surely, nay, most particularly for their comfort and consolation. See this argument urged, Rom. 14. 15. 1 Cor. 8. 11, 12. Nay, if Christ came into the world to save souls, and his heart is so much upon that work, he will reckon severely with those that obstruct and hinder it, by obstructing the progress of those that are setting their faces heavenward, and so thwart his great design.

[3.] The tender regard which our heavenly Father has to his little ones and his concern for their welfare. This is illustrated by a comparison, v. 12—14. Observe the gradation of the argument; the angels of God are his servants, the Son of God is their Saviour, and, to complete their honour, God himself is their Friend. None shall pluck them out of my Father's hand, John 10. 28. Here is, First, The comparison, v. 12, 13. The owner that had lost one sheep out of a hundred, does not slight it, but diligently inquires after it, is greatly pleased when he has found it, and has in that a sensible and affecting joy, more than in the ninety and nine that wandered not. The fear he was in of losing that one, and the surprise of finding it, add to the joy. Now this is applicable, 1. To the state of fallen man in general; he is strayed like a lost sheep, the angels that stood, were as the ninety-nine that never were astray, Mark 12. 40, 41. 2. To the mountains, which Christ, in great fatigue, traversed in pursuit of him, and he is found; which is matter of joy. Greater joy there is in heaven for returning sinners than for remaining angels. 2. To particular believers, who are offended and put out of their way by the stumbling-blocks that are laid in their way, or the wiles of those who seduce them out of the right way. The woman, though but one of a hundred should hereby be driven off, as should every lamb, or sheep, that belongs to him. Though they are many, yet out of those many he can easily miss one, for he is a good Shepherd, and takes a more particular cognizance of his flock than ever any did; for he calls his own sheep by name, John 10. 3. See a full exposition of this parable, Ezek. 34. 10, 16, 19.

Secondly, The application of this comparison; (v. 14.) It is not the will of your Father, that one of these little ones should perish. More is implied than is expressed. It is not his will, that any should perish, but, 1. It is his will, that these little ones should be saved; it is the will of his design and delight, he has designed it, and set his heart upon it, and he will effect it; it is the will of his precept, that all should do what they can to further it, and nothing to hinder it. 2. This care extends itself to every particular member of the flock, even the meanest. We think if one or two be offended and ensnared, it is no great matter, we need not mind it; but God's thoughts of love and tenderness are above ours. 3. It is intimated that those who do any thing by which any of these little ones are brought into danger of perishing, contradict the will of God, and directly provoke him; and though they cannot prevail in it, yet they will be reckoned with for it by him, who, in his saints, as in other things, is jealous of his honour, and will not bear to have it trampled on. See Isa. 3. 15. What mean ye that ye beat my people? Ps. 76. 8, 9.

Observe, Christ called God, (v. 19.) my Father which is in heaven; he calls him, (v. 14.) our Father which is in heaven; intimating that he is not ashamed to call his poor disciples brethren; for have not he and they one Father? I ascend to my Father and your Father; (John 20. 17.) therefore ours because his. This intimates likewise the ground of the safety of his little ones; that God is their Father, and is therefore inclined to succour them. A father takes care of all his children, but particularly tender of the little ones, Gen. 32. 13. He is their Father in heaven; a place of prospect, and therefore he sees all the indignities offered them; and a place of power, therefore he is able to avenge them. This comforts offended little ones, that their Witness is in heaven, (Job 16. 19.) their Judge is there, Ps. 68. 5.

15. Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. 16. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. 17. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican. 18. Verily I say unto you, WHATSOEVER YE SHALL BOUND ON EARTH SHALL BE BOUND IN HEAVEN; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. 19. Again I say unto you, That if two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven. 20. For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.

Christ, having cautioned his disciples not to give offence, cometh next to direct them what they must do in case of offences given them; which may be understood either of personal injuries, and then these directions are intended for the preserving the peace of the church; or of public scandals, and then they are intended for the preserving of the purity and beauty of the church. Let us consider it both ways.
I. Let us apply it to the quarrels that happen upon any account, among Christians. If thy brother trespass against thee, by grieving thy soul, (1 Cor. 6. 12.) by affronting thee, or putting contempt or abuse upon thee, if he blenchem thy good name by false reports or tale-bearing, if he encroach on thy rights, or be any way injurious to thee in thy estate; if he be guilty of any of those trespasses that are specified, Lev. 6. 2. 3. If he transgress the laws of justice, charity, and charitable duties; these and trespass among us, and often haply before Christ and his disciples, and sometimes, for want of prudence, are of very mischievous consequence. Now observe what is the rule prescribed in this case.

1. Go, and tell him his fault between him and thee alone. Let this be compared with, and explained by, Lev. 19. 17. Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; that is, "If thou hast conceived a displeasure at thy brother for any injury he hath done thee, do not suffer thy resentment to ripen into a secret malice, (like a wound, which is most dangerous when it bleeds inwardly,) but give vent to them in a mild and grave admonition, let them so spend themselves, and they will expire the sooner; do not go and rail against him behind his back, but thou shalt in any wise reprove him. If he has indeed done thee a wrong, (like a wound) it is to make me sensible of it, but let the rebuke be private, between thee and him alone; if thou wouldst convince him, do not expose him, for that will but exasperate him, and make the reproof look like a revenge." This agrees with Prov. 25. 8. 9. "Go not forth hastily to strive, but debate thy cause with thy neighbour himself, argue it calmly and amicably; and if he shall hear thee, well and good, thou hast gained thy brother, there is an end of the controversy, and it is a happy end; let no more be said of it, but let the falling out of friends be the renewing of friendship."

2. If he will not hear thee, if he will not own himself in a fault, nor come to an agreement, yet do not despair, but try what he will say to it, if thou take one or two more, not only to be witnesses of what passes, but to reason the case further with him; he will be the more likely to hearken to them because they are disinterested; and if reason will rule him, the word of reason in the mouth of two or three witnesses will be better spoken to him, (Plus avid us, quam quis—Many eyes see more than one,) "and more regarded by him, and perhaps it will influence him to acknowledge his error the more effectually." 3. If he shall neglect to hear them, and will not refer the matter to their arbitration, then tell it to the church, to the ministers, elders, or other officers, or the most considerable persons in the congregation you belong to, make them the referees to accommodate the matter, and do not presently appeal to the magistrate, or fetch a writ for him." This is fully explained by the apostle, (1 Cor. 6.) when he requires his members to refer and give over the matter, and not before the saints, (v. 1.) he would have the saints to judge those small matters, (v. 2.) that pertain to this life, v. 3. If you ask, "Who is the church that must be told?" The apostle directs there, (v. 5.) Is there not a wise man among you? Those of the church that are presumed to be most capable of determining such matters, and he speaks in the plenitude of laws, (v. 6. 7. 8.) Some of those who are least esteemed in the church; those, if there be no better, those, rather than suffer an irreconcilable breach between two church-members. This rule was then in a special manner requisite, when the civil government was in the hands of such as were not only aliens, but enemies. 4. If he will not hear the church, will not stand to their award, but persists in the wrong he has done there, and proceeds to do thee further wrong, let him be to thee as a heathen man, and a publican; take the benefit of the law against him, but let that always be the last remedy; appeal not to the courts of justice till thou hast first tried all other means to compromise the matter in variance. Or thou mayst, if thou wilt, break off thy friendship and familiarity with him; though thou must by no means study revenge, yet thou mayst choose whether thou wilt have any dealings with him, at least thou mayst stop up the way of doing the like again. Thou wouldst have healed him, wouldst have preserved his friendship, but he would not, and so has forfeited it." If a man cheat and abuse me once, it is his fault; if twice, it is my own.

II. Let us apply it to scandalous sins, which are an offence to the little ones, of bad example to those that are weak and pliable, and of great grief to those that are weak and timorous. "If a brother was taught us to indulge the weakness of our brethren, here cautions us not to indulge their wickedness under pretence of that. Christ, designating to erect a church for himself in the world, here took care for the preservation, 1. Of its purity, that it might have an expulsive faculty, a power to cleanse and clear itself, like a fountain of living waters, which is necessary to a Church, as a cow without its milk is a cow. 2. Of its peace and order, that every member may know his place and duty, and the purity of it may be preserved in a regular way and not tumultuously. Now let us see,

(1.) What is the case supposed? If thy brother trespass against thee. [1.] "The offender is a brother, one that is in christian communion, that is, baptized, that has the word, and prays with thee, Matth. 18. 17. with whom thou hast joined in the worship of God, statedly or occasionally." Note, Church-discipline is for church-members. They are without God's judges, 1 Cor. 5. 12. 13. When any trespass is done against us, it is good to remember that the trespasser is a brother, which furnishes us with a qualifying consideration. [2.] The offence is a trespass against thee; if the brother sin against thee, (so the word is,) if he do any thing which is offensive to thee as a christian. Note, A gross sinner against God is a trespass against his people, who have a true concern for his honour. Christ and believers have twisted interests; what is done against them, Christ takes as done against himself; and what is done against him, they cannot but take as done against themselves. The reproach of them to whom you are related is with you, Ps. 68. 9. (2.) What is to be done in this case. We have here,

[1.] The rules prescribed, v. 15. 17. Proceed in this method: First, Go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone. Do not stay till he comes to thee, but go to him, as the physician visits the patient, and the shepherd goeth after the sheep. [2.] This is too much to take for the covering of a sinner to repentance. Tell him his fault, remind him of what he has done, and of the evil of it, show him his abominations. Note, People are loath to see their faults, and have need to be told of them. Though the fact is plain, and the fault too, yet they must be put together with application. Great sins if not pursued are not discovered, and silence it; and there is need of help to awaken it. David’s own heart smote him, when he had cut off Saul’s skirt, and when he had numbered the people; but (which is very strange) we do not find that it smote him in the matter of Uriah, till Nathan told him, Thou art the man. Tell him his fault, give an argument, and, if (the sin with reason and argument, not with passion.) Where the fault is plain and great, the person proper for us to deal with, and we have an opportunity for it, and there is no apparent danger of doing more hurt than good, we must with meekness and faithfulness tell people of what is amiss in them. Christian reproof is an ordinance of Christ for the bringing of sinners to repentance, and must be managed with much care. It must be private, between thee and him alone; that it may appear you seek not his reproof, but his repentance. Note, It is a good rule, which should ordinarily be observed among Christians, not to speak of our brethren's faults to others, till we have first spoken of them to ourselves; this would make less reproaching and more reproofing; that is, less sin committed, and more duty done. And if the offender, when he sees his reproof concerned not only for his salvation, in telling him his fault, but for his reputation, in telling him of it privately.

1. If he shall hear thee, that is, heed thee, if he be wrought upon by the reproof, it is well; thou hast gained thy brother; thou hast helped to save him from sin and ruin, and it will be thy credit and comfort," James 5. 19, 20. Note, The converting of sinners to God is the chief aim of all reproofs, and we should covet it, and labour after it, as gain to us; and if the loss of a soul be a great loss, the gain of a soul is sure no small gain. Secondly, If that doth not prevail, then take with thee one or two more, v. 15. Note, We must not be weary of well-doing, though we see not presently the good success of it. “If he will not hear thee, yet do not give him up as in a desperate case; say not, It will be to no purpose to deal with him any further; but go on in the use of other means; even those that harden their necks, must be often reproved, and those that oppose themselves, instructed in meekness.” In work of this kind we must travail in birth again; (Gal. 4. 19,) and it is after many pains and throes that the child is born.

Take with thee one or two more; 1. To assist thee; they may speak some pertinent, convincing word which thou didst not think of, and may manage the matter with more prudence than thou didst.

Note, Christians should see their need of help in doing good, and pray in the aid one of another; as in other things, so in giving reproofs, that the duty may be done, and may be done well. 2. To affect him; he will be the more likely to be humbled for his fault, when he sees it witnessed against by two or three. Deut. 19. 15. Note, Those should think themselves in a good case who are likely to work upon any offender, and are helped in their work, and the work is effectual. Though in such a world as this it is rare to find one good whom all men speak well of, yet it is more rare to find one good whom all men speak ill of.

3. To be witnesses of his conduct, in case the matter should afterward be brought before the church. None should come under the censure of the church as obstinate and contumacious till it be very necessary. Thirlby.

Thirlby, If he neglect to hear them, and will not be humbled, then tell it to the church, v. 17. There are some stubborn spirits to whom the likeliest means of conviction prove ineffectual; yet such must not be given over as irreparable, but let the matter be made more public, and further help called in. Note, 1. Private admonitions must always go before public censures; if gentler methods will do the work, those should be used, and more must not be used, Tit. 3. 10. Those that will be reasoned out of their sins, need not be shamed out of them. Let God's work be done effectually, but with as little noise as may be; his kingdom comes with power, but not with observation. But, 2. Where private admonition does not prevail, there public censure must take place. The church must receive the complaints of the offended, and rebuke the sins of the offenders, and judge between them, after an impartial inquiry made into the merits of the cause.

Tell it to the church. It is a thousand pities that this appointment of Christ, which was designed to end differences, and remove factions, should be the subject of debate, and occasion differences and offences, through the corruption of men's hearts. What church must be told—is the great question; The civil magistrate, say some; The Jewish sanhedrin then in being, say others; but by what follows, (v. 18,) it is plain that he means a Christian church, which, though not yet formed, was now in the embryo. "Tell it the church, that particular church, the church of the place where the offender lives, make the matter known to those of that congregation, who are by consent appointed to receive informations of that kind. Tell it to the guides and governors of the church, the minister or ministers, the elders or deacons, or (if such the constitution of the society be) tell it to the representatives or heads of the congregation, or to all the members of it; let them examine the matter, and if they find the complaint frivolous and groundless, let them rebuke the offender; if they find it just, let them rebuke the offender, and call him to repentance, and this will be likely to put an edge and an efficacy upon the reproof, because given," 1. With greater solemnity; and, 2. With greater authority. It is an awful thing to receive a reproof from a church, from a minister, a reprove by office; and therefore it is the more regarded by such as pay any deference to an institution of Christ and his ambassadors. Fourthly, If he neglect to hear the church, if he slight the admonition, and will neither be ashamed of his faults, nor amend them, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican; let him be cast out of the communion of the church, excluded from special ordinances, degraded from the dignity of a church-member, let him be put under disgrace, and let the members of the society be warned to withdraw from him, that he may be ashamed of his sin, and they may not be infected by it, or made chargeable with it. Those who put contempt upon the orders and rules of a society, and bring reproach upon it, forfeit the honours and privileges of it, and are justly laid aside till they repent and submit, and reconcile themselves to it again. Christ has appointed this method for the vindicating of the church's honour, the preserving of its purity, and the advancement of the gospel. But observe, he doth not say, "Let him be to thee as a devil or damned spirit, as one whose case is desperate," but, "as a heathen and a publican, as one in a capacity of being restored and received in again. Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." The directions given to the church of Corinth concerning the incestuous person, agree with the rules here; he must be retained in the church, and suffer there the correction and reformation of those that are culpable. But observe, he doth not say, "Let him be to thee as a devil or damned spirit, as one whose case is desperate," but, "as a heathen and a publican, as one in a capacity of being restored and received in again. Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." The directions given to the church of Corinth concerning the incestuous person, agree with the rules here; he must be retained in the church, and suffer there the correction and reformation of those that are culpable. But observe, he doth not say, "Let him be to thee as a devil or damned spirit, as one whose case is desperate," but, "as a heathen and a publican, as one in a capacity of being restored and received in again. Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." The directions given to the church of Corinth concerning the incestuous person, agree with the rules here; he must be retained in the church, and suffer there the correction and reformation of those that are culpable. But observe, he doth not say, "Let him be to thee as a devil or damned spirit, as one whose case is desperate," but, "as a heathen and a publican, as one in a capacity of being restored and received in again. Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother."
and will ratify what they say and do, so that it shall be taken as said and done by himself. He will own them.

First, In their sentence of suspension; Whatever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven.
If the censures of the church duly follow the institution of Christ, his judgments will follow the censures of the church, his spiritual judgments, which are the sorest of all other, such as the rejected Jews fell under, (Rom. 11. 8.) a spirit of slumber; for Christ will not suffer his own ordinances to be tramscended. When the church suspends any, it is a tenent sentences which the church passes on obstinate offenders. How light soever proud scorner may make of the censures of the church, let them know that they are confirmed in the court of heaven; and it is in vain for them to appeal to that court, for judgment is there already given against them. They that are shut out from the congregation of the righteous now, shall not stand in it in the great day, Ps. 1. 5. Christ will not own those, as his, nor receive them to himself, whom the church has duly delivered to Satan; but if through error or envy the censures of the church be unjust, Christ will graciously find those who are so cast out, John 9. 34, 35.

Secondly, In their sentence of absolution; Whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven. Note 1. No church-censures bind so fast, but that, upon their suspension and remission of sentence they may and must be loosed again. Sufficient is the punishment which has attained its end, and the offender must then be forgiven and comforted, 2 Cor.
2. 6. There is no unpassable gulf fixed but that between hell and heaven. 2 Those who, upon their repentance, are received by the church into communion again, may take the comfort of their acquittal of sin with their hearts, and be reconciled with God. As suspension is for the terror of the obsti-inate, so absolution is for the encouragement of the penitent. St. Paul speaks in the person of Christ, when he saith, To whom ye forgive any thing, I curse them also, 2 Cor. 2. 10.

Now it is a great honour which Christ here gives upon the church, that he will condescend not only to take cognizance of their sentences, but to concur with them; and in the following verses we have two things laid down as the ground of this.
(1.) God's readiness to answer the church's prayers; (v. 19.) If two of you shall agree harmoniously, touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them. Apply this,

[1.] In general, to all the requests of the faithful praying seed of Jacob; they shall not seek God's face in vain. Many promises we have in scripture of a gracious answer to the prayers of faith, but this gives a particular encouragement to joint prayer;
"the requests which two of you agree in, much more which many agree in." No law of heaven limits the number of petitioners. Note, Christ has been pleased to put an honour upon, and to allow a special efficacy in, the joint prayers of the faithful, and in their unanimity of heart and purpose. If they join in the same prayer, if they meet by appointment to come together to the throne of grace on some special errand, or, though at a distance, agree in some particular matter of prayer, they shall speed well. Beside the general regard God has to the prayers of the saints, he is particularly pleased with their union and communion in these prayer-meetings.

[2.] In particular, to those requests that are put to up to God about binding and loosing; to which this promise seems more especially to refer. Observe, First, That the power of church-discipline is not here lodged in the hand of a single person, but two, least, are supposed to be concerned in it. When the incestuous Corinthian was to be cast out, the church was gathered together, (1 Cor. 5. 4.) and it was a punishment inflicted on many, 2 Cor. 2. 6. In an affair of such importance, two are better than one, and more than two are better, 1 Cor. 12. 3. The multiplied meetings in behalf of the injured are safety. Secondly, It is good to see those who have the management of church-discipline, agreeing in it. Heats and animosities among those whose work it is to remove offences, will be the greatest offence of all. Thirdly, Prayer must evermore go along with church-discipline. Pass no sentence, which you cannot in faith ask God to confirm. The bind-ance and act of church-discipline is confirmed by preaching, this by praying. Thus the whole power of gospel-ministers is resolved into the word and prayer, to which they must wholly give them-se. He doth not say, "If you shall agree to sentence and decree a thing, it shall be done;" (as if ministers were judges and lords;) but, "If you agree to ask it of God, from him you shall obtain it." Prayer must go along with all our endeavours for the conversion of sinners; see James 5. 16.

Fourthly, The unanimous petitions of the church of God, for the ratification of their just censures, shall be heard in heaven, and obtain an answer;
"It shall be done, it shall be bound and loosed in heaven;" God will set his fiat to the appeals and applications you make to him. If Christ (who here speaks as one having authority over all,) it shall be done, then let it be done. That it is done, though we see not the effect in the way that we look for. It God doth especially own and accept us, when we are praying for those that have offended him and us.
The Lord turned the captivity of Job, not when he prayed for himself, but when he prayed for his friends who had trespassed against him.

(2.) The presence of Christ in the assemblies of christians, 1 Cor. 12. 20. Every believer has the presence of Christ with him; but the promise here refers to the meetings where two or three are gathered in his name, not only for discipline, but for religious worship, or any act of christian communion. Assembles of christians for holy purposes are hereby appointed, directed, and encouraged.

[1.] They are hereby appointed; the church of christians in the world exists most visably in religious assemblies; it is the will of Christ that these should be set up, and kept up for the honour of God, the codification of men, and the preserving of a face of religion upon the world. When God intends special answers to prayer, he calls for a solemn assembly, Joel 2. 15, 16. If there be no liberty and opportunity for large and numerous assemblies, yet then it is the will of God that two or three should gather together, to show their good will to the great ggregation. Note, When we cannot do what we would in religion, we must do as we can, and God will accept us.

[2.] They are hereby directed to gather together in Christ's name. In the exercise of church-discipline, they must come together in the name of Christ, 1 Cor. 1. 4. That name gives to what they do an the authority of God; and if Christ is there, the assembly is complete. In meeting for worship, we must have an eye to Christ; must come together, by virtue of his war-tant and appointment, in token of our relation to him, professing faith in him, and in communion with all that in every place call upon him. When we come together, to worship God in a dependence upon the Spirit and grace of Christ as Mediator for reconciliation, or in union with his merit and righteousness as Mediator for acceptance, having an actual regard to him as our Way to the Father, and our Advocate with the Father, then we are met together in his name.

[3.] They are hereby encouraged with an assurance of the presence of Christ; There am I in the midst of them. By his common presence he is in all places, as God; but this is a promise of his special presence. Where his saints are, his sanctuary is, and there he will dwell; it is his rest, (Ps. 132. 14,) it is his walk; (Rev. 2. 1.) he is in the midst of them, to quicken and strengthen them, to refresh and comfort them, as the sun in the midst of the universe. He is in the midst of them, that is, in his presence, the very force and presence of Christ’s Spirit with their spirits, that is here intended. There am I, not only I will be there, but I am there; as if he came first, is ready before them, they shall find him there; he repeated this promise at parting, (ch. 28. 20.) Lo, I am with you always. Note, The presence of Christ in the assemblies of Christians is promised, and may in faith be prayed for. 2. It is evident, this is equivalent to the Shechinah, or special presence of God in the tabernacle and temple of old, Exod. 40. 24. 2 Chron. 5. 14.

Though but two or three are met together, Christ is among them; this is an encouragement to the meeting of a few, when it is either, First, Of choice. Beside the secret worship performed by particular persons, and the public services of the whole congregation, there may be occasion sometimes for two or three to come together, either for mutual assistance in conference or joint assistance in prayer, not in contempt of public worship, but in concurrence with it; there Christ will be present. Or, Secondly, By constraint; when there are not more than two or three to come together, or, if there be, they dare not, for fear of the Jews, yet Christ will be in the midst of them; for it is not the multitude, but the faith and sincere devotion, of the worshippers, that invites the presence of Christ; and though there be but two or three, the smallest number that can be, yet, if Christ make one among them, who is the principal one, their meeting is as honourable and comfortable as if they were two or three thousand.

21. Then came Peter to him, and said, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him? till seven times? 22. Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until seven times; but, Until seventy times seven. 23. Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king, which would take account of his servants. 24. And when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him which owed him ten thousand talents. 25. But so much as he had not to pay, his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made. 26. The servant therefore fell down, and worshipped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. 27. Then the Lord of that servant was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt. 28. But the same servant went out, and found one of his fellow-servants which owed him an hundred pence; and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat, saying, Pay me that thou owest. 29. And his fellow-servant fell down at his feet, and besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. 30. And he would not; but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay the ren, that is, the church, and the administration of the gospel-dispensation in it. The church is God's family, it is his court; there he dwells, there he rules. God is our Master, his servants we are, at least, in profession and obligation. In general, the parable estimates how much presention God has from his family on earth, and how untoward his servants are.

There are three things in the parable.
1. The master's wonderful clemency to his servant who was indebted to him; he gave him ten thousand talents, out of pure compassion to him; v. 25.

2. Where observe,
(1.) Every sin we commit, is a debt to God; not like a debt to an equal, contracted by buying or bor-rowling, but to a superior; like a debt to a prince when a recognition is forfeited, or a penalty incurred by a breach of the law or a breach of the peace;
like the debt of a servant to his master, by withholding his service, wasting his lord's goods, breaking his indentures, and incurring the penalty. We are all debtors; we owe satisfaction, and are liable to the process of the law.

(2.) There is an account kept of these debts, and we must shortly be reckoned with for them. This king would take account of his servants. God now reckons with us by our own consciences; conscience is an auditor for God in the soul, to call us to account, and to account with us. One of the first questions the universal Christian asks is, How much o\neth thou unto my Lord? And unless it be bribed, it will tell the truth, and not write fifty for a hundred. There is another day of reckoning coming, when these accounts will be called over, and either passed or disallowed, and nothing but the blood of Christ will balance the account.

(3.) The debt of sin is a very great debt; and some are more in debt, by reason of sin, than others.
When he began to reckon, one of the first defaulters appeared to owe ten thousand talents. There is no evading the inquiries of divine justice, your sin will be sure to find you out. The debt was ten thousand talents, a vast sum, amounting by computation to one million, eight hundred, seventy-five thousand pounds sterling; a king's ransom or a kingdom's subsidy, more likely, than a servant's debt; see what our sins are worth. Every one of us knows their nature; they are talents, the greatest denomination that ever was used in the account of money or weight. Every sin is the lead of a talent, a talent of lead, this is wickedness, Zech. 5. 7, 8. The trusts committed to us, as stewards of the grace of God, are each of them a talent, (ch. 23. 15.) a talent of gold, and for every one of them buried, much more for every one of them wasted, we are a talent in debt, and this raises the account. [2.] For the vastness of their number;
they are ten thousand, a myriad, more than the hairs on our head, Ps. 40. 12. Who can understand the number of his errors, or tell how oft he offends? Ps.
19. 12.

(4.) The debt of sin is so great, that we are not able to pay it; He had not to pay. Sinners are in-spite that debt; it is the scripture, which God says, under sin, is a statute of bankruptcy against us all.
Silver and gold would not pay our debt, Ps. 49. 6, 7.
Sacrifice and offering would not do it; our good works are but God's work in us, and cannot make satisfaction; we are without strength, and cannot help ourselves.

(5.) If God should deal with us in strict justice, we should be condemned as insolvent debtors; God might exact the debt by glorifying himself in our utter ruin. Justice demands satisfaction, Currant lex.—Let the sentence of the law be executed.
The servant had contracted this debt by his waster-fulness and wilfulness, and therefore might justly be left to lie by it. His lord commanded him to be sold, as a bond-slave into the galleys, sold to grind in the prison-house; his wife and children to be sold, and all that he had, and payment to be made. See here what every sin deserves; this is the wages of sin.
[1.] To be sold. Those that sell themselves to work wasterfulness, and disobedience; for the sake of the Soul and kingdom's purposes. The servants of sin are captives of wrath. He that is sold for a bond-slave, is deprived of all his comforts, and has nothing left but his life, that he may be sensible of his miseries; which is the case of damned sinners. [2.] Thus he would have payment to be made, that is, something done towards it; though it is impossible that the sale of one so worthless should answer the payment of so great a debt. The damna-tion of sinners divine justice will be to eternity in the satisfying, but never satisfied.

(6.) Convinced sinners cannot but humble them-sehews before God, and pray for mercy. The servant, under this charge, and this doom, fell down at the feet of his royal master, and worshipped him;
or, as some copies read it, he brought him; his address was very submissive and very importunate.
Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all, v. 26.
The servant knew before that he was so much in debt, and yet was under no concern about it, till he was called to an account. Sinners are commonly careless about the pardon of their sins, till they come under the arrests of some awakening word, some startling providence, or approaching death, and then, their minds are awake, and their consciences are awakened. How easily, how quickly, can God bring the proudest sinner to his feet: Ahab to his sackcloth, Manasseh to his prayers, Pharaoh to his confessions, Judas to his restitution, Simon Magus to his sup-hplication, Belshazzar and Felix to their tremblings.
The stoutest heart will fail, when God sets the sins in order before it. This servant did not deny the debt, but he could not pay it; but he repented, and then his master forgave him.

But, [1.] He begs time; Have patience with me.
Patience and forbearance are a great favour, but it is folly to think that these alone will save us; replies are not pardons. Many are borne with, who are not thereby brought to repentance, (Rom. 2. 4.)
and then their being borne with does them no kindness.

But, [2.] He promises payment; Have patience a while, and I will pay thee all. Note, It is the folly of many who are under convictions of sin, to imagine that they can make God satisfaction for the wrong they have done him; as those who, like a compro-inding bankrupt, would discharge the debt, by giving their first-born for their transgression, (Mic. 6. 7.)
who go about to establish their own righteousness, Rom. 10. 3. He that hath nothing to pay, (v. 25.)
fancied he could pay all. See how close pride sticks, even to awakened sinners; they are convinced, but not humbled.

(7.) The God of infinite mercy is very ready, out of pure compassion, to forgive the sins of those that humble themselves before him; (v. 27.) The lord of that servant, when he might justly have ruined him, mercifully released him; and since he could not be satisfied by compounding for the debt, he was to be glorified by the pardon of it. The servant's prayer was, Have patience with me; the master's grant is, a discharge in full. Note, [1.] The pardon of sin is owing to the mercy of God, to his tender mercy; (Luke 1. 77. 78.) He was moved with compassion. God's reasons of mercy are fetched from within himself; he has mercy because he will have mercy. God looked with pity on the wretches on his account, and showed mercy to his Son to be a Surety for them; he looks with pity on particular penitents, because sensible of their misery, (their hearts broken and contrite,) and accepts them in the Beloved. [2.] There is forgiveness with God for the greatest sins, if they be repented of. Though the debt was vastly great, he forgave it all, v. 32. Though our sins be very numerous and very heinous, yet, upon gospel grace, they may be pardoned; 2 Cor. 3:5, 6. For in the debt is the losing of the debtor; he bowed him. The obligation is cancelled, the judgment vacated; we never walk at liberty till our sins are forgiven. But observe, though he discharged him from the penalty as a debtor, he did not discharge him from his duty as a servant. The pardon of sin doth not shackle, but strengthen, our obligations to obedience; and we must reckon it a favour that God is pleased to continue such wasteful liberality as we have been, in such a gainful service as his, and should therefore deliver us, that we might serve him, Luke 1. 74. I am thy servant, for thou hast saved my soul.

2. The servant's unreasonable severity toward his fellow-servant, notwithstanding his lord's clemency toward him, v. 28—30. This represents the sin of those who, though they are not unjust in demanding that which is not their own; yet are rigorous and unmerciful in demanding that which is their own, to the utmost of right, which sometimes proves a real wrong. Summum jus summa injuria. Push a claim to an extremity, and it becomes a wrong. To exact satisfaction for debts of injury, which tend neither to reparation nor to the public good, but purely for revenge, though the law may allow it, in terrorem—in order to strike terror, and for the hardness of heart, and resentment, which is bound to beget bad blood. To sue for money-debts, when the debtor cannot possibly pay them, and so let him perish in prison, argues a greater love of money, and a less love of our neighbour, than we ought to have, Neh. 5. 7.

See here, (1.) How small the debt was, how very small, compared with the ten thousand talents which his lord forgave him: He owed him a hundred, about three pounds and half-a-crown of our money. Note, Offences done to men are nothing to compare with which are committed against God. Dishonours done to a man like ourselves, are but as pence, notes, gruels; but dishonours done to God, are as talents, beams, camels. Not that therefore we may make light of wronging our neighbour, for that is also a sin against God; but therefore we should make light of our neighbour's wronging us, and not aggravate it, or study revenge. David was unconcerned at the theft of his ass, when his servant was robbed, and yet laid much to heart the sins committed against God; for them, rivers of tears ran down his eyes.

(2.) How severe the demand was; He laid hands on him, and took him by the throat. Proud and angry men think, if the matter of their demand be just, that will bear them out, though the manner of it be ever so cruel and unmerciful: but it will not hold. What needed all this violence? The debt might have been demanded without taking the debtor by the throat; without sending for a writ, or setting the bailiff upon him. How hardly is this man's carriage, and yet how base and servile is his spirit! If he had been himself going to prison for his debt to his lord, his occasions would have been so pressing, that he might have had some pretence for going to this extremity in requiring his own; but frequently pride and malice prevail more to make men extreme in other men's debts, than in their own.

(3.) How submissive the debtor was; His fellow-servant, though his equal, yet knowing how much he lay at his mercy, fell down at his feet, and humbled himself to him for this trifling debt, as much as he did to his lord for that great debt; for the borrower is servant to the lender, Prov. 22. 7. Note, Those who cannot pay their debts, ought to be very respectful to their creditors, and not only give them good words, but do them all the good offices they possibly can; they must not be angry at those who claim their own, nor speak ill of them for it, no, not though they do it in a rigorous manner, but in that case leave it to God to plead the cause. The debtor.

How patiently with me; he honestly confesses the debt, and puts not his creditor to the charge of proving it, only begs time. Note, Forbearance, though it be no acquittance, is sometimes a piece of needful and laudable charity. As we must not be hard, so we must not be nasty, in our demands, but think how long God bears with us.

(4.) How implacable and furious the creditor was; (v. 29.) He would not have patience with him, he would not behearken to his fair promise, but without mercy cast him into prison. How insolently did he trample upon one as good as himself, that submitted to him! How cruelly did he use one that had done him no harm, and though it would be no advantage to himself! In this, as in a glass, unmerciful creditors may see their own faces, who take pleasure in nothing more than to swallow up and destroy, (2 Sam. 20. 19.) and gloat over on their poor debtor's bondage.

(5.) How much concerned the rest of the servants were; They were very sorry, (v. 31.) sorry for the creditor's cruelty, and for the debtor's calamity. Note, The sins and sufferings of our fellow-servants should be matter of grief and trouble to us. It is sad that any of our brethren should either make themselves beasts of prey, by cruelty and barbarity; or be made beasts of slavery, by the inhuman usage of those whose service we are engaged in. Is it fit a fellow-servant, either raging like a bear or trampled on like a worm, cannot but occasion great regret to all that have any jealousy for the honour either of their nature or of their religion. See with what eye Solomon looked both upon the tears of the oppressed, and the power of the oppressors, Eccl. 4. 1.

(6.) How notice of it was brought to the master: They came and told their lord. They thrust not their necks into the net of this unreasonable and outrageous creditor. Let a bear robbed of her whelps meet a man, rather than such a fool in his folly; but they went to their lord, and besought him to appear for the oppressed against the oppressor. Note, That which gives us occasion for sorrow, should give us occasion for prayer. Let our complaints both of the wickedness of the wicked and of the afflictions of the afflicted, be brought to God, and left with him.

3. The master's just resentment of the cruelty his servant was guilty of. If the servant took it so ill, much more would the master, whose Compassions are infinitely above ours. Now observe here, (1.) How he reproved his servant's cruelty; (v. 32, 33.) O thou wicked servant. Note, Unmercifulness is wickedness, it is great wickedness. [1.] He upbraids him with the mercy he had found with his master; I forgave thee all that debt. Those that will use God's favours, shall never be upbraided with them, but those that abuse them, may expect it, ch. 11. 20. Consider, It was all that debt, that great debt. Note, The greatness of sin magnifies the riches of pardoning mercy; we should think how much has been forgiven us, Luke 7. 47. [2.] He therefore shows him the obligation he was under to be merciful to his fellow-servant; Shouldst not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee? Note, It is justly expected, that such as have received mercy, should show mercy. Dat ille venenum facile, cui venia est ofuus—He who needs forgiveness, easily bestows it. Serc. Agamenn. He shows him, First, That he should have been more compassionate to the distress of his fellow-servant, because he had himself experienced the same distress. What we have had the feeling of ourselves, we can the better have the feeling of with our brethren. The Israelites knew the heart of a stranger, for they were strangers; and this servant should have better known the heart of
of them, for comfort to those that are sincere, but timorous; that the one may fear, and the other may hope. Those that do not forgive their brother's trespasses, did never truly repent of their own, nor ever truly believe the gospel; and therefore that which is taken away, is only what they seemed to have, Luke 6. 18. (2.) This is intended to teach us, that they shall have judgment without mercy, that have showed no mercy, Jam. 2. 13. It is indispensably necessary to pardon and peace, that we not only do justly, but love mercy. It is an essential part of that religion which is pure and undefiled before God and the Father, that wisdom from above, which is gentle, and easy to be entreated. Look how they will answer it another day, who, though they bear the christian name, persist in the most rigorous and unmerciful treatment of their brethren, as if the strictest laws of Christ might be dispensed with for the gratifying of their unbridled passions; and so they curse themselves every time they say the Lord's prayer.

CHAP. XIX.

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ changing his quarters, leaving Galilee, and coming into the coasts of Judea, v. 1, 2. II. His preaching, with the progress of it, v. 3 to 15. His discourse with his disciples upon occasion of it, v. 16., 17. III. The kind entertainment he gave to some little children which were brought to him, v. 13., 14. IV. An account of what passed between Christ and a hopeful young man that applied himself to him, v. 16., 17. V. His discourse with his disciples upon that occasion, concerning the difficulty of the salvation of those that have much in the world, and the certain recompense of those that leave all for Christ, v. 23., 30.

1. And it came to pass, that when Jesus had finished these sayings, he departed from Galilee, and came into the coasts of Judea beyond Jordan: 2. And great multitudes followed him; and he healed them there.

We have here an account of Christ's removal. Observe, 1. He left Galilee. There he had been brought up and had spent the greatest part of his life in that remote despitable part of the country; it was only upon occasion of the feasts, that he came up to Jerusalem, and manifested himself there; and, we may suppose, that, having no constant residence there when he did come, his preaching and miracles were the more observable and acceptable. But it was an instance of his humiliation, and in this, as in other things, he appeared in a mean state, that he would go under the character of a Galilean, a north-countryman, the least polite and refined part of the nation. Most of Christ's sermons hitherto had been preached, and most of his miracles wrought, in Galilee; but now, having finished these sayings, he departed from Galilee, and it was his final farewell; for (unless his passing through the midst of Samaria and Galilee was the special occasion of his departure) in which case he was but a visit in transitu—as he passed through the country—never came to Galilee again till after his resurrection, which makes this transition very remarkable. Christ did not take his leave of Galilee till he had done his work there, and then he departed thence. Note, As Christ's faithful ministers are not taken out of the world, they are not removed from any place, till they have finished their testimony in that place, Rev. 11. 7. This is very comfortable to those that follow not their own humour, but God's providence, in their removals, that their sayings shall be finished before they depart. And who would desire to continue any where longer than he has work to do for God there?

2. He came into the coasts of Judea, beyond Jordon, that they might have their day of visitation as well as Galilee, for they also belonged to the last sheep of the house of Israel. But still Christ kept to those parts of Canaan that lay towards other nations; Galilee is called Galiel or the Gentiles; and the Syrians dwelt beyond Jordan. Thus Christ insisted, that while he kept within the confines of the Jewish nation, he had his eye upon the Gentiles, and his gospel was aiming and coming toward them.

3. Great multitudes followed him. Where Siber is, there will the gathering of the people be. The redeemed of the Lord are such as follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes, Rev. 14. 4. When Christ departs, it is best for us to follow him. It was a piece of respect to Christ, and yet it was a continual trouble, to be thus crowded after, wherever he went; but he sought not his own ease, nor, considering how mean and contemptible this mob was, (as some would call them,) his own honour much, in the eye of the world; he went about doing good; for so it follows, he healed them there. This shows what they followed him for, to have their sick healed; and they found him as able and ready to help here, as he had been in Galilee; for, wherever this Sun of righteousness arose, it was with healing under his wings. He healed them there, because he would not have them follow him to Jerusalem, lest it should give offence. He shall not strive, nor cry.

3. The Pharisees also came unto him, tempting him, and saying unto him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? 4. And he answered and said unto them, Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning, made them male and female? 5. And said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh? 6. Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. 7. They say unto him, Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? 8. He saith unto them, Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you to put away your wives; but from the beginning it was not so. 9. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery. 10. His disciples say unto him, If the case of the man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry. 11. But he said unto them, All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given. 12. For there are some eunuchs, which were so born from their mother’s womb: and there are some eunuchs, which were made eunuchs of men: and there be eunuchs, which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven’s sake. He that is able to receive it let him receive it.

We have here the law of Christ in the case of divorce, occasioned, as some other declarations of union between them; Eve was a rib out of Adam's side, so that he could not put her away, but he must put away a piece of himself, and contradict the manifest indications of her creation. Christ hints briefly at this, but in appealing to what they had read, he refers them to the original record, where it is observable, that, though the rest of the living creatures were made male and female, yet in the case of Eve, two cominging of any of them, but only concerning mankind; because between man and woman the conjunction is rational, and intended for nobler purposes than merely the pleasing of sense and the preserving of a seed; and it is therefore more close and firm than that between male and female among the brutes, who were not capable of being such help-meets for one another as were the males and females of the human family. Hence this expression is somewhat singular, (Gen. 1. 27.) In the image of God created he him, male and female created he them; and him and them are used promiscuously; being one by creation before they were two, when they became one again by marriage-covenant, that oneness could not but be closer and indissoluble.

8. The fundamental law of marriage, which is, that persons are to cleave to his wife, v. 5. The relation between husband and wife is nearer than that between parents and children; now, if the filial relation may not easily be violated, much less may the marriage-union be broken. May a child desert his parents, or may a parent abandon his children, for any cause, for every cause? No, by no means. Much less may a husband put away his wife, but with whom, though not by the express and immediate curse, yet by the prohibition in the institution, and the bond of union stronger, than between parents and children; for that is in a great measure superseded by marriage, when a man must leave his parents, to cleave to his wife. See here the power of a divine institution, that the result of it is a union stronger than that which results from the highest obligations of nature.

9. The nature of the marriage-contract; it is a union of persons; They twain shall be one flesh, so that (v. 6.) they are no more twain, but one flesh. A man's children are pieces of himself, but his wife is himself. As the conjugal union is closer than that between parents and children, so is it in a manner equivalent to that between one member and another in the natural body. As this is a reason why husband and wife must not part company, so it is a reason why they should not put away their wives; for no one ever yet hated his own flesh, or cut it off, but nourishes and cherishes it, and does all he can to preserve it. They two shall be one, therefore there must be but one wife, for God made but one Eve for one Adam, Mal. 2. 15.

From hence he infers, What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. Note, (1.) Husband and wife are of God's joining together, consequently, he hath joined them together, so the word is, and it is very significant. God himself instituted the relation between husband and wife in the state of innocency. Marriage and the sabbath are the most ancient of divine ordinances. Though marriage be not peculiar to the church, but common to the world, yet being stamped with a divine institution, and here ratified by our Lord Jesus, it ought to be continued after a godly sort, and sanctified by the word of God and prayer. A conscientious regard to God in this ordinance, would have a good influence upon the duty, and consequently upon the comfort, of the relation. (2.) Husband and wife being joined together by the ordinance of God, are not to be put asunder by any ordinance of man. Let not man put them asunder; not the husband himself, or any one for him; not the magistrate, God never gave him authority to do it. The God of Israel hath said, that he hateh putting away, Mal. 2. 16. It is a general rule, that man must not go about to put asunder what God hath joined together.

III. An objection started by the Pharisees against this; an objection not destitute of colour and plausibility; (v. 7.) Why did Moses command to give a writing of divorcement, in case a man did put away his wife? He urged scripture reason against divorce, that they might not make use of it. The seeming contradictions that are in the word of God, are great stumbling-blocks to men of corrupt minds. It is true, Moses was faithful to him that appointed him, and commanded nothing but what he received from the Lord; but as to the thing itself, what they call a command was only an allowance, (Deut. 24. 1.) and designed rather to restrain the wantonness of men, than to give countenance to the thing itself. The Jewish doctors themselves observe such limitations in that law, that it could not be done without great deliberation. A particular reason must be assigned, the bill of divorce must be written, and, as a judicial act, must have all the solemnities of a deed, executed and enrolled. It must be given into the hands of the wife herself, and (which would oblige men to think, and had any consideration in them, to consider) they were expressly forbidden ever to come together again.

IV. Christ's answer to this objection, in which, 1. He rectifies their mistake concerning the law of Moses; they called it a command, Christ calls it but a permission, a toleration. Carnal hearts will take all ell if but an inch be given them. The law of Moses, in this case, was a political law, which gave them a power of免责, but not an ordnance, or a law, which was for reasons of state, that divorces were tolerated. The strictness of the marriage-union being the result, not of a natural, but of a positive, law, the wisdom of God dispensed with diversities in some cases, without any impeachment of his holiness. But Christ tells them there was a reason for this toleration, not at all for their credit; it was because of the hardness of men's hearts, that you were permitted to put away your wives. Moses complained of the people of Israel in his time, that their hearts were hardened, (Deut. 9. 6.—31. 27.) hardened against God; this is here meant of their being hardened against their relations; they were generally violent and outrageous, which way soever they took, both in their appetites and in their passions; and therefore if the heart was hard, it was right that the heart should be softened. If when they had conceived a dislike of them, they would have used them cruelly, would have beaten and abused them, and perhaps have murdered them. Note, There is not a greater piece of hard-heartedness in the world, than for a man to be harsh and severe with his own wife. The Jews, it seems, were infamous for this, and therefore were allowed to put them away; better divorce them than do worse, than that men should without virtuously owning the hardness of their hearts. Observe, He saith, It is for the hardness of your hearts, not only those who lived then, but all their seed. Note, God not only sees, but foresees, the hardness of men's hearts; he suited both the ordinances and provisions of the Old Testament to the temper of that people, both in terror. Further observe, The law of Moses put them asunder, the gospel Christ cures it; and his grace takes away the heart of stone, and gives a heart of flesh. By the law was the knowledge of sin, but by the gospel was the conquest of it.
2. He reduces them to the original institution; But from the beginning it was not so. Note, Corruptions that are crept into any ordinance of God, must be purged out by having recourse to the primitive institution. If the copy be vicious, it must be examined and corrected by the original. Thus, when St. Paul reproved the Corinthians for their disorder in the Lord’s supper, he appealed to the appointment, (1 Cor. 11. 23.) So and so I received from the Lord. Truth was from the beginning; we must therefore inquire for the good old way, (Jer. 6. 16.) and must reform, not by latter patterns, but by ancient rules.

3. He settles the point by an express law: I say unto you, (v. 9.) and agrees with what he said before, (v. 5.) There was there said in preaching, here in dispute, but it is the same, for Christ is constant to himself. Now, in both these places,

(1.) He allows divorce, in case of adultery; the reason of the law against divorce being this, They two shall be one flesh. If the wife play the harlot, and make herself one flesh with an adulterer, the reason of the law ceases, and so does the law. By the law of Moses adultery was punished with death, Deut. 22. 22. Now our Saviour mitigates the rigour of that, and appoints divorce to be the penalty. Dr. Whitby understands this, not of adultery, but (because our Saviour uses the word ἐναργεία—fornication) of uncleanness committed before marriage, but discovered afterward; because, if it were committed after, it was a capital crime, and there needed no divorce. (2.) He disallows it in all other cases; Whosoever putteth away his wife, except for fornication, and marrieth another, commits adultery. This is a direct answer to their query, that it is not lawful. In this, as in other things, gospel-times are times of reformation, Heb. 9. 10. The law of Christ tends to reinstate man in his primitive integrity; the law of love, conjugal love, is no new commandment, but was from the beginning. If we consider what mischiefs to families and societies, what confusion and disorder, would follow upon arbitrary divorces, we shall see how much this law of Christ is for our own benefit, and what a friend Christianity is to our secular interests.

The law of Moses allowing divorce for the hardness of men’s hearts, and the law of Christ forbidding it, intimate, that Christians being under a dispensation of love and liberty, tenderness of heart must be their rule, by which they must deal with one another, not be hard-hearted, like Jews, for God has called us to peace. There will be no occasion for divorces, if we forbear one another, and forgive one another, in love, as those that are, and hope to be, forgiven, and have found God not forward to put us away, Isa. 50. 1. No need of divorces, if husbands love their wives, and wives be obedient to their husbands, and they live together as heirs of the grace of life: and these are the laws of Christ, such as we find not in all the law of Moses.

V. Here is a suggestion of the disciples against this law of Christ; (v. 10.) If the case of a man be so with his wife, it is better not to marry. It seems, the disciples themselves were loath to give up the liberty of divorce, thinking it a good expedient for preserving comfort in the married state; and therefore, like sullen children, if they may not have what they would, they will have nothing at all; if they may not be allowed to put away their wives when they please, they will have no wives at all; though, from the beginning, when no divorce was allowed, God said, It is not good for man to be alone, and blessed them, pronounced them blessed, who were thus strictly joined together; yet, unless they may have a liberty of divorce, they think it is good for a man not to marry. Note, 1. Corrupt nature is impatient of restraint, and would fain break Christ’s bonds in sunder, and have a liberty for its own lusts. 2. It is a foolish, peevish thing for men to abandon the comforts of this life, because of the crosses that are commonly woven in with them. As if we must needs go out of the world, because we lose not every thing to our mind in the world; or must enter into no useful calling or condition, because it is made our duty to abide in it. No, whatever our condition is, we must bring our minds to it, be thankful for its comforts, submissive to its crosses, and, as God has done, set the one over against the other, and make the best of that which is, Eccles. 7. 14.

VI. Christ’s answer to this suggestion, (v. 11, 12.) in which,

1. He allows it good for some not to marry; He that is able to receive it, let him receive it. Christ allowed what the disciples said, It is good not to marry; not as an objection against the prohibition of divorce, as they intended it, but as giving them a rule, (perhaps no less unpleasing to them,) that they who have the gift of continence, and are not under any necessity of marrying, do best if they continue single; (1 Cor. 7. 1.) for they that are unmarried have opportunity, if they have but a heart, to care more for the things of God, than they may please the Lord; (1 Cor. 7. 32, 34.) being less encumbered with the cares of this life, and having a greater vacancy of thought and time to mind better things. The increase of grace is better than the increase of the family, and fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, is to be preferred before any other fellowship.

2. He disallows it, as utterly mischievous, to forbid marriage, because all men cannot receive this saying; indeed few can, and therefore the cross of the married state must be borne, rather than that men should run themselves into temptation, to avoid them; better marry than burn.

Christ here speaks of a two-fold unfruitfulness to marriage:

(1.) That which is a calamity by the providence of God; such as those labour under, who are born childless, or that amongst those who, being incapable of answering one great end of marriage, ought not to marry. But to that calamity let them oppose the opportunity that there is in the single state, of serving God better, to balance it.

(2.) That which is a virtue by the grace of God; such is theirs who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven’s sake. This is meant of an unfruitfulness for marriage, not in body, (which some, through ignorance of Scripture, have foolishly thought,) but in mind. Those have thus made themselves eunuchs, who have attained a holy indifference to all the delights of the married state, have a fixed resolution, in the strength of God’s grace, wholly to abstain from them; and by fasting, and other instances of mortification, have subdued all desires toward them. These are they that can receive this saying; and yet those are not to bind themselves by a vow that they will never marry, only that, in the mind they are now in, they purpose not to marry.

Now, [1.] This affection to the single state must be given of God; for none can receive it, save they to whom it is given. Note, Contemplity is a special gift of God to some, and not to others; and when a man, in the single state, finds, by experience, that he has this gift, he may determine with himself, and (as the apostle speaks, 1 Cor. 7. 57.) stand steadfast in his heart, having no necessity, but having power over his own will, that he will keep himself so. But men, in this case, must take heed lest they boast of a false gift, Prov. 23. 14.

2. The law or grace must be chosen for the kingdom of God's sake; in those who resolve never to marry, only that they may save charges, or may gratify a morose, selfish humour, or have a greater liberty to serve other lusts and pleasures, it is so far from being a virtue, that it is an ill-natured vice; but when it is for religion's sake, not as in itself a meritorious act, (which the papists make it,) but only as a means to keep our minds more, entirely for, and give the more intent upon, the services of religion, and having no families to provide for, we may do the more in works of charity, then it is approved and accepted of God. Note, That condition is best for us, and to be chosen and stuck to accordingly, which is best for our souls, and tends most to the preparing of us for, and the preserving of us to, the kingdom of heaven.

13. Then were there brought unto him little children, that he should put his hands on them, and pray: and the disciples rebuked them. 14. But Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven. 15. And he laid his hands on them, and departed thence.

We have here the welcome which Christ gave to some little children that were brought to him. Observe, 1. The faith of those that brought them. How many there were, that were brought, we are not told; but they were so little as to be taken up in arms, a year old, it may be, or two at most. The account here given of it, is, that there were brought unto him little children, that he should put his hands on them, and pray, v. 13. Probably they were their parents, guardians, or nurses, that brought them; and herein, 1. They testified their respect to Christ, and the value they had for his favour and blessings. Note, Those who glorify Christ by coming to him themselves, should further glorify him by bringing all they have, or have influence upon, to him likewise. Thus give him the honour of his unspeakable riches of grace, his over-flowing, never-failing fulness. We cannot better honour Christ than by making use of him. 2. They did a kindness to their children, not doubting but they would fare the better, in this world and the other, for the blessing and prayers of the Lord Jesus, whom they looked upon at least as an extraordinary Person, as a Prophet, if not as a Priest and King; and the blessings of such were valued and desired. Others brought their children to Christ, to be healed when they were sick; but these children were under no present malady, only they desired a blessing for them. Note, It is a good thing to bring our children to Christ, or to God, and so lay hold of the promises to our children, before we are driven to him (as we say) by woe-need; not only to visit him when we are in trouble, but to address ourselves to him in a sense of our general dependence on him, and of the benefit we expect by him, this is pleasing to him.

They desired that he would put his hands on them, and pray. Imposition of hands was a ceremony used, especially in paternal blessing. Joseph used it when he blessed and adopted the sons of Joseph, Gen. 48. 14. It intimates something of love and familiarity mixed with power and authority, and bespeaks an efficacy in the blessing. Whom Christ prays for in heaven, he puts his hand upon by his Spirit. Note, (1.) Little children may be brought to Christ as needing, and being capable of receiving, blessings from him, and having an interest in his intercession. (2.) Therefore they should be brought to him. We cannot do better for our children than to commit them to the Lord Jesus, to be brought upon, and prayed for, by his name. If he can do nothing for them, it is Christ only that can command the blessing.

II. The fault of the disciples in rebuking them. They discomfaced the address as vain and frivolous, and reproved them that made it as impertinent and troublesome. Either they thought it below their Master to take notice of little children, except any thing in particular alien them; or they thought he had too long abridged his other works, and would not have diverted him from it; or, they thought if such an address as this were encouraged, all the country would bring their children to him, and they should never see an end of it. Note, It is well for us, that Christ has more love and tenderness in him than the best of his disciples have. And let us learn of him not to discomfaced any willing, well-meaning souls in their inquiries after Christ, though they are but weak. If he do not break the bruised reed, we should not. Those that seek unto Christ, must not think it strange if they meet with opposition and rebuke, even from good men, who think they know the mind of Christ better than they do.

III. The favour of our Lord Jesus. See how he carried it here.

1. He blessed the disciples; (v. 14.) Suffer little children, and forbid them not; and he rectifies the mistake they went upon, Of such is the kingdom of heaven. Note, (1.) The children of believing parents belong to the kingdom of heaven, and are members of the visible church. Of such, not only of such in disposition and affection, (that might have served for a reason why doves or lambs should be brought to Christ,) but of such in age, is the kingdom of heaven; to them pertain the privileges of visible church-membership, as among the Jews of old. The promise is to you, and to your children. I will be a God to thee and thy seed. (2.) That for this reason they are welcome to Christ, who is ready to entertain those who, when they cannot come themselves, are brought to him. And this, [1.] In respect to the little children themselves, whom he has upon him as objects of his special, and especially a child, who has participated of the malignant influences of the first Adam's sin, must needs share in the riches of the second Adam's grace, else what would come of the apostle's parallel, 1 Cor. 15. 22. Rem. 5. 14, 15, &c. Those who are given to Christ, as part of his purchase, he will in no wise cast out. [2.] With an eye to the faith of the parents that brought them, and presented them as living sacrifices. Parents are trustees of their children's wills, are empowered by nature to transact for their benefit; and therefore Christ accepts their dedication of them as their act and deed, and will own these dedicated things in the day he makes up his jewels. [3.] Therefore he takes ill of those who forbid them, and exclude those whom he has received; who cast them out of heaven, and say, Ye are no part in the Lord; (see Jesh. 22. 27.) and who forbid water, that they should be baptized, who, if that promise be fulfilled, (Isa. 44. 3.) have received the Holy Ghost as well as we, for aught we know.

2. He received the little children, and did as he was desired; he laid his hands on them, that is, he blessed them. The strongest believer lives not so much for the living Christ as being apprehended of him, (Phil. 3. 12.) not so much by knowing God as by being known of him; (Gal. 4. 9.) and this the least child is capable of. If they cannot stretch out their hands to Christ, yet he can lay his hands on them, and so make them his own, and own them for his own.
do, that I may have eternal life? By this it appears, [1.] That he had a firm belief of eternal life; he was no Sadducee. He was convinced that there is a happiness prepared for those in the other world, who are prepared for it in this world. [2.] That he was concerned to make it sure to himself that he should live and was convinced that he could enumerate, or count the delights of that life more than of any of the delights of this life. It was a rare thing for one of his age and quality to appear so much in care about another world. The rich are apt to think it below them to make such an inquiry as this; and young people think it time enough yet; but here was a young man, and a rich man, solicitous about his soul and eternity. [3.] That he was sensible that he must, for sake, some good things, for the attainment of this happiness. It is by patient continuance in well-doing, that we seek for immortality, Rom. 2. 7. We must be doing, and doing that which is good. The blood of Christ is the only purchase of eternal life, (he merited it for us,) but obedience to Christ is the appointed way to it, Heb. 3. 9. [4.] That he was, or at least thought himself, willing to do what was to be done for the obtaining of this eternal life. Those that know what that involves, and what it is to come short of it, will be glad to accept of it upon any terms.
Such a holy violence does the kingdom of heaven suffer. Note, While there are many that say,
Who will show us any good? our great inquiry should be,
What shall we do, that we may have eternal life?
What shall we do, to be for ever happy, happy in another world? For this world has not that in it, that will make us happy.
[2.] The encouragement that Jesus Christ gave to this address. It is not his manner to send any away with an answer, that come to him on such an errand, for nothing pleases him more, v. 17. In his answer, (1.) He tenderly assists his faith; for, doubtless,
he did not mean it for a reproach, when he said, Why callest thou me good? But he would seem to find that faith in what he said, when he called him good Master, which the gentleman perhaps was not conscious to himself of; he intended no more than to own and honour him as a good man, but Christ would lead him to own and honour him as a good God;
for there is none good but one, that is God. Note, As Christ is graciously ready to make the best that he can of what is said or done amiss; so he is ready to make the most that can be of what is well said and well done. His constructions are often better than our intentions, and what we do for the evil, where he gives the meat, though you little thought it was to me."
Jesus will have this young man either know him to be God, or not call him good; to teach us to transfer to God all the praise that is at any time given to us. Do any call us good? Let us tell them all goodness is from God, and therefore not to us, but to him give glory. All crowns must lie before his throne. Note, God only is good, and there is one name, truly, originally, and necessarily,
God only. His goodness is of and from himself, and all the goodness in the creature is from him;
he is the Fountain of Goodness, and whatever the streams are, all the springs are in him, Jam. 1. 17.
He is the great Pattern and Sample of goodness, by him all goodness is to be measured; that is good, which is like him, and agreeable to his mind. We in our language call him God, because he is good.
This, he foretells, would be the title of his mission—The Brightness of his glory, (and his goodness is his glory,) and the express Image of his person, and therefore fitly called good Master.
(2.) He plainly directs his practice, in answer to his question. He started that thought of his being good, and therefore God, but did not stay upon it, lest he should seem to divert from, and so to drop the main question, as many do in needless disputes and strifes of words. Now Christ’s answer is, in short, this, If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.

[1.] The end proposed is, entering into life. The young man, in his question, speaks of eternal life. Christ, in his answer, speaks of life; to teach us, that eternal life is the only true life. The words concerning that are the words of this life, Acts 5. 20. The present life scarcely deserves the name of life, for the present life is a day for day, not a life. Then the spiritual life is the beginning and earnest of eternal life. He desired to know how he might have eternal life; Christ tells him how he might enter into it: we have it by the merit of Christ, a mystery which was not as yet fully revealed, and therefore Christ waves that; but the way of entering into it, is, by obedience, and Christ directs us in that. Previous to this, we have a word (1 Cor. 15. 13), and they only shall then enter into life that do their duty; it is the diligent, faithful servant that shall then enter into the joy of his Lord, and that joy will be his eternal life. There is an entrance into life now; who have believed, do enter into rest, Heb. 4. 3. We have peace, and comfort, and joy, in the believing prospect of the glory to be revealed, and to this also some obedience is indispensably necessary.

[2.] The way prescribed is, keeping the commandments. Note, Keeping the commandments of God, according as they are revealed and made known to us, is the only way to life and salvation; and sincerity herein is accepted through Christ as our gospel-perfection, provision being made of pardon, upon repentance, wherein we come short. Through Christ we are delivered from the condemning power of the law, but the commanding power of it is lodged in the hand of the Mediator, and under that, in that hand, we still are under the law to Christ, (1 Cor. 9. 12.) under it as a rule, though not as a covenant. Keeping the commandments includes faith in Jesus Christ, for that is the great commandment, (John 14. 23.) and it was one of the laws of Moses, that, when the great Prophet should be raised up, they should obey him. Here it is said, that he is here and forever, it is not enough for us to know the commandments of God, but we must keep them, keep in them as our way, keep to them as our rule, keep them as our treasure, and with care, as the apple of our eye.

[3.] At his further instance and request, he mentions some particular commandments which he must keep: (v. 18, 19.) The young man says unto him, Which? Note, Those that would do the commandments of God, must seek them diligently, and enquire after them, what they are. Ezra set himself to seek the law, and to do it, Ezra 7. 10. “There were many commandments in the law of Moses; good Master, let me know which those are, the keeping of which is necessary to salvation.”

To this Christ replies, which concerns our own and our neighbour’s life; Thou shalt do no murder. Secondly, Our own and our neighbour’s chastity, which should be as dear to us as life itself; Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thirdly, Our own and our neighbour’s wealth and outward estate, as hedged about by the law of property; Thou shalt not steal. Fourthly, That which concerns truth, and our own and our neighbour’s good name; Thou shalt not bear false witness, neither for thyself nor against thy neighbour; for so it is here left at large. Fifthly, That which concerns the duties of particular relations; Honour thy father and mother. Sixthly, That comprehensive law of love, which is the spring and summary of all these duties, whence they all flow, on which they are all founded, and in which they are all fulfilled; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, (Gal. 5. 14. Rom. 13. 9.) that royal law, Jam. 2. 8. This is that comes in here, not as the sum of the second table, but as the particular import of the tenth commandment; Thou shalt not covet, which, in Mark, is, Defraud not; intimating that it is not lawful for me to design advantage or gain to myself by the diminution or loss of another; for that is to covet, and to love myself better than my neighbour, whom I ought to love as myself, and to treat as I would have him treat me.

Our Saviour here specifies second-table duties only; not as if the first were of less account, but, 1. Because they that now sat in Moses’s seat, either wholly neglected, or greatly corrupted, these precepts in their preaching. While they pressed the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin, judgment, and mercy, and faith, the summary of second-table duties, they neglected the first; Their preaching ran out all in rituals, and nothing in morals; and therefore Christ pressed that most, which they least, insisted on. As one truth, so one duty, must not justly out another, but each must know its place, and be kept in it; but equity requires that that be helped up, which is most in danger of being thrust out. That is the present truth which we are called to hear and to do. Some things are not only as opposed, but which is neglected. 2. Because he would teach him, and us all, that moral honesty is a necessary branch of true christianity, and to be minded accordingly. Though a mere moral man comes short of being a complete christian, yet an immoral man is certainly no true christian; for the grace of God teaches us to live soberly and righteously, as well as godly. Nay, though first-table duties have in them some of the essence of religion, yet second-table duties have in them more of the evidence of it. Our light burns in love to God, but it shines in love to our neighbour.

II. See here how he came short, though he bid thus fair, and wherein he failed; he failed by two things.

1. By pride, and a vain conceit of his own merit and strength; this is the ruin of thousands, who keep themselves miserable by fancying themselves happy. When Christ told him what commandments he must keep, he answered very scornfully, All these things have I kept from my youth up, v. 20.

Now, (1.) According as he understood the law, as prohibiting only the outward acts of sin, I am apt to think that he said true, and Christ knew it, for he was, as is said in Mark, He loved him; so far was very good and pleasing to Christ. St. Paul reckons it a privilege, not contemptible in itself, though it was dress in comparison with Christ, that he was, as touching the righteousness that is in the law, blameless, Phil. 3. 6. His observance of these commandments was universal; All these have I kept; it was early and constant; from my youth up. This is the same as our text, for in the same word, Mat. 19. 21, A. M. he specifies several, especially the commandments of the second table. First, That which concerns our own and our neighbour’s life; Thou shalt do no murder. Secondly, Our own and our neighbour’s chastity, which should be as dear to us as life itself; Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thirdly, Our own and our neighbour’s wealth and outward estate, as hedged about by the law of property; Thou shalt not steal. Fourthly, That which concerns truth, and our own and our neighbour’s good name; Thou shalt not bear false witness, further what his duty was; What lack I yet? He was convinced that he wanted something to fill up his works before God, and was therefore desirous to know it, because, if he was not mistaken, he had all that he was wont to fall. He being now attainted, he thus seemed to press forward. And he applied himself to Christ, whose doctrine was supposed to improve and perfect the Mosaic institution. He desired to know what were the peculiar precepts of his religion, that he might have all that was in them to polish and accomplish him. Who could bid fairer? But (2.) Even in this that he said, he discovered his own failing. All these have I kept; what lack I yet? he would have said, with shame and sorrow, All these have I broken, what shall I do to get my sins pardoned?

[2.] Take it how you will, what he said savoured of pride and vainglory, and had in it too much of that boasting which is excluded by the law of faith, (Rom. 3. 27.) and which excludes from justification, Luke 18. 11, 14. He valued himself too much, as the Pharisees did, upon the plausibleness of his profession before men, and was proud of that, which spoiled the acceptableness of it. That word, What lack I yet? perhaps was not so much a desire of further perfection, as a demand of the praise of the world. Sell thou that which is thine own, and wax rich, that thou mayest do good. Christ waved the mower of his boasted obedience to the law, and let that drop, because this would be a more effectual way of discovering him than a dispute of the extent of the law. Come, saith Christ, if thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast. He bid him divide among the poor, and himself to show him any one instance wherein he was deficient.

2. He came short by an inordinate love of the world, and his enjoyment in it. This was the fatal rock on which he split. Observe,

(1.) How he was tried in this matter; (v. 21.) Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor. There was a mixture of what he had said before, expressing the bulk of what he had in the world, as was necessary to as it was to the other disciples to quit their callings; but of it is required that we follow Christ, that we only attend upon his ordinances, strictly conform to his pattern, and cheerfully submit to his disposals, and by upright and universal obedience to observe his statutes, and keep his laws; and all this from a principle of love to him, and dependence on him, and with the power of the Holy Ghost in us, and much more in competition with him. This is to follow Christ fully. To sell all, and give to the poor, will not serve, unless we come, and follow Christ. If I give all my goods to feed the poor, and have not love, it profits me nothing. Well, on these terms, and on no lower, is salvation to be had; and they are very easy and reasonable terms, and will appear so to those who are brought to be glad of it upon any terms.

(2.) See how he was discovered. This touched him in a tender part; (v. 22.) When he heard that saying, he went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions.

[1.] He was a rich man, and loved his riches, and therefore went away. He did not like eternal life upon these terms. Note, First, Those who have much in the world, are in the greatest temptation to love it, and to set their hearts upon it. Such is the heart-settling influence of worldly wealth, that those who want it least, desire it most; when riches increase, then is the danger of setting the heart upon them, Ps. 62. 10. If he had had but two mites in all the world, and had been commanded to give them to the poor, or but one handful of meal in the barrel, and a little oil in the cruse, and had been hidden, to make a cake of that for a poor widow, he, one world-think, had been much greater, and yet those trials have been overcome; (Luke 21. 4. and 1 Kings 17. 14.) which shows that the love of the world draws stronger than the most pressing needs.
cies. Secondly, The reigning love of this world keeps many from Christ, who seem to have some good desires toward him. A great estate, as to those who are got above it, is a great furnishing; so to those who are entangled in the love of it, it is a great hinderance, in the way to heaven.

Yet something of honesty there was in it, that when he did not like the terms, he went away, and would not pretend to that which he could not find in his heart to come up to the strictness of; better so, than do as Demas did, who, having known the way of righteousness, afterward turned aside, out of love to this present world, to the greater scandal of profession; since he could not be a complete christian he would not be a hypocrite.

[2.] Yet he was a thinking man, and well inclined, and could, after his way sorrowful. He had a leaning toward Christ, and was loath to part with him. Note, Many a one is ruined by the sin he commits with reluctance; leaves Christ sorrowfully, and yet is never truly sorry for leaving him, for, if he were, he would return to him. Thus this man's wealth was vexation of spirit to him, then when it was his temptation. What then would the sorrow be afterward, when his possessions would be gone, and all hopes of eternal life gone too?

23. Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you. That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven. 24. And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. 25. When his disciples heard it, they were exceedingly amazed, saying, Who then can be saved? 26. But Jesus beheld them, and said unto them, With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible. 27. Then answered Peter, and said unto him, Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed thee: what shall we have therefore? 28. And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. 29. And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall inherit everlasting life. 30. But many that are first shall be last; and the last shall be first.

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples upon occasion of the rich man's breaking with Christ.

1. Christ took occasion from thence to show the difficulty of the salvation of rich people, v. 23, 26. 1. That it is a very hard thing for a rich man to get to heaven, such a rich man as this here. Note, From the harms and falls of others it is good for us to infer that which will be of caution to us.

Now, (1.) This is vehemently asserted by our Saviour, v. 23, 24. He said this to his disciples, who were all veryends and busy little in the world, to reconcile them to their condition with this, that the less they had of worldly wealth, the less hinderance they had in the way to heaven. Note, It should be an satisfaction to them who are in a low condition, that they are not exposed to the temptations of a high and prosperous condition: if they live more hardly in this world than the rich, yet, if withal they get more easily to a better world, they have no reason to complain. This saying is ratified, v. 23, Verily I say unto you. He that has reason to know what the way to heaven is, for he has laid it open, he tells us that this is one of the greatest difficulties in the way to heaven, which is not expected by those that are from them, and more loath to believe. Thus he speaks, yea, twice, that which man is loath to perceive, and more loath to believe.

[1.] He saith that it is a hard thing for a rich man to be a good christian, and to be saved; to enter into the kingdom of heaven, either here or hereafter. The way to heaven is to all a narrow way; and the gate that leads into it a strait gate; it is only given to those who are strictly observed, are expected from them than from others, which they can hardly do; and more sins do easily beset them, which they can hardly avoid. Rich people have great temptations to resist, and such as are very insinuating; it is hard not to be charmed with a smiling world; very hard, when we are filled with these hid treasures, not to take up with them for a portion. It is very difficult for people to part with their lands, their interest, their time, and their opportunities of doing and getting good, above others. It must be a great measure of divine grace that will enable a man to break through these difficulties.

[2.] He saith that the conversion and salvation of a rich man is so extremely difficult, that it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, v. 24. This is a proverbial expression, denoting a difficulty altogether unconquerable by the art and power of man; nothing less than the almighty grace of God will enable a rich man to get over this difficulty. The difficulty of the salvation of apostates, (Heb. 6. 4.) and of old sinners, (Jer. 13. 25.) is thus represented as an impossibility. The salvation of any is so very difficult, (even the righteous scarcely are saved,) that where there is a peculiar difficulty, it is fitly set forth thus. It is very rare for a man to be rich, and not to set his heart upon his riches; and it is utterly impossible for a man that sets his heart upon his riches to get to heaven; for if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him, I John 2. 15. James 4. 4. First, The way to heaven is very fitly compared to a needle's eye, wherein not a camel can get in through. Secondly, A rich man is fitly compared to a camel, a beast of burden, for he has riches, as a camel has his load; he carries it, but it is another's, he has it from others, spends it for others, and must shortly leave it to others; it is a burden, for men load themselves with thick clay, Hab. 2. 26. A camel is a large creature, but unmindful.

(v. 25.) This is very much wondered at, and scarcely credited by the disciples; v. 25. They were exceedingly amazed, saying, Who then can be saved? Many surprising truths Christ told them, which they were astonished at, and knew not what to make of; this was one, but their weakness was the cause of their wonder. It was not in contradiction to Christ, but for awakening to themselves, that the saying was, Who then can be saved? Note, Considering the many difficulties that are in the way of salvation, it is really strange that any are saved. When we think how good God is, it may seem a wonder that so few are his; but when we think how bad man is, it is more a wonder that so many are, and Christ will be eternally admired in them. Who can then be saved? Since so many are rich, and have great possessions, and so many more would be rich, and are well affected to great possessions; who can be saved? If riches are a hinderance to rich people. are not pride and luxury incident to those that are not rich, and as dangerous to them; and who then can get to heaven? This is a good reason why rich people should strive against the stream.

2. That, though it be hard, yet it is not impossible, for the rich to be saved; (v. 26.) Jesus beheld them, turned and looked wistfully upon his disciples, to shame them out of their fond conceit of the advantages rich people had in spiritual things. He beheld them in their sin that had a root, in their difficulty, and were in a fair way for heaven, and the more so because poor in this world; and he said unto them, With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible. This is a great truth in general, that God is able to do that which quite exceeds all created power; that nothing is too hard for God, Gen. 18. 14. Numb. 11. 23. When men are at a loss, God is not, for his power is infinite and irresistible; hence it is impossible for any to save any. Who can be saved? say the disciples. None, saith Christ, by any created power. With men this is impossible: the wisdom of man would soon be encompassed in contriving, and the power of man baffled in effecting, the salvation of a soul. No creature can work the change that is necessary to the salvation of a soul, either in itself or in any one else. What? said Peter, is the way that our stream should be turned, so hard a heart softened, so stubborn a will bowed. It is a creation, it is a resurrection, and with men this is impossible; it can never be done by philosophy, medicine, or politics; but with God all things are possible. Note, The beginning, progress, and perfection of the work of salvation, depend entirely upon the almighty power of God, to which all things are possible. Faith is with himself and what he will do, (Phil. 4. 13.) and it is kept by it, 1 Pet. 1. 5. Job's experience of God's convincing, humbling grace, made him acknowledge more than any thing else, I know thou canst do every thing, Job 42. 2. (2.) To the salvation of rich people especially; it is impossible with men that such should be saved, but with God even this is possible; not that rich people should be saved in their worldliness, but that they should be saved from it. Note, The same faith and salvation of Christ has been kept by it, and is kept by it, and it is turned, not only to save those that are poor, but also to save those that are otherwise. Note, When the poor were bemoaned with the temptations of this world are not to be despaired of; it is possible; it may be brought about by the all-sufficiency of the divine grace; and when such are brought to heaven, they will be there everlasting monuments of the power of God. I am willing to think that in this word of Christ there is an intimation of mercy Christ had yet in store for this young gentleman, who was now gone away sorrowfully, but that the power of God will yet recover him, and bring him to a better mind.

II. Peter took occasion from hence to inquire what they should get by it, who had come up to these terms, upon which this young man broke with Christ, and had left all to follow him, v. 27. &c. We have here the disciples' expectations from Christ, and his promises to them.

1. What promises should they get from Christ? Peter, in the name of the rest, signifies that they depended upon him for something considerable in lieu of what they had left for him; Behold, we have forsaken all, and have followed thee; what shall we have therefore? Christ had promised the young man, that, if he would sell all, and come and follow him, he should have treasure in heaven: now Peter desires to know, (1.) Whether they had sufficiently come up to these terms; they had not sold all, (for they had many of them wives and families to provide for,) but they had forsaken all; they had not given it to the poor, but they had renounced it as far as it might be any way a hindrance to them in serving Christ. Note, When we hear what are the characters of those that shall be saved, it concerns us to inquire whether we, through grace, answer these characters. Now Peter hopes that, as to the main scope and intention of the condition, they had come up to it, for God had wrought in them a holy contempt of the world and the things that are seen, in comparison with Christ and the things that are not seen; and how this must be evidenced, no certain rule can be given, but according as we are called. Note, Lord, said Peter, we are not sufficient; Alas! it was but a poor all that they had forsaken; one of them had indeed quitted a place in the custom-house, but Peter and the most of them had only left a few brats and nets, and the appurtenances of a poor fishing-trade; and yet observe how Peter there speaks of it, as if it had been some mighty thing; Behold, we have forsaken all. Note, We are too apt to make the most of our services and sufferings, and to value the externals of Christ, and to think we have made him much our debtor. However, Christ does not upbraid them with this; though it was but little that they had forsaken, yet it was their all, like the widow's two mites, and was as dear to them as if it had been more, and therefore Christ took it kindly that they left it to follow him; for he accepts according to what a man hath.

2. What might they expect that treasure which the young man shall have if he will sell all. "Lord," saith Peter, "shall we have it, who have left all?" All people are for what they can get; and Christ's followers are allowed to consult their own true interest, and to ask, What shall we have? Christ looked at the joy set before him, and Moses at the recompense of reward. For this end it is set before us, that by a patient continuance in the same, Christ would encourage us to ask what we shall gain by leaving all to follow him; that we may see he doth not call us to our prejudice, but unspeakably to our advantage. As it is the language of an obedient faith to ask, "What shall we do?" with an eye to the precepts; so it is of a hoping, trusting faith, to ask, "What shall we have?" with an eye to the promises. But observe, the disciples had long since left all to ensure themselves in Christ's service; and therefore Christ needed not till now asked, What shall we have? Though there was no visible prospect of advantage by it, they were so well assured of his goodness, that they knew they should not lose by him at last, and therefore referred themselves to him, in what way he would make up their losses to them; minded their work, and asked not what should be their wages. Note, It honours Christ, to trust him and serve him, and to get not inordinate respects of him. Now that this young man was gone from Christ to his possessions, it was time for them to think which they should take to, what they should trust to. When we see what others keep by their hypocrisy and apostacy, it is proper for us to consider what we hope, through grace, to gain, not for, but by, our sincerity and constancy, and then we shall see more reason to pity them, who thus enervate their powers.

We have here Christ's promises to them, and to all others that tread in the steps of their faith and obedience. What there was either of vain-glory or of vain hopes in that which Peter said, Christ overlooks, and is not extreme to mark it, but takes this occasion to give the bond of a promise, (1.) To his immediate followers, v. 28. They had signalized their respect to him, as the first that followed him, and to them he promises not only treasure, but honour, in heaven; and here they have a grant or patent for it from him who is the Fountain of honour in that kingdom; Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration shall sit down upon twelve thrones. Observe, [1.] The preamble to the patent, or the certi-deration of the grant, which, as usual, is a recital of their services; "You have followed me in the regeneration, and therefore this will I do for you." The time of Christ's appearing in this world was a time of regeneration, of reformation, (Heb. 9. 10.) when old things began to pass away, and all things to look new. The disciples had followed Christ when the church was yet in the embryo state, when the privilege of being near his heart was new; now they had more of the work and service of apostles than of the dignity and power that belonged to their office. Now they followed Christ with constant fatigue, when few did; and therefore on them he will put particular marks of honour. Note, Christ hath special favour for those who begin early with him, who trust him further than they can see him, as themselves, who followed him in the regeneration. Observe, Peter spake of their forsaking all, to follow him; Christ only speaks of their following him, which was the main matter.

[2.] The date of their honour, which fixes the time when it should commence; not immediately from the day of the date of these presents, no, they must continue a while in obscurity, as they were. First, That they must stay for their advancement till then. Note, As long as our Master's glory is delayed, it is fit that ours should be so too, and that we should wait for it with an earnest expectation, as of a hope not seen, Rom. 8. 19. We must live, and work, and suffer, in faith, and hope, and patience, which therefore must be tried by these delays. Secondly, That they must share Christ in his advancement; their honour must be a communion with him in his honour. They, having suffered with a suffering Jesus, must reign with a reigning Jesus. The apostles, both here and hereafter Christ will be all in all; we, all in all. So Peter must appear with him; (Col. 3. 4.) and this will be an abundant recompense not only for our loss, but for the delay; and when our Lord comes, we shall receive not only our own, but our own with usury. The longest voyages make the richest returns.

[3.] The honour itself hereby granted; Ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. It is hard to determine the particular sense of this promise, and whether it was not to have many accomplishments, which I see no harm in admitting. First, When Christ is ascended to the right hand of the Father, and sits on the throne of his glory, there the apostles shall receive power by the Holy Ghost; (Acts 1. 8.) shall be so much advanced above themselves as they are now, that they shall wait for it with an earnest expectation, in promoting the gospel; they shall deliver it with authority, as a judge from the bench; they shall then have their commission enlarged, and shall publish the laws of Christ, by which the church, God's spiritual Israel, (Gal. 6. 16.) shall be governed, and Israel according to the flesh, that continues in infidelity, with all others that do likewise, shall be con- demned. This is, in a manner, the same as is explained by Jer. 1. 10. Say, I have set thee over the nations; and Ezek. 20. 4. Wilt thou judge them? or Dan. 7. 18. The saints shall take the kingdom; and Rev. 12. 11. where the doctrine of Christ is called a crown of twelve stars. Secondly, When Christ appears for the destruction of Jerusalem, (ch. 24. 31.) then shall he send the apostles to judge the Jewish nation, because in that destruction their predictions, according to the word of Christ, would be accomplished. Thirdly, Some think it has reference to the conversion of the Jews, which is yet to come, and to which the apostles, with the last remaining of antichrist; so Dr. Whitby; and that "it respects the apostles' government of the twelve tribes of Israel, not by a resurrection of their persons, but by a reviviscence of that Spirit which resided in them, and of that purity and knowledge which they delivered to the world, and chiefly by admission of their gospel to be the standard of their faith, and the direction of their lives." For in that they have fully accomplished the second coming of Jesus Christ, when the saints in general shall judge the world, and the twelve apostles especially, as assessors with Christ, in the judgment of the great day, when all the world shall receive their final doom, and they shall ratify and applaud the sentence. But the tribes of Israel are named, partly because there should be an equality between the number of the twelve tribes and the number of the apostles; partly because the apostles were Jews, befriended them most, and yet were most spiritually persecuted by them; and it intimates that the saints will judge their acquaintance and kindness according to the flesh, and will, in the great day, judge those they had a kindness for; will judge their persecutors, who in this world have not so done.

But the general intention of this promise is, to show the glory and dignity reserved for the saints in heaven, which will be an abundant recompense for the disgrace they suffered here in Christ's cause. There are higher degrees of glory for those that have done and suffered most. The apostles in this world were hurried and tossed, there they shall sit down at rest and ease; here bonds and afflictions, and deaths did abide them, but there they shall sit on thrones of glory; here they were dragged to the bar, there they shall be advanced to the bench, here the twelve tribes of Israel trampled upon them, there they shall tremble before them. And will not this be recompense enough to make up all their losses and expenses for Christ? Luke 23. 29. [4.] The ratification of this grant; It is firm, it is irrevocable. Christ, who in the promise, we are told, "Verily I say unto you, I the Amen, the faithful Witness, who am empowered to make this grant, I have said it, and it cannot be disannulled." (2.) Here is a promise to all others that should in like manner leave all to follow Christ. It was not peculiar to the apostles, to be thus preferred, but this honour have all his saints. Christ will take care they shall none of them lose by him; (v. 29.) Every one that has forsaken anything for Christ, shall receive.

[1.] Losses for Christ are here supposed. Christ had told them that his disciples must deny themselves in all that is done to them in this world; now here he specifies particulars; for it is good to count upon the worst. If they have not forsaken all, as the apostles, they have not followed him. (v. 29.) Every house supposes, and have turned themselves out, to wander in deserts; or dear relations, that would not go with them, to follow Christ; these are particularly mentioned, as hardiest for a tender, gracious spirit to part with; brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children; and lands are added in the close, the profits of which were the support of the family. Now, First, The loss of these things is commonly said to be for Christ's name's sake; else he doth not oblige himself to make it up. Many forsake brethren, and wife, and children, in humour and passion,
ST. MATTHEW, XX.

XX. If the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which went out early in the morning to hire labourers into his vineyard. 2. And when he had agreed with the labourers for a penny a day, he sent them into his vineyard. 3. And he went out about the third hour, and saw others standing idle in the market-place. 4. And said unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard; and whatsoever is right, I will give you. And they went their way. 5. Again he went out about the sixth and ninth hour, and did likewise. 6. And about the eleventh hour he went out, and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle? 7. They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard; and whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive. 8. So when even was come, the lord of the vineyard saith unto his steward, Call the labourers, and give them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first. 9. And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny. 10. But when the first came, they supposed that they should have received more; and they likewise received every man a penny. 11. And when they had received it, they murmured against the good man of the house. 12. Saying, These last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day. 13. But he answered one of them, and said, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny? 14. Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this last even as unto thee. 15. Is it not lawful for me to do to what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil because I am good? 16. So the last shall be first, and the first last: for many be called, but few chosen.

This parable of the labourers in the vineyard is intended,

1. To represent to us the kingdom of heaven, (v. 1.) that is, the way and the method of the gospel-dispensation. The laws of this kingdom are not wrapped up in parables, but plainly set down, as in the sermon upon the mount; but the mysteries of that kingdom are delivered in parables, in sacraments, as here and ch. 13. The duties of Christianity are more necessary to be known than the notions of it; and yet the notions of it are more necessary to be illustrated than the duties of it; which is that which parables are designed for.

II. In particular, to represent to us that concerning the kingdom of heaven, which he had said in the close of the foregoing chapter, that many that are first shall be last, and the last first: with which this parable is connected; that truth, having in it a seeming contradiction, needed farther explication.

CHAP. XX.

We have four things in this chapter: 1. The parable of the labourers in the vineyard, v. 1. 16. II. A prediction of Christ’s approaching sufferings, v. 16. 19. III. The petition of two of the disciples, by their mother, reapaid, v. 29. 30. IV. The petition of the two blind men granted, and their eyes opened, v. 29. 31.
Nothing was more a mystery in the gospel-dispensation than the rejection of the Jews and the calling in of the Gentiles; so the apostle speaks of it; (Eph. 3. 3-6.) that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs: nor was anything more provoking to the Jews than the intimation of it. Now this seems to be the principal scope of this parable, to show that the Jews should not look to their own righteousness, but that the Gentiles should come at the call; but, at length, the gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, and they should receive it, and be admitted to equal privileges and advantages with the Jews; should be fellow-citizens with the saints, which the Jews, even those of them that believed, would be very much disgusted at, but without reason.

We are disposed to believe more generally, and shows us, 1. That God is Deftor to no man; a great truth, which the contents in our Bible give as the scope of this parable. 2. That many who begin last, and promise little in religion, sometimes, by the blessing of God, arrive at greater attainments in knowledge, grace, and usefulness, than others whose entrance was more early, and who promised fairer. Though Christ gets all the credit of conversion, yet it is the choice of the plain, outstaves. Cushi, John is swifter of foot, and comes first to the sepulchre: but Peter has more courage, and goes first into it. Thus many that are last, shall be first. Some make it a caution to the disciples, who had boasted of their timely and zealous embracing of Christ; they had left all to follow him; but let them look to it, that they keep up their zeal; let them pretty that of the prodigal son, where he that returned from his wandering, was as dear to his father as he was, that never went astray; first and last alike. 3. That the recompense of reward will be given to the saints, not according to the time of their conversion, but according to the preparations for it by grace in this world; not according to the seniority, (as Gen. 43. 33.) but according to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. He promised to the apostles, who followed him in the regeneration, the beginning of the gospel-dispensation, great glory; (ch. 19. 28.) but he now tells them that those who are in like manner faithful to him, even in the latter end of the world, shall have the same reward, shall sit with Christ on his throne, as well as the apostles, Rev. 2. 26-3. 21. Sufferers for Christ in the latter days shall have the same reward with the martyrs and confessors of the primitive church, and these are more celebrated; and faithful ministers now, the same with the first fathers.

We have two things in the parable; the agreement with the labourers, and the account with them. (1.) Here is the agreement made with the labourers; (v. 1-7.) and here it will be asked, as usual, who are they? A man that is a householder. God is the great Householder, and the man we are, and whom we serve; as a householder, he has work that he will have to be done, and servants that he will have to be doing; he has a great family in heaven and earth, which is named from Jesus Christ, (Eph. 3. 16.) which he is Owner and Ruler of. God hires labourers, not because he needs them or their services; (some say the righteous, what do we unto him?) but as some chieftains, generous householders keep poor men to work, in kindness to them, to save them from idleness and poverty, and pay them for working for themselves.

[2.] Whence are they hired? Out of the market-place, where, till they are hired into God’s service, they stand idle, v. 3. all the day idle, v. 6. Note, First, The soul of man stands ready to be hired into some service or other; it was (as all the creatures were) created to work, and is either a servant to iniquity, or a servant to righteousness, Rom. 6. 19. Thus he who goes into the field, to feed swine; God, by his gospel, is hiring labourers into his vineyard, to dress it, and keep it, paradise-work. We are put to our choice; for hired we must be; (Jesh. 24. 15.) Choose ye this day whom you will serve. Secondly, Till we are hired into the service of God, we are standing all the day idle; a sinful state, though a state of drudgery; but being thus employed, we are sinners; sinners are doing nothing, nothing to the purpose, nothing of the great work they were sent into the world about, nothing that will pass well in the account. Thirdly, The gospel-call is given to those that stand idle in the market-place. The market-place is a place of concourse, and there stood many idle; (Prov. 1. 20, 21.) it is a place of sport, there the children are playing; (ch. 11. 16.) and does the gospel call us out of the place of business, of noise and hurry; and from that we are called to retire. “Come, come from this marketplace.”

[3.] What are they hired to do? To labour in his vineyard. Note, First, The church is God’s vineyard; it is of his planting, watering, and fencing; and the fruits of it must be to his honour and praise. Secondly, We are called upon; all called upon are shepherds in this vineyard. The work of religion is vineyard-work, pruning, dressing, digging, watering, fencing, weeding. We have each of us our own vineyard to keep, our own soul; and it is God’s, and to be kept and dressed for him. In this work we must not be slothful, nor loiterers, but labourers, working, and working out our own salvation. Work for God will not add to teaching, he may go on till hell; but he that will go to heaven, must be busy.

[4.] What shall be their wages? He promises, First, A penny, v. 2. The Roman penny was, in our money, of the value of sevenpence halfpenny, a day’s wages for a day’s work, and the wages sufficient for the day’s maintenance. This doth not prove that the reward of our obedience to God is of works, or of debt, (so, it is of grace, free grace, Rom. 4, 6.) but there is no proportion between our services and heaven’s glory; no, when we have done all, we are unprofitable servants; but it is to signify that there is a reward set before us, and a sufficient one. Secondly, Whosoever is right, v. 4, 7. Note, God will be sure not to be behindhand with any for the service they do him; never any lost by working for God. The crown set before us is a crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge shall give.

[5.] For what term are they hired? For a day. It is but a day’s work, that is here done. The time of life is the day, in which we must work the works of him that sent us into the world. It is a short time; the reward is for eternity, the work is but for a day; man is said to accomplish, as a hireling, his day, Job 14, 6. This should unstop us to expedi- tion and diligence in our work, that we have but a little time to work in, and the night is hastening on, when no man can work; and if our great work be undone when our day is done, we are undone for ever. It should also encourage us in reference to the hardships and difficulties of our work, that it is but for a day; the approaching shadow, which the servant earnestly dearest, will bring it all into view, not only in the reign, and the reward of our work, Job 7, 2. Hold out, faith and patience, yet a little while.

[6.] Notice is taken of the several hours of th-
day, at which the labourers were hired. The apostles were sent forth at the first; and third hour of the gospel-day; they had a first and a second mission, while Christ was on earth, and their business was to call in the Jews; after Christ's ascension, about the sixth and ninth hour, they were sent out again on the same occasion, for a third time, just as they had done in the gospel to the Jews only, to them in Judea first, and afterward to them of the dispersion; but, at length, as it were about the eleventh hour, they called the Gentiles to the same work and privilege with the Jews, and told them that in Christ Jesus there should be no difference made between Jew and Greek.

But this may be, and commonly is, applied to the several acts of life, in which souls are converted to Christ. The common call is promising, to come work in the vineyard; but the effectual call is particular, and it is then effectual when we come at the call.

First, Some are effectually called, and begin to work in the vineyard when they are very young; and are sent in early in the morning, whose tender years are seasoned with grace, and the remembrance of their Creator. John the Baptist was sanctified from the womb, and therefore great; (Luke 1. 15.) Timothy from a child; (2 Tim. 3. 15.) Obadiah feared the Lord from his youth. Those that have such a journey to go, had need set out betimes, the sooner the better.

Secondly, Others are savingly wrought upon in middle age; Go work in the vineyard, at the third, sixth, or ninth hour. The power of divine grace is magnified in the conversion of some, when they are midway of their pleasures and worldly pursuits, as Paul. God has work for all ages; no time amiss to turn to God; note can say, "it is all in good time," for, whatever hour of the day it is with us, the time past of our life may suffice that we have served sin; Go ye also into the vineyard. God turns away none that are willing to be hired, for yet there is room.

Thirdly, Others are hired into the vineyard in old age, at the eleventh hour, when the day of life is far spent, and there is but one hour of the twelve remaining. None are hired at the twelfth hour; when life is done, opportunity is done; but, "while there is life, there is hope." 1. There is hope for old sinners; for if, in sincerity, they turn to God, they shall doubtless be accepted: true repentance is never too late. And, 2. There is hope of old sinners, that they may be brought to true repentance; nothing is too hard for God to do, it can change the Ethiopian's skin, and the leopards' spots; can set those to work, who have contracted a habit of idleness. Nicodemus may be born again when he is old, and the old man be put off, which is corrupt.

Yet let none upon this presumption, put off their repentance till they are old. These were sent into the vineyard, it is true, at the eleventh hour; but nobody had hired them, or offered to hire them, before; for then, there was a home to go to. It was because the gospel had not been before preached to them. Those that have had gospel-offers made them at the third, or sixth hour, and have resisted and refused them, will not have that to say for themselves at the eleventh hour, that these had; No man has hired us; nor can they be sure that any man will hire them at the ninth or eleventh hour; and therefore not to discourage any, but to assure them all, be it remembered, that now is the accepted time; if we will hear his voice, it must be today.

(2.) Here is the account with the labourers. Observe,

[1.] When the account was taken; when the evening was come, then, as usual, the day-labourers were called and paid. Note, Evening-time is the reckoning time; the particular account must be given up in the evening of our life; for after death cometh the judgment. Faithful labourers shall receive their reward when they die; it is deferred till then, that they may wait with patience for it, but no longer; for God will observe his own rule, The hire of the labourers shall be paid them with the eleventh hour, See Deut. 24. 15. When Paul, that faithful labourer, departs, he is with Christ presently.

The payment shall not be wholly deferred till the morning of the resurrection; but then, in the evening of the world, will be the general account, when every one shall receive according to the things done in the body. When time ends, and with it the world of work and opportunity, then the state of retribution commences; then call the labourers, and give them their hire. Ministers call them into the vineyard, to do their work; death calls them out of the vineyard to receive their penny: and those to whom the call into the vineyard is effectual, the call out of it will be joyful. Observe, They did not come for their pay till they were called; we must with patience wait God's time for our rest and recompense; go by our master's clock. The last trumpet, at the great day, shall call the labourers, 1 Thess. 4. 16. They shall then call, saith the good and faithful servant, and I will answer. In calling the labourers, they must begin from the last, and so to the first. Let not those that come in at the eleventh hour, be put behind the rest, but lest they should be discouraged, call them first. At the great day, though the dead in Christ shall rise first, yet they which are alive and remain, at the coming of the Lord (the eleventh hour of its day) comes, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds; no preference shall be given to seniority, but every man shall stand in his own lot at the end of the days.

[2.] What the account was; and in that observe,

First, The general pay; (v. 9, 10.) They received every man a penny. Note, All that by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honour, and immortality, shall undoubtedly obtain eternal life; (Rom. 2. 7.) not as wages for the value of their work, but as the gift of God. Though there be degrees of glory in heaven, yet it will be to all a complete happiness. Those that come from the east and west, and so come in late, that are picked up out of the highways and the hedges, shall sit down with Abra- ham, Isaac, and Jacob, at the same feast, ch. 8. 11. In heaven, every vessel will be full, brim-full, though the vessels be full, and the large, the small, the jars, and the basins, no preferment is made. But it is also, in the distributions of future joys, as it was in the gathering of the manna, he that shall gather much, will have nothing over, and he that shall gather little will have no lack, Exod. 16. 18. Those whom Christ fed miraculously, though of different sizes, men, women, and children, did all eat, and were filled.

The giving of a whole day's wages to those that had not done the tenth part of a day's work, is designed to shew, that God distributes his rewards by the measure of our faithfulness, and sovereignly, and not of debt. The best of the labourers, and those that begin soonest, having so many empty spaces in their time, and their works not being filled up before God, may truly be said to labour in the vineyard scarcely one hour of their twelve; but because we are under grace, and not under the law, even such defective services, done in sincerity, shall not only be accepted, but by free grace richly rewarded. Compare Luke 17. 7, 8, with Luke 12. 37.

Secondly, The particular pleading with those that were offended with this distribution in gavel-kind. The circumstances of this serve to adorn the para- ble; but the general scope is plain, that the last shall be first. We have here,

1. The offence taken; (v. 11, 12.) They murmur

* * A legal custom, according to which all the sons inherit equally. — Ed.
ed at the good man of the house; not that there is, or can be, any discontent or murmuring in heaven, for that is both guilt and grief, and in heaven there is neither; but there may be, and often are, discontent and murmuring concerning heaven and heavenly things, while they, in prospect, and by God's instalments, are the good things. This signifies the jealousy which the Jews were provoked to by the admission of the Gentiles into the kingdom of heaven. As the elderbrother, in the parable of the prodigal, repined at the reception of his younger brother, and complained of his father's generosity to him; so these labourers quarrelled with their master, and found fault, not because they had not enough, so much as because other servants had more than they had, and the prodigal's elder brother did, of their good services; We have borne the burden and Heat of the day; that was the most they could make of it. Sinners are said to labour in the very fire, (Hab. 2. 13.) whereas God's servants, at the worst, do but labour in the sun; not in the heat of the iron-furnace, but only in the heat of the day. Now these last have worked but one hour, and that too in the cool of the day; and yet thou hast made them equal with us.

The Gentiles, who are newly called in, have as much of the privileges of the kingdom of the Messiah as the Jews have, who have so long been labouring in the vineyard of the Old-Testament church, under the yoke of the ceremonial law, in expectation of that kingdom. Note, There is a great proneness in men, when they are at leisure, and where they have not too much, of the tokens of God's favour; and that we do too much, and others too little, in the work of God. Very apt we all are to undervalue the deserts of others, and to overvalue our own. Perhaps, Christ here gives an intimation to Peter, not to boast too much, as he seemed to do, of his having left all to follow Christ; as if, because he and the rest of them had borne the burden and heat of the day thus, they must have a heaven by themselves. It is hard for those that do or suffer more than ordinary for God, not to be elevated too much with the thought of it, and to expect to merit by it. Blessed Paul guarded against this, when, though the chief of the apostles, he owned himself to be nothing, to be less than the least of all saints.

2. The offence removed. Three things the master of the house urges, in answer to this ill-natured surmise.

(1.) That the complainant had no reason at all to say, he had any wrong done to him, v. 13, 14. Here he asserts his own justice; Friend, I do thee no wrong. He calls him friend, for in reasoning with others we should use soft words and hard arguments; if our inferiors are peevish and provoking, yet we should not thereby be put into a passion, but speak calmly to them. [1.] It is incontrovertible, true, that God can do no wrong. This is the prerogative of the King of kings. Is there unrighteousness with God? The apostle startles at the thought of it; God forbid! Rom. 3. 5, 6. His word should silence all our murmurings, that, whatever God doth to us, or withholds from us, he doth us no wrong. [2.] If God gives that which we others, which he denies to us, it is kindness to them, but no injustice to us, and bounty to another, while it is no injustice to us, we ought not to find fault with. Because it is free grace, that is given to these that have it, boasting is for ever excluded; and because it is free grace that is withheld from those that have it not, murmuring is for ever excluded. Thus shall every mouth be stopped, and all flesh shall confess that God is righteous.

To convince the murmurer that he did no wrong, he refers him to the bargain, Didst not thou agree with me for a penny? And if thou hast what thou didst agree for, than hast no reason to cry out of wrong; thou shalt have what we agreed for.

Though God is a Debtor to none, yet he is graciously pleased to make himself a Debtor by his own promise, for the benefit of which, through Christ, believers agree with him, and he will stand to his part of the agreement. Note, It is good for us often to reflect upon what we agreed with God for. First, Our worldly blessings, and those that God doth agree with us for, are the best things in the world; they choose their portion in this life; (Ps. 17. 14.) in these things they are willing to have their reward, (ch. 6. 2, 5.) their consolation, (Luke 6. 24.) their good things; (Luke 16. 25.) and with these they shall be put off, shall be cut off from spiritual and eternal blessings; and herein God doth them no wrong; they have what they chose, the penny they parted with, before they entered into the kingdom of heaven, and they themselves have decided it; it is conclusive against them. Secondly, Obdurate believers agree with God for their penny in the other world, and they must remember that they have so agreed. Didst not thou agree to take God's word for it? Thou didst; and wilt thou go and agree with the world? Didst not thou agree to take up with heaven as thy portion, thy all, and to take up with nothing short of it? And wilt thou seek for a happiness in the creature, or think from thence to make up the deficiencies of thy happiness in God?

He therefore, 1. Ties him to his bargain; (v. 14.) Take that thine is, and go thy way. If we understand it of that which is ours by debt or absolute propriety, it would be a dreadful word; we are all undone, if we be content with what we have that was not given us. The highest creature must go away into nothing, if he must go away with that only which is his own but if we understand it of that which is ours by gift, the free gift of God, it teaches us to be content with such things as we have. Instead of repining that we have no more, let us take what we have, and be thankful. If God be better in any respect to others than to us, yet we have no reason to complain while he is so much better to us than we deserve, in giving us our penny, though we are unprofitable servants. 2. He tells him that these he envied should fare as well as he did; I will give unto this last, even as unto thee; I am resolved I will. Note, The unchangeableness of God's pur poses in dispensing his gifts, should silence our murmurings. If he will do it, it is not for us to gainsay. I will be as willing to give, and who can turn him? Neither giveth he an account of any of his matters; nor is it fit he should.

(2.) He had no reason to quarrel with the master; for what he gave, was absolutely his own, v. 15. As before he asserted his justice, so here his sovereignty: Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with my own? Note, 1. God is the Owner of all good; his property in it is absolute, sovereign, and unlimited. 2. He may therefore give or withhold his blessings, as he pleases. What we have, is not our own, and therefore it is not lawful for us to do what we will with it; but what God has, is his own; and this will justify him, First, In all the dispensations of his providence; when God takes from us that which was dear to us, and which we could ill spare, we must silence our discontent with this; My hay do not what he will with his own? Abstain, sed et deduce. He hath taken away; but he originally gave. It is not for such depending creatures as we are to quar rel with our Sovereign. Secondly, In all the dispensions of his grace, God gives or withholds the means of grace, and the Spirit of grace, as he pleases. Not but that there is a counsel in every will of God, and what seems to us to be done arbitrarily, will appear to us to have a good end, when we have the holy ends. But this is enough to silence all murmurers and objectors, that God is sovereign Lord of all, and may do what he will with his own. We are in his hand, as clay in the hands of a potter; and it is not for us to prescribe to him, or strive with him.
(3.) He had no reason to envy his fellow-servant, or to grudge at him; or to be angry that he came into the vineyard more soberly; for he was not sober called; he had no reason to be angry that the master had given him wages for the whole day, when he had idled away the greatest part of it; for, Is thine eye evil, because I am good? See here,
[1.] The nature of envy; "It is an evil eye."
The eye is often both the inlet and the outlet of this sin.
Saw that he was prospered, and he eyed him, than his gnawing of the flesh, 18, 9, 13.
It is an evil eye, which is displeased at the good of others, and desires their hurt.
What can have more evil in it? It is grief to ourselves, anger to God, and ill-will to our neighbour; and it is a sin that has neither pleasure, profit, nor honour, in it; it is an evil, an only evil.
[2.] The aggravation of it; "It is because I am good."
Envy is unlikeliness to God, who is good, and doeth good, and delighteth in doing good; nay, it is an opposition and contradiction to God; it is a dislike of his proceedings, and a displeasure at what he doeth, and is pleased with. It is a direct violation of both the two great commandments at once; both that of love to God, in whose will we should acquiesce, and love to our neighbour, in whose welfare we should rejoice. Thus man's badness takes occasion from God's goodness to be more exceeding sin.

Lastly, Here is the application of the parable, (v. 16.) in that observation which occasioned it; (ch. 19. 30.) So the first shall be last, and the last first. There were many that followed Christ now in the regeneration, when the gospel-kingdom was first set up, and these Jewish converts seemed to have got the start of others; but Christ, to obviate and silence their boasting, here tells them, that in the day of Christ's kingdom, many may be overtopped, even as the strongest will be overtopped by their successors in profession, and, though they were before others in profession, might be found inferior to them in knowledge, grace, and holiness. The Gentile church, which was as yet unborn, the Gentile world, which as yet stood idle in the marketplace, would produce greater numbers of eminent, useful christians, than were found among the Jews. More and more excellent shall be the children of the destitute, the poor, of Jerusalem.

What knows but that the church, in its old age, may be more fat and flourishing than ever, to shew that the Lord is upright? Though primitive christianity had more of the purity and power of that holy religion than is to be found in the degenerate age wherein we live, yet what labourers may be sent into the vineyard in the eleventh hour of the church's day, in the Philadelphia period, and what plentiful effusions of grace may then be, above what has been yet, who can tell?

2. That they had reason to fear, lest they themselves should be found hypocrites at last; for many are called, but few chosen. This is applied to the Jews; (ch. 22. 14.) it was so then, it is too true still; many are called with a common call, that are not chosen with a saving choice. All that are chosen from eternity, (v. 18.) are called, and chosen, in the fullness of time, (Rom. 8. 30.) so that those who are professionally calling sure, we make sure our election; (2 Pet. 1. 10.) but it is not so as to the outward call; many are called, and yet refuse, (Prov. 1. 24.) nay, as they are called to God, so they go from him, (Hos. 11. 2, 7.) by which it appears that they were not chosen, for the election will obtain, Rom. 11. 7. Notice, There are but few chosen Christians, in comparison with the many that are only called Christians; it therefore highly concerns us to build our hope for heaven upon the rock of an eternal choice, and not upon the sand of an external call; and we should fear lest we be found but seeming Christians, and so should really come short; nay, lest we be found blenished Christians, and so should seem to come short, Heb. 4. 1.

17. And Jesus, going up to Jerusalem, took the twelve disciples apart in the way, and said unto them, 13. Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be betrayed unto the chief priests, and unto the Scribes, and they shall condemn him to death.
And shall deliver him to the Gentiles, to mock, and to scourge, and to crucify him: and the third day he shall rise again.

This is the third time that Christ gave his disciples notice of his approaching sufferings; he was now going up to Jerusalem to celebrate the passover, and to offer up himself, the Great Passover; both must be done at Jerusalem, there the passover must be kept, (Deut. 12. 5.) and there a prophet must perish, because there the great Saviour sat, who were judges in that case, Luke 13. 33.

Observe,
1. The privacy of this prediction; He took the twelve disciples apart in the way. This was one of those things which were told them in darkness, in which they were afterward to speak in the light, ch. 10. 27. His secret was with them, as his friends, and this particularly. It was a hard saying, and, if any could bear it, they could. They would be more immediately exposed to peril with him, and therefore it was requisite that they should know of it, that being forewarned, they might be fore-armed. It was not fit to be spoken publicly as yet, 1. Because many, that were cool toward him, would hereby be made to be more full of fear, and to turn their backs upon him; the scandal of the cross would have frightened them from following him any longer. 2. Because many, that were hot for him, would hereby be driven to take up arms in his defence, and it might have occasioned an uproar among the people, (ch. 26. 5.) which would have been laid to his charge, if he had told them of it publicly before; and, besides that such methods are utterly disagreeable to the genius of his kingdom, which is not of this world, he never countenanced any thing which had a tendency to prevent his sufferings. This discourse was not in the synagogue, or in the house, but in the way, as they travelled along; which teaches us, in our walks or travels with our friends, to keep up such discourse as is good, and to the use of edifying. See Deut. 16. 7.

II. The prediction itself, v. 18, 19. Observe,
1. It is but a repetition of what he had once and again said before, ch. 16. 21.—17. 22, 23. This intimates that he not only saw clearly what troubles lay before him, but that his heart was upon his suffering work; it filled him, not with fear, then he would have studied to avoid it, and could have done it, but with desire and expectation; he spake thus frequently of his sufferings, because through them he was to enter into his glory. Note, It is good for us to be often thinking and speaking of our tribulations and of the sufferings which, it is likely, we may meet with betwixt this and the grave; and thus, by making them more familiar, they would become less formidable. This is one way of dying daily, and of taking up our cross daily, to be daily speaking of the cross, and of dying; which would come neither the sooner nor the surer, but much the better, for our thoughts and discourses of them;
2. He is more particular here in foretelling his sufferings than any time before. He had said, (ch. 16. 21.) What he should suffer many things, and he killed; and (ch. 17. 22.) that he should be betrayed into the hands of men, and they should kill him; but here he adds, that he shall be delivered to the Gentiles, that they shall mock him, and scourge him, and crucify him. These are frightful things, and the certain foresight of them was enough to damp an ordinary resolution, yet (as was foretold concerning him, Isa. 42. 4.) he did not fail, nor was discouraged; but the more clearly he foresaw his sufferings, the more cheerfully he went forth to meet them. He was ready when they should fall, by the chief priests and the Scribes; so he had said before, but here he adds, They shall deliver him to the Gentiles, that he might be the better understood; for the chief priests and Scribes had no power to put him to death, nor was crucifying a manner of death in use among the Jews. Christ suffered from the malice both of Jews and Gentiles, because he was to suffer for the salvation both of Jews and Gentiles; both had a hand in his death, because he was to reconcile both by his cross, Eph. 2. 16.

3. Here, as before, he annexes the mention of his resurrection and his glory to that of his death and sufferings; The third day he shall rise again. He still brings this in, (1.) To encourage himself in his sufferings, and to carry him cheerfully through them. He was resolved if they should kill him before he foresaw he should rise again, and rise quickly, the third day. He shall be straightway glorified, John, 13. 32. The reward is not only sure, but very near. (2.) To encourage his disciples, and comfort them, who would be overwhelmed and greatly terrified by his sufferings. (3.) To direct us, under all the sufferings of this present time, to keep up a believing prospect of the glory to be revealed, to look at the things that are not seen, that are eternal, which would enable us to call the present afflictions light, and but for a moment.

20. Then came to him the mother of Zebedee’s children with her sons, worshipping him, and desiring a certain thing of him. 21. And he said unto her, What wilt thou? She saith unto him, Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on the left, in thy kingdom. 22. But Jesus answered and said, Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? They say unto him, We are able. 23. And he saith unto them, Ye shall drink indeed of my cup, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with; but to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father. 24. And when the ten heard it, they were moved with indignation against the two brethren. 25. But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. 26. But it shall not be so among you; but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; 27. And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant. 28. Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.

Here is, first, the request of the two disciples to Christ, and the rectifying of the mistake upon which that was grounded, v. 26, 27. The sons of Zebedee were James and John, two of the first three of Christ’s disciples; Peter and they were his favourites; John was the disciple whom Jesus loved; yet none were so often reproved as they; whom Christ loved he reproved more than any. I. Here is the ambitious address they made to Christ—that they might sit, the one on his right hand, and the other on his left, in his kingdom, v. 20, 21. It was a great degree of faith, that they were confident of his kingdom, though now he appeared in meanness; but a great degree of ignorance, that they still expected a temporal kingdom with worldly power and power, when Christ had so often told them of sufferings and self-denial. In this they expected to be grandees. They ask not for employment in this kingdom, but for honour only; and no place would serve them, in this imaginary kingdom, but the highest, next to Christ, and above every body else. It is probable, that the last word in Christ’s foregoing discourse gave occasion to this request. They knew not then that his kingdom was not of this world, and therefore concluded that his resurrection would be his entrance upon his kingdom, and therefore were resolved to put in betimes for the best place; nor would they lose it for want of speaking early. What Christ said to comfort them, they thus abused, and were puffed up with. Some cannot bear comforts, but they turn them to a wrong purpose; as sweetmeats in a feverish man, produce bile. Now observe, 1. There was policy in the management in this address, that they put their mother on to present it, that it might be looked upon as her request, and not theirs. Though proud people think well of themselves, they would not be thought to do so, and therefore affect nothing more than a show of humility, (Col. 2. 18.) and others must be put on to court that honour for them, which they are ashamed to court for themselves. The mother of James and John was Salome, as appears by comparing ch. 27. 61. with Mark 15. 40. Some think she was daughter of Cleophas or Alpheus, and sister or cousin german to Mary the mother of our Lord. She was one of those women that attended Christ, and ministered to him; and they thought she had such an interest in him, that he could deny her nothing, and therefore they asked this of him. Adonijah had an unreasonable request to make to Solomon, he put Bathsheba on to speak for him. It was their mother’s weakness thus to become the tool of their ambition, which she should have given a check to. Those that are wise and good, would not be seen in an ill-favoured thing. In gracious requests, we should learn this wisdom, to desire the more proper persons of those that have an interest at the throne of grace; we should beg of our praying friends to pray for us, and reckon it a real kindness.

It was likewise policy to ask first for a general grant, that he would do a certain thing for them, not in faith, but in presumption, upon that general promise: Ask, and it shall be given you; in which is implied this qualification of our request, that it be according to the call of God, otherwise we ask and have not, if we ask to consume it upon our lusts, Jam. 4. 3.

2. There was pride at the bottom of it, a proud conceit of their own merit, a proud contempt of their brethren, and a proud desire of honour and preferment; pride is a sin that most easily besets us, and which it is hard to get clear of. It is a holy ambition, to strive to excel others in grace and holiness. But it is a sinful ambition to covet to exceed others in pomp and grandeur. Seest thou great things for thyself, when thou hast just now heard of the Master's being mocked, and scourged, and crucified? For shame! Seek them not, Jer. 43. 5.

II. Christ's answer to this address, (v. 22, 23.) directed not to the mother, but to the sons that set her up. "You must, therefore, be quiet and be silent. "Tell them, therefore, that it is the Spirit of the Lord which is sent to them by him, as he is in the heart of the "world, and that it is the Lord, who will send them. "They shall be given to you, as you shall stand before me; and it shall be given to you, as you stand before me, in the "world. "They shall be given to you, as you shall stand before me, in the world, as the Spirit of the Lord, which is sent to you, by him, as he is in the heart of the world. "Tell the sons that set her up, that it is the Spirit of the Lord which is sent to them by him, as he is in the heart of the world. "Tell them, therefore, that it is the Spirit of the Lord which is sent to them by him, as he is in the heart of the world."

1. How he reproved the ignorance and error of their petition; Ye know not what ye ask. (1.) They were much in the dark concerning the kingdom they and their eye upon the darkness that is in the world. They knew not what it was to sit on his right hand, and on his left; they talked of it as blind men do of colours. Our apprehensions of that glory which is yet to be revealed, are like the apprehensions which a child has of the preferments of grown men. If at length, through grace, we arrive at perfection, we shall then put away such childish fanciful visionary ideas, and our knowledge and intuition be as clear as the world. The disciples thought, when they had fasted, till they had for Christ, and had gone about the country a while preaching the gospel of the kingdom, all their service and suffering were over, and it was now time to ask, What shall we have? As if nothing were now to be looked for but crowns and garlands; whereas there were far greater hardships and difficulties before them than they had yet met with. They imagined they were on parade, and they had yet but run with the footmen. They dream of being in Canaan presently, and consider not what they shall do in the swellings of Jordan. Note, [1.] We are all apt, when we are but girding on the harness, to boast as though we had put it off. [2.] We know not what we ask, when we ask for the glory of wearing the crown, and ask not for grace to bear the cross in that stead.

2. How he repressed the vanity and ambition of their request. They were pleasing themselves with the fancy of sitting on his right hand, and on his left, in great state; now, to check this, he leads them to the thoughts of their sufferings, and leaves them in the dark about their glory.

(1.) He leads them to the thoughts of their sufferings, which they were not so mindful of as they ought to be; when we come to see face to face, we shall know what we enjoy; but now, alas, we know not what we ask; we can but ask for the good as it lies in the promise, Tit. 1. 2. What it will be in the performance, eye has not seen, nor ear heard. (2.) They were much in the dark concerning the way to that kingdom. They know not what they ask, who ask for the end, but overlook the means, and so put asunder what God has joined together. The disciples thought, when they had fasted, till they had for Christ, and had gone about the country a while preaching the gospel of the kingdom, all their service and suffering were over, and it was now time to ask, What shall we have? As if nothing were now to be looked for but crowns and garlands; whereas there were far greater hardships and difficulties before them than they had yet met with. They imagined they were on parade, and they had yet but run with the footmen. They dream of being in Canaan presently, and consider not what they shall do in the swellings of Jordan. Note, [1.] We are all apt, when we are but girding on the harness, to boast as though we had put it off. [2.] We know not what we ask, when we ask for the glory of wearing the crown, and ask not for grace to bear the cross in that stead.

Observe, [1.] How fairly he puts the matter to them, concerning these difficulties; (v. 22.) You would have had the best part of the honour in the kingdom; but are you able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of? You talk of what great things you must have when you have your work done; but are you able to hold out to the end of it? Put the matter seriously to yourselves. These same two disciples once knew not what manner of spirit they were of, when they were disturbed with anger; (Luke 9. 55.) and now they were not aware what was amiss in their spirits, when they were lifted up with ambition. Christ sees that pride in us, which we discern not in ourselves.

Note. First, That to suffer for Christ, is to drink of a cup, and to be baptized with a baptism. In this description of sufferings, 1. It is true, that affliction doth absorb thespirits of the saints, and is drunk of, wornwood and gall, these waters of a full cup, that are wrung out to God's people; (Ps. 73. 10.) a cup of trembling indeed, but not of fire and brimstone, the portion of the cup of the wicked men, Ps. 11. 6. It is supposed to be a baptism, a washing with the waters of affliction; some are dipped in them, the waters compass them about even to the soul; (Jonah 2. 5.) others have but a sprinkling of them, but both are baptized, some are overwhelmed in them, as in a deluge, others ill wet, as in a sharp shower. But, 2. Even in this, consolation doth more abound. It is but a cup, not an ocean; it is but a draught, bitter perhaps, but we shall see the bottom of it: it is a cup in the hand of a Father; (John 18. 11.) and it is full of mixture, Ps. 75. 8. It is but a baptism; if dipped, that is the worst of it, not drowned; perplexed, but not in despair. Baptism is an ordinance by which we join ourselves to the Lord in covenant and communion; and so is suffering for Christ, Ezek. 20. 37. Isa. 48. 10. Baptism is "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace;" and so is suffering for Christ, for unto us it is given, Phil. 1. 29.

Secondly, It is to drink of the same cup that Christ drank of, and to be baptized with the same baptism that he was baptized with. It is supposed to be a bitter cup, and an unclean malefactor. But in all this he was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, and was made sin for us. 2. It bespeaks the consolations of suffering Christians, that they do but pledge Christ in the bitter cup, are partakers of his sufferings, and fill up that which is behind of them; we must therefore arm ourselves with the same mind, and go to him without the camp. Thirdly, It is supposed to be often putting it to ourselves, whether we are able to drink of this cup, and to be baptized with this baptism. We must expect suffering, and look upon it as a hard thing to suffer well, and as becomes us. Are we able to suffer cheerfully, and in the worst of times still to hold fast our integrity? What can we afford to part with for Christ? How far will we give him credit? Could I find in my heart to drink of a bitter cup, rather than let go my hold of Christ? The truth is, Religion, if it be worth any thing, is worth every thing; but it is worth little, if it be not worth suffering for. Now let us sit down, and count the cost of dying for Christ, rather than denying him, and ask, Can we take him upon these terms?

[2.] See how boldly they engage for themselves, they said, in the midst of the assembly, of sitting on his right hand, and on his left; but at the same time they fondly hoped that they should never be tried. As before they knew not what they asked, so now they knew not what they answered. We are able; they would have done well to put in, "Lord, by thy strength, and in thy grace, we are able, otherwise we are not." But the same that was Peter's temptation, to be confident of his own sufficiency, and presume upon his own strength, was here the temptation of James and John; and it is a sin we are al-prone to. They knew not what Christ's cup was, nor what his baptism, and therefore they were thus bold in promising for themselves. But these are commonly most confident, that are least acquainted with the case.

[3] See how plainly and positively their sufferings are here foretold; (v. 23) Ye shall drink of my cup. Sufferings foreseen will be more easily borne, especially if looked upon under a right notion, as drinking of his cup, and being baptized with his baptism. Christ began in suffering for us, and expects we should pledge him, in suffering for him. Christ knew how the first, that we must make the best of our way to heaven, which is, that ye shall suffer. James drank the bloody cup, first of all the apostles, Acts 12. 2. John, though at last he died in his bed, if we may credit the ecclesiastical historians, yet often drank of this bitter cup, as when he was banished into the isle of Patmos, (Rev. 1. 9.) and when (as they say) at Ephesus he was put into a caldron of boiling oil, but was miraculously preserved. He was, as the rest of the apostles, in deaths often. He took the cup, offered himself to the baptism, and it was accepted.

(2.) He leaves them in the dark about the degrees of their glory. To carry them cheerfully through their sufferings, it was enough to be assured that they should have a place in his kingdom. The lowest seat in heaven is an abundant recompence for all the labours of their calling in earth; and if they had understood, as they did not, the groves and preferences there, it was not fit there should be any intimation given for whom they were intended; for the immensity of their present state could not bear such a discovery with any evenness; "To sit on my right hand and on my left, is not mine to give, and therefore it is not for you to ask it or to know it; but it shall be given to them of whom it is prepared of my Father." Note, [1.] It is very probable that there are degrees of glory in heaven; for our Saviour seems to allow that there are some that shall sit on his right hand and on his left, in the highest places. [2.] As the future glory itself, so the degrees of it, are purposed and prepared in the eternal counsel of God; as the common salvation, so the more peculiar honours, are appointed, the whole affair is long since settled, and there is a certain measure of the stature, both in the place and person, Eph. 4. 13. [3.] Christ, in dispensing the fruits of his purchase, grants them exactly by the measures of his Father's purpose. It is not mine to give, save to them (so it may be read) for whom it is prepared. Christ has the sole power of giving eternal life, but then it is to as many as were given him, John 17. 2. It is not mine to give, that is, to promise now; that matter is already settled and concerted, and the Father and Son understand one another perfectly well in this matter. "It is not mine to give to those that seek and are ambitious of it, but to those that by great humility and self-denial are prepared for it." 111. Here are the reproof and instruction which Christ gave to the other ten disciples for their displeasure at the request of James and John. He had much to bear with in them all, they were so weak in judgment and grace, yet the more from sinners.

1. The fact that the ten disciples were in for it. 24.) They were moved with indignation against the two brethren; not because they were desirous to be preferred, which was their sin, and for which Christ was dispensed with them, but because they were desirous to be preferred before them, which was a reflection upon them. Many seem to have indignation at a man's sin; but it is not the sin, but because it touches them. They will inform against a man that swears; but it is only if he swear at them, and affront them, not because he dishonours God. Those disciples were angry at their brethren's ambition, though they themselves, may because they themselves, were as ambitious. Note, It is common for people to be angry at those sins in others, which they allow of and indulge in themselves. Those that are proud and covetous themselves do not care so much to others so. Nothing shakes the comfort among brethren, nor is the cause of more indignation and contention, than ambition, and desire of greatness. We never find Christ's disciples quarrelling, but something of this was at the bottom of it.

2. The check that Christ gave them, which was very gentle, rather by way of instruction what they should be, than by way of reprehension for what they were. He had reproved this very sin before, (Ch. 18. 3.) and said that they must be humble as little children; yet they relapsed into it, and yet he reproved them for it thus mildly.

He called them unto him, which intimates great tenderness and familiarity. He did not, in anger, bid them get out of his presence, but called them, in love, to come into his presence; for therefore he is fit to teach, and we are invited to learn of him, because he is meek and lowly in heart. What he had to say concerned both the two disciples and the ten, and therefore he will have them all together. And he tells them, that, whereas they were asking which of them should have dominion in a temporal kingdom, there was really no such dominion reserved for any of them. For,

[1.] They must not be like the princes of the Gentiles. Christ contrives that the Gentiles should be like the Gentiles, nor yet like princes of the Gentiles. Principality doth no more become ministers than Gentilism doth Christians.

Observe, [1.] What is the way of the princes of the Gentiles; (v. 25.) to exercise dominion and authority over their subjects, and (if they can but win the upper hand with a strong hand) over the another too. That which bears them up in it, is, that they are great and mighty, and great men think they may do any thing. Dominion and authority are the great things which the princes of the Gentiles pursue, and pride themselves in; they would bear sway, would carry all before them, have every body to truckle to them, and every sheaf bow to their's. They would have it cried before them, Bow the knee; like Nebuchadnezzar, who slew, and kept alive, at pleasure.

[2.] What is the will of Christ concerning his ministers and, in this matter.

First, It shall not be so among you. The constitution of the spiritual kingdom is quite different from this. You are to teach the subjects of this kingdom, to instruct and beseech them, to counsel and comfort them, to take pains with them, and suffer with them, not to exercise dominion or authority over them; you are not to lord it over God's heritage, (1 Pet. 5. 3.) but to labour in it. This forbids not only tyranny, and abuse of power, but the claim or use of any such secular authority as the princes of the Gentiles lawfully exercise. So hard it is for vain men, even good men, to have such authority, and not to be puffed up with it, and do more hurt than good with it, that our Lord Jesus saw fit wholly to banish it out of his church. Paul himself disallowed dominion over the church, 1 Cor. 1. 12. The pomp and grandeur of the princes of the Gentiles ill become Christ's disciples. Now, if there were no such power and honour intended to be in the church, it was nonsense for them to be striving who should have it. They knew not what they asked.

Secondly, How then shall it be among the disciples of Christ? Something of greatness among them Christ himself had intimated, and here he explains it; "He that will be great among you, that will be chief, that would really be so, and would be found to be so at last, let him be your minister, your ser
Here observe, 1. That the title of Christ's disciples to serve one another, for mutual edification. This includes both humility and usefulness. The followers of Christ must be ready to stoop to the meanest offices of love for the good one of another, must submit one to another, (1 Pet. 5. 5. Eph. 5. 21.) and edify one another, (Rom. 14. 19.) please one another for good, Rom. 15. 2. The great apostle made himself every one's servant; see 1 Cor. 9. 19. 2. It is the dignity of Christ's disciples faithfully to discharge this duty. The way to be great and chief is to be humble and serviceable. Those are to be best accounted of, and most respected, in the church, and will be so by all that understand things aright; not those that are dignified with high and mighty names, like the names of the great ones of the earth, that appear in pomp, and assume to themselves a power proportional, for he was that meek and humble and self-denying, and lay out themselves most to do good, though to the diminishing of themselves. These honour God most, and those will he honour. As he must become a fool, that would be wise, so he must become a servant, that would be chief. St. Paul was a great example of this; he laboured more abundantly than they all, made himself (as some would call it) a drudge to his work; and is not he chief? Do not call him an apostle, though he called himself less than the least? And perhaps our Lord Jesus had an eye to him, when he said, There were lost, that should be first; for Paul was one born out of due time; (1 Cor. 15. 8.) not only the youngest child of the family of the apostles, but a posthumous one, yet he became greatest. And perhaps he was for whom the first post of an apostle in Christ's kingdom was reserved, and prepared of his Father, not for James who sought it; and therefore, just before Paul began to be famous as an apostle, Providence ordered it so that James was cut off. (Acts 12. 1.) that in the college of the twelve Paul might be substituted in his room. 10. Never was there such an example of beneficence and usefulness as there was in the death of Christ, who gave his life a ransom for many. He lived as a servant, and went about doing good; but he died as a sacrifice, and in that he did the greatest good of all. He came into the world on purpose to give his life a ransom; it was first in his intention. The aspiring princes of the Gentiles make the lives of many a ransom for their own honour, and perhaps even for their preservation. Christ doth not do so; his subjects' blood is precious to him, and he is not prodigal of it; (Ps. 72. 14.) but, on the contrary, he gives his honour, and life too, a ransom for his subjects. Note, First, Jesus Christ laid down his life for a ransom. Our lives were forfeited into the hands of divine justice by sin. Christ, by parting with his life, made atonement for sin, and so rescued us; he was made Sin and a Curse for us, and died, not only for our good, but in our stead, Acts 20. 28. 1 Peter 1. 18. 19. Secondly, It was a ransom for many, sufficient for all, effectual for many; and, if for many, then, saith the poor doubting soul, "Why not for me?" It was for many, that by him many may be made righteous. These many were his seed, for which his soul travelled; (Isa. 53. 10. 11.) for many, so they will be when they come all together, though now they appear but a little flock. Now this is a good reason why we should not strive for predeency, because the cross is our banner, and our Master's death is our life. It is a good reason why we should study to do good, and, in consideration of the love of Christ in dying for us, not hesitate to lay down our lives for the brethren, 1 John 3. 16. Ministers should be more forward than others to serve and suffer for the good of souls, as blessed Paul was, Acts 20. 24. Phil. 2. 17. The nearer we are all concerned in, and the more we are advantaged by, the humility and humiliation of Christ, the more ready and careful we should be to imitate it. 11. And as they departed from Jericho, a great multitude followed him. 30. And, behold, two blind men sitting by the way-side, when they heard that Jesus passed by, cried out, saying, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou son of David. 31. And the multitude rebuked them, because they should hold their peace: but they cried the more, saying, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou son of David. 32. And Jesus stood still, and called them, and said, What will ye that I shall do unto you? 33. They say unto him, Lord, that our eyes may be opened. 34. So Jesus had compassion on them, and touched their eyes: and immediately their eyes received sight, and they followed him.

We have here an account of the cure of two poor blind beggars; in which we may observe, 1. Their address to Christ, v. 29, 30. And in this, 1. The circumstances of it are observable. It was as Christ and his disciples departed from Jericho; of that devoted place, which was rebuilt under a curse, Christ took his leave with this blessing, for they received it in haste; for the manner of it, the presence of a great multitude that followed him; Christ had a numerous, though not a pompous, attendance, and did good to them, though he did not take state to himself. This multitude that followed Christ was a mixed multitude. Some followed him.
for loaves, and some for love, some for curiosity, and some in expectation of his temporal reign, which the disciples themselves dreamed of, very few with desire to be taught their duty; yet, for the sake of those few, he confirmed his doctrine by miracles wrought in the presence of great multitudes; who, if they were not convinced by the inspired word, be more inexcusable. Two blind men concurcd in the request; for joint-prayer is pleasing to Christ,
ch. 18. 19. These joint-sufferers were joint-sinners; being companions in the same tribulation, they were partners in the same supplication. Note, It is good for those that are labouring under the same calamity, or infirmity of body or mind, to join together in the same prayer to God for relief, that they may quicken one another's faith, and encourage one another's hope.
There is mercy enough in Christ for all the petitioners. These blind men were sitting by the way-side, as blind beggars used to do. Note, Those that would receive mercy from Christ, must place themselves there where his out-goings are; where he manifests himself to those that seek him. It is good thus to way-lay Christ, to be in his road.
These poor men were in need of Christ's grace: for they were blind, they were not deaf. Seeing and hearing are the learning senses. It is a great calamity to want either; but the defect of one may be, and often is, made up in the acuteness of the other; and therefore it has been observed by some, as an instance of the goodness of Providence, that none were ever known to be born both blind and deaf; but that, one way or other, all are in a majority of recent generations, if not in the same generation, had heard of Christ by the hearing of the ear, but they desired that their eyes might see him. When they heard that Jesus passed by, they asked no further questions, who were with him, or whether he was in haste, but immediately cried out. Note, it is good to improve the present opportunity, to make the best of the price now in the hand, because, if once let slip, it can never return, these blind men did so, and did wisely; for we do not find that Christ ever came to Jericho again. Now is the accepted time.
2. The address itself is more observable; Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou Son of David, repeated again, v. 31. Four things are recommended to us for an example in this address; for, though the eye of God is on them, the ingratitude of men was enlighted concerning truth, duty, and interest.
(1.) Here is an example of importunity in prayer.
They cried out as men in earnest; men in want are earnest, of course. Cold desires do but beg denials.
Those that would prevail in prayer, must stir up themselves to take hold on God in the duty. When they were discontented in it, they cried the more.
The stream of fervency, if it be stopped, will rise and swell the higher. This is what the Lord's mercy, in what way he pleases; "Only have mercy." They ask not for silver and gold, though they were poor, but mercy, mercy. This is that which our hearts must be upon, when we come to the throne of grace, that we may find mercy, Heb. 4. 16. Ps. 130. 7.
(2.) Of humility in prayer; in that word, Have mercy on us, not specifying the favour, or prescrb-ing what, much less pleading merit, but casting themselves upon him, and referring themselves cheerfully to, the Mediator's mercy, in what way he pleases; "Only have mercy." They ask not for silver and gold, though they were poor, but mercy, mercy. This is that which our hearts must be upon, when we come to the throne of grace, that we may find mercy, Heb. 4. 16. Ps. 130. 7.
(3.) Of faith in prayer; in the title they gave to Christ, "the Son of David," not only to please, O Lord, thou Son of David; they confess the title "Son of David," and therefore had authority to command deliverance for them. Surely it was by the Holy Ghost that they called Christ Lord, 1 Cor. 12. 3.

Thus they take their encouragement in prayer from his power, as, in calling him the son of David, they take encouragement from his goodness, as Messiah, of whom so many kind and tender things had been foretold, particularly his compassion to the poor and needy, Ps. 72. 12, 13. It is of excellent use, in prayer, to prescribe the name of Messiah; to remember that he is the Son of David, whose office it is to help, and save, and to p lead it with him.

(4.) Of perseverance in prayer, notwithstanding discouragement. The multitude rebuked them, as noisy, clamorous, and importent, and bid them hold their peace, and not disturb the Master, who perch shadow of himself, and was eager to know, seeing Christ with our prayers, we must expect to meet with hinderances and manifold discouragements from within and from without, something or other that bids us hold our peace. Such rebukes are permitted, that faith and fervency, patience and perseverance, may be tried. These poor blind men were rebuked by the multitude that followed Christ. Note, The sincere and serious prayer of Christ's friends commonly meet with the worst rebukes from those that follow him but in pretence and hypocrisy. But they would not be beaten off so; when they were in pursuit of such a mercy, it was no time to compliment, or to practise
a timid delicacy; no, they cried the more. Note, Men ought always to pray, and not to faint; to pray with all perseverance; (Luke 18. 1.) to continue in prayer with resolution, and not to yield to opposition's, to be the true down, and put out of countenance.

1. He stood still, and called them, v. 32. He was now going up to Jerusalem, and was straitened till his work there was accomplished; and yet he stood still to cure these blind men. Note, When we are ever so much in haste about any business, yet we should be willing to stand still, to do good. He called them, not because he could not have done at a distance, but that he might do it in the most obliging and instructing way, and would countenance weak but willing patients and petitioners. Christ not only enjoins us to pray, but invites us; holds out the golden sceptre to us, and bids us come touch the top of it.

2. He inquired further into their case; What will you that I shall do unto you? This implies (1.) A very fair offer; "Here I am; let me know what you would have, and you shall have it. What would we more? He is able to do for us, and as willing as he is able; Ask, and it shall be given you.
(2.) A condition annexed to this offer, which is a very easy and reasonable one—that they should tell him what they would have him do for them. One would think this a strange question, any one might tell what they would have. What would they Ask? He would know it from them, whether they begged only for an alms, as from a common person, or for a cure, as from the Messiah. Note,
It is the will of God that we should in every thing make our requests known to him by prayer and supplication; not to inform or move him, but to qualify ourselves for the mercy. The waterman in the boat, who with his hook that came out of the sea, could pull the ship to the boat, but the boat to the shore. So in prayer we do not draw the mercy to ourselves, but ourselves to the mercy.
Their story was a common one, and yet such a distinct and particular one, that it was not obliged to any particular time or place.
unto me. 3. And if any man say ought unto you, ye shall say, The Lord hath need of them; and straightway he will send them. 4. All this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, 5. Tell ye the daughter of Sion, Behold, thy King cometh unto thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass. 6. And the disciples went, and did as Jesus commanded them. 7. And brought the ass, and the colt, and put on them their clothes, and they set him thereon. 8. And a very great multitude spread their garments in the way; others cut down branches from the trees, and strawed them in the way. 9. And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the son of David: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest. 10. And when he had come into Jerusalem, all the city was moved, saying, Who is this? 11. And the multitude said, This is Jesus the prophet of Nazareth of Galilee. 12. The four evangelists take notice of this passage of Christ's rising in triumph into Jerusalem, five days before his death. The passover was on the fourteenth day of the month, and this was the tenth; on which day the law appointed that the paschal lamb should be taken up, (Exod. 12. 3.) and set apart for that purpose, and all the days of our Passover, who was to be sacrificed for us, was publicly shewed. So that this was the prelude to his passion. He had lodged at Bethany, a village not far from Jerusalem, for some time; at a supper there, the night before, Mary had anointed his feet, John 12. 2. But as is usual with ambassadors, he deferred his public entry till some time after his arrival. Our Lord Jesus travelled much, and his customs were to start on foot from Galilee to Jerusalem, sometimes scores of miles, which was both humbling and toilsome; many a dirty weary step he had when he went about doing good. How ill does it become Christians to be inordinately solicitous about their own ease and state, when their Master had so little of either! Yet once in his life he rode in triumph; and it was now when he went into Jerusalem, to suffer and die, as if that were the pleasure and preferment he courted; and then he thought himself begun to be loved. Now here we have, 1. The provision that was made for this solemnity; and it was very poor and ordinary, and such as bespeke his kingdom to be not of this world. Here were no heralds at arms provided, no trumpet sounded before him, no chariots of state, no liveries; such things as these were not aeraeable to his present state of humiliation, but will be far outdone at his second coming, to which his magnificent appearance is reserved, when the last trumpet shall sound, the glorious angels shall be his heralds and attendants, and the clouds his chariots. But in this public appearance, 1. The preparation was sudden and off-hand. For his glory in the other world, and our's with him, preparation was made before the foundation of the world, for that was the glory his heart was upon his glory in this world he was dead to, and therefore, though he had it in prospect, did not forecast for it, but took what came next. They were come to Bethphage, which was the suburbs of Jerusalem, and was accosted (say the Jewish doctors) in all things as Jerusalem, a long scattering street that lay toward the mount of Olives; when he entered upon that, he sent two of his disciples, some think Peter and John, to fetch him an ass, for he had none ready for him.

2. I was very mean. He sent only for an ass and her colt, v. 2. Asses were much used in that country, as horses, and in war, Christ could have summoned a cherub to carry him; (Ps. 18. 10.) but though by his name Jah, which speaks him God, he rides upon the heavens, yet now by his name Jesus, Immanuel, God with us, in his state of humiliation, he rides upon an ass. Yet some think that he had herein an eye to the custom in Israel for the judges to ride upon white asses: that for or sake, he sent not an ass to a rich, but to a poor, 2 Cor. 8. 9. It is commonly said, "Thy that live on borrowing, live on souring;" in this, therefore, as in other things, Christ was a man of sorrows—that he had nothing of this world's goods but what was given him or lent him. The disciples who were sent to borrow this ass, are directed to say, The Lord has need of him. These that for our sake are sent to him, must come, not to own them their need, nor say, as the unjust steward, To beg I am ashamed, Luke 16. 3. On the other hand, none ought to impose upon the kindness of their friends, by going to beg or borrow, when they have not need. In the borrowing of this ass,

(1.) We have an instance of Christ's knowledge. Though the thing was altogether contingent, yet Christ could tell his disciples where they should find an ass tied, and a colt with her. His omniscience extends itself to the meanest of his creatures; asses and their colts, and their being bound or loosed. Doth God take care for oxen? (1 Cor. 9. 9.) No doubt he doth, and would not have Balaam's ass abused. He knows all the creatures, so as to make them serve his own purpose.

(2.) We have an instance of his power over the creatures. The servants of the meanest subjects, as well as of kings, are in the hand of the Lord. Christ asserts his right to use the ass, in bidding them bring it to him; the fulness of the earth is the Lord Christ's; but he foresees some hinderance which the disciples might meet with in this service; they must not take them clam et secreto—privily, but in the sight of the owner, much less vi et armis—a violence, but with the consent of the owner, which he undertakes they shall have; If any man say ought to you, ye shall say, The Lord has need of him. Note, What Christ sets us to do, he will bear us out in the doing of, and furnish us with answers to the objections we may be assaulted with, and make them prevalent; as here, Straightway he will send them. Christ, in commanding the ass, 1. He bids him send arms, but with the consent of the owner, which he undertakes they shall have, in inclining the owner to send him without further security, shewed that he is the God of the spirits of all flesh, and can bow men's hearts.

(3.) We have an example of justice and honesty, in not using the ass, though for so small a piece of service as riding the length of a street or two, without the owner's consent. As some read the latter clause, it gives us a further rule of justice; You shall say, The Lord has need of them, and he that is, the Lord "will presently send them back, and take care that they be safely delivered to the owner, as soon as he has done with them." Note, What we borrow we must restore in due time, and in good order; for the wicked borrow, and pay not again. Care must be taken of borrowed goods, which they be not damaged. Also, Master, for it was borrowed!

II. The prediction that was fulfilled in this, v. 4, 5. Our Lord Jesus, in all he did and suffered, had very much his eye upon the subject of kings might be fulfilled. As the prophets looked forward to him, (to him they all bare witness,) so he looked back upon them, that all things which were written of the Messiah might be punctually accomplished in him. This particularly which was written of him, Zech. 9. 9. where it ushers in a large prediction of the kingdom of the Messiah, Tell the people, say, Behold the King is come to thee, and that the of the earth, must be accomplished. Now observe here,

1. How the coming of Christ is foretold; Tell ye daughter of Zion, the church, the holy mountain, Behold, thy King cometh unto thee. Note, (1.) Jesus Christ is the church's King, one of our brethren like unto us, according to the law of the kingdom, Deut. 17. 15. He is appointed King over the church; see 1 Cor. 15. 24. The church is God's house, the daughter of Zion swears allegiance to him, Hos. 1. 11. (2.) Christ, the King of his church, came to his church, even in this lower world; he comes to thee, to rule thee, to rule in thee, to rule for thee; he is Head over all things to the church. He came to Son, (Rom. 11. 26.) that out of Sion the law might go forth; for the church is the law, and its influence is to extend to all the world. (3.) Notice was given to the church, beforehand, of the coming of her King; Tell the daughter of Sion, Note, Christ will have his coming looked for, and waited for, and his subjects big with expectation of it; Tell the daughter of Sion, that they may go forth, and behold king Solomon, Cant. 3. 11. Notices of Christ's coming are usually ushered in with a Behold! A note commanding both attention and admiration; Behold, thy King cometh; behold, and wonder at him, behold, and welcome him. Here is a royal progress truly admirable. Pilate, like Caiphas, said he knew not what, in that great word, (John 19. 14.) Behold your King.

2. How his coming is described. When a king comes, something great and magnificent is expected, especially when he comes to take possession of his kingdom. The Lord, the Lord of hosts, was seen upon a throne, high, and lifted up; ( Isa. 6. 1.) but there is nothing of that here; Behold, he cometh to thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass. When Christ would appear in his glory, it is in his meekness, not in his majesty.

(1.) His temper is very mild. He comes not in wrath to take vengeance, but in mercy to work salvation. He is meek to suffer the greatest injuries and indignities for Sion's cause, meek to bear with the follies and unkindness of Sion's own children. He is easy of access, easy to be entreated. He is meek not only as a Teacher, but as a Ruler; he rules by love. His government is mild and gentle, and his laws not written in the blood of his subjects, but in his own. His yoke is easy, and his burden light. But from this, his appearance is very mean, sitting upon an ass, a creature made not for state, but service, not for battles, but for burdens; slow in its motions, but sure, and safe, and constant. The foretelling of this so long before, and the care taken that it should be exactly fulfilled, intimate it to have a peculiar signification, for the encouragement of poor souls to apply themselves to Christ. Sion's King comes riding, not on an magnificent horse, which the timorous petitioner dares not come near, or a running horse, which the slow-foot ed petitioner cannot keep pace with, but on a quiet ass, that the poorest of his subjects may not be discouraged in their access to him. Mention is made in the text of the "garment of an ass;" and therefore Christ sent for the colt with the ass, that the scripture might be fulfilled.

111. The procession itself, which was answerable to the preparation, both being destitute of worldly pomp, and yet both accompanied with a spiritual power.

Observe, 1. His equipage; The disciples did as Jesus commanded them; (v. 6.) they went to fetch the ass and his colt, had been considered and provided for; and would find the owner willing to lend them. Note, Christ's commands must not be disputed, but obeyed; and those that sincerely obey them shall not be balked or baffled in it; They brought the ass, and the colt. The meanness and contemptibleness of the beast Christ rode on might have been made up with the richness of the trappings; but those were, like all the rest, such as came next to hand; they had not so much as a saddle for the ass, but the disciples threw some of their clothes upon it, and that must serve for want of better accommodations. Note, We ought not to be nice or curious, or to affect exactness, in outward conveniences. A holy indifference and neglect well becomes us in these things: it will evidence that our heart is not upon them; and that we have learned the apostle's rule, (Col. 2. 16.) Let no man pass with thee, and after the flesh, and things. Any thing will serve travellers; and there is a beauty in some sort of carelessness, a noble negligence; yet the disciples furnished him with the best they had, and did not object the spoiling of their clothes when the Lord hath need of them. Note, We must not think the clothes on our backs too dear to part with for the service of Christ, for the clothing of his poor destitute and afflicted members. I was naked, and you clothed me, ch. 25. 36. Christstriped himself for us.

2. His retinue; there was nothing in this stately or magnificent. Sion's King comes to Sion, and the daughter of Sion was told of his coming long before; yet he is not attended by the gentlemen of the country, nor met by the magistrates of the city in their formalities, as one might have expected; he should have had the keys of the city presented to him, and such a show made as became a king; he might have had the most possible convenience to the thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David; but here is nothing of all this; yet he has his attendants, a very great multitude; they were only the common people, the mob, (the rabble we should have been apt to call them,) that graced the solemnity of Christ's triumph, and none but such. The chief priests and the elders afterward herded themselves with the multitude that abused him upon his entry; but we find none of them here joining with the multitude that did him honour. Ye see here your calling, brethren, not many mighty, or noble, attend on Christ, but the foolish things of this world, and base things, which are despised, 1 Cor. 1. 26. 28. Note, Christ is honoured by the multitude, more than by the magnificence, of his followers; for he values men by their souls, not by their preferments, names, or titles of honour.

Now, concerning this great multitude, we are here told,

1. What they did; according to the best of their capacity, they studied to do honour to Christ. [1.] They spread their garments in the way, that he might ride upon them. When Jehu was proclaimed king, the captains put their garments under him, in token of their subjection to him. Note, Those that take Christ for their King, must lay their all under his feet; the clothes, in token of their heart; for when Christ comes, though not when any one else comes, it must be said to the soul, How down, that he may go over. Some think that these garments were spread, not upon the ground, but on the back of the ass or colt; which was a way to beautify a cavalcade, the balconies are hung with tapestry. This was but a poor piece of state, yet Christ accepted their good-will; and we are hereby taught to construe how to make Christ welcome, Christ and his grace, Christ and his gospel, into our hearts and houses. How shall we express our respects to Christ? What honor and what dignity shall be done unto him? [2.] Others cut down branches from the trees, and surrounded them in the way, as they used to do at the feast of tabernacles, in token of liberty, victory, and joy; for the mystery of that feast is particularly spoken of as belonging to gospel-times, Zech. 14. 16.

(2.) What they said; They that went before, and they that followed, were in the same time; both those that gave notice of his coming, and those that attended him with their appliances, cried, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David, v. 9. When they carried branches about at the feast of tabernacles, they were wont to cry Hosanna, and from thence to call their bundles of branches their Hosannas. Hosanna signifies, Save we now, we beseech thee; referring to Ps. 118. 25. 26, where the Messiah is prophesied of as the Head-stone of the corner, though the builders refused him; and all his loyalatories and attendants at his passion are described as Hosannas to him, wishing him with hearty good wishes to the prosperity of all his enterprizes. Hosanna to the Son of David is, "This we do in honour of the Son of David."

The hosannas with which Christ was attended, bespeak two things,

1. Their welcoming his kingdom. Hosanna bespeaks the same with, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; he is sanctified, and sent into the world, as Mediator; him hath God the Father sealed. Secondly, The coming of Christ, in the name of the Lord, is every way of the kingdom; Blessed is he that cometh to praise him, and be pleased in him. Let his coming in the name of the Lord be mentioned with strong affections, to our comfort, and joyful acclamations, to his glory. Well may we say, Blessed is he; for it is in him that we are blessed. Well may we follow him with our blessings, who meets us with his.

2. Their wishing well to his kingdom; intended in their Hosannas; earnestly desiring that prosperity and success may attend it, and that it might be a victorious kingdom; "Send now prosperity to that kingdom." If they understood it of a temporal kingdom, and had their hearts carried out thus toward that, it was their mistake, which a little time would rectify; however, their goodwill was accepted. Note, It is our duty earnestly to desire and pray for the prosperity and success of his kingdom in the world. This it is the duty of them that are made for him here, (Ps. 72. 15.) that all happiness may attend his interest in the world, and that, though he may ride upon an ass, yet in his majesty he may ride prosperously, because of that meekness, Ps. 45. 4. This we mean, when we pray, Thy kingdom come. They add, Hosanna in the highest; Let prosperity in the highest degree attend him, let him have a name above every name, a throne above every throne; or, Let us raise him in the best manner with exalted affections; or, Let our prayers for his church ascend to heaven, u t the
3. We have here his entertainment in Jerusalem; (v. 10.) When he came into Jerusalem, all the city was moved; every one took notice of him, some were moved with wonder at the novelty of the thing, others with laughter at the meaness of it; some perhaps were moved with joy, who waited for the Consolation of Israel: others, of the pharisical class, were moved with envy and indignation. So various are the motions in the minds of men upon the approach of Christ's kingdom!

Upon this commotion, we are further told,

(1.) What the citizens said; Who is this? [1] They were, it seems, ignorant concerning Christ. Though he was the Glory of his people Israel; yet Israel knew him not; though he had distinguished himself by the many miracles he wrought among them, yet the daughters of Jerusalem knew him not from another beloved, Cant. 5. 9. The Holy One unknown in the holy city! In places where the clearest light shines, and the greatest profession of religion is made, there is more ignorance than we are aware of. [2] Yet they were inquisitive concerning him. Who is this that is thus cried up, and comes with so much observation? Who is this King of glory, that demands admission into our hearts? Ps. 24. 8. Isa. 63. 1.

(2) How the multitude answered them; This is Jesus, v. 11. The multitude were better acquainted with Christ than the great ones. Vce populi—The voice of the peoples, is sometimes vice Dei—the voice of God. Now, in the account they give of him, [1.] They were right in calling him the Prophet, that great Prophet. Hitherto he had been known as a Prophet, teaching and working miracles; now they attend him as a King; Christ's priestly office was, of all the three, last discover'd. [2.] Yet they missed it, in saying he was of Nazareth; and it helped to confirm some in their prejudices against him. Note, Some, that are willing to honour Christ, and hear their testimony to him, yet labour under mistakes concerning him, which would be rectified, if they would take pains to inform themselves.

12. And Jesus went into the temple of God, and cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves, 13. And said unto them, It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves. 14. And the blind and the lame came to him in the temple, and he healed them. 15. And when the chief priests and scribes saw the wonderful things that he did, and the children crying in the temple, and saying, Hosanna to the son of David; they were sore displeased, 16. And said unto him, Hearest thou what these say? And Jesus saith unto them, Yea; have ye never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise? 17. And he left them, and went out of the city into Bethany; and he lodged there.

When Christ came into Jerusalem, he did not go up to the court or the palace, though he came in as a King, but into the temple; for his kingdom is spiritual, and not of this world; it is in holy things that he rules, in the temple of God that he exercises authority. Now, what did he do there?

1. Thence he drove the buyers and sellers. Abuses must first be purged out, and the plants not of God's planting be plucked up, before that which is right can be established. The great Redeemer appears as a great Reformer, that turns away ungodliness, Rom. 11. 26. Here they are told,

1. What he did; (v. 12.) He cast out all them that sold and bought; he had done this once before, (John 2. 14, 15.) but there was occasion to do it again. Note, Buyers and sellers, driven out of the temple, will return and nestle there again, if there be not a continual care and oversight to prevent it, and if the blow be not followed, and often repeated.

(1.) The abuse was, buying and selling, and changing money, in the temple. Note, Lawful things, ill timed and ill placed, may become sinful things. That which was decent enough in another place, and not only lawful, but laudable, in another day, defiles the sanctuary, and profanes the sabbath. This buying and selling, and changing money, though sold under pretence of being in order ad spiritualia—for spiritual purposes. They sold beasts for sacrifice, for the convenience of those that could more easily bring their money with them than their beast; and they changed money for those that wanted the half shekel, which was their yearly poll, or redemption-money; or, upon the hills of return; so that this might pass for the outward business of the house of God; and yet Christ's kingdom, that allows of it. Note, Great corruptions and abuses come into the church by the practices of those whose gain is godliness, that is, who make worldly gain the end of their godliness, and counterfeit godliness their way to worldly gain; (1 Tim. 6. 5.) from such turn away.

(2.) The purging out of this abuse. Christ cast them out that sold. He did it before with a scowrege of small cords; (John 2. 13.) now he did it with a look, with a frown, with a word of command. Some reckon this none of the least of Christ's miracles, that he should himself thus clear the temple, and not be opposed in it by them who by this craft got their living, and were backed in it by the priests and elders. It is an instance of his power over the spirits of men, and the hold he has of them by their own consciences. This was the holy act of regular authority, according to the office of Christ as the second Adam. Christ, in the days of his flesh; he began with it, John 2. and here ended with it. Tradition says, that his face shone, and beams of light darted from his blessed eyes, which astonished these market-people, and compelled them to yield to his command; if so, the scripture was fulfilled, Prov. 8. 20. The King that sitteth on the throne of judgment, scattered among all theWeb of this earth,Ps. 115. 1. he began with the tables of the money-changers; he did not take the money to himself, but scattered it, threw it to the ground, the fittest place for it. The Jews, in Esther's time, on the spool laid not their hand, Esther 9. 10.

(2.) What he said, to justify himself, and to convict them; (v. 13.) It is written. Note, In the reformation of the church, the eye must be upon the scripture, and that must be adhered to as the rule, changing the outward forms of worship, and of the outward structure of the buildings, rather than we can justify ourselves with, It is written. Reformation is then right, when corrupted ordinances are reduced to their primitive institution.

(1.) He shews, from a scripture prophecy, what the temple should be, and was designed to be; My house shall be called the house of prayer; which is quoted from Isa. 56. 7. Note, All the ceremonial institutions were intended to be subservient to moral duties; the house of sacrifices was to be a house of prayer, for that was the soul and soul of all the sacrifices. The temple was in a special manner sanctified to be a house of prayer, for it was not only the place of that worship, but the medium of it, so that the prayers made in or toward that house had a particular promise of acceptance, (2 Chron. 6. 21.) as it was a type of Christ: therefore Daniel looked that way in prayer; and in this sense, no house or place is now, or can be, a house of prayer for us. But Christ, in some sense, the apportioned places of our religious assemblies may be so called, as places where prayer is wont to be made, Acts 16. 13.

(2.) II 1 shews, from a scripture reproof, how they had abused the temple, and perverted the intention of it: Ye have made it a den of thieves. This is quoted from Jer. 7. 11. Is this house become a den of thieves? and, as if the house of prayer is turned into something profane, such as the temple was, so I think it may be said that the house of prayer is become a den of thieves, in which they lurk, and shelter themselves. Markets are two often dens of thieves, so many are the corrupt and cheating practices in buying and selling; but markets in the temple are certainly so, for they rob God of his honour, the worst of thieves, Mal. 3. 8. The priests lived, and lived plentifully, upon the gains from the temple, and they found other ways and means to squeeze money out of the people; and therefore Christ here calls them thieves, for they exacted, which did not belong to them.

11. There, in the temple, he headed the blind and the lame, v. 14. When he had driven the buyers and sellers out of the temple, he invited the blind and lame within it, and, as a priest, he did recommend these things, but the rich he sends empty away. Christ, in the temple, by his word there preached, and in answer to the prayers there made, heals those that are spiritually blind and lame. It is good coming to the temple, when Christ is there, who, as he shows himself jealous for the honour of his temple, in expelling those who profane it, so he shews himself gracious to those who humbly seek him. The blind and the lame enter in with gladness into the house of the Lord, (Ps. 119. 28.) but were admitted into God's house; for the state and honour of his temple lie not in those things wherein the magnificence of princes' palaces is supposed to consist; from them blind and lame must keep their distance, but from God's temple only the wicked and profane. The temple was profaned and abused when it was made a market-place, but it was graced and honoured when it was made an hospital; and, if the temple be sanctified, it is made more honourable, and better becomes it, than to be getting money there. Christ's healing was a real answer to that question, Who is this? His works testified of him more than the hosannas; and his healing in the temple was the fulfilling of the promise, that the glory of the latter house should be greater than the glory of the former. He was himself in a sense the offence which the chief priests and scribes took at the acclamations with which he was attended, v. 15, 16. They that should have been most forward to give him honour were his worst enemies.

1. They were inwardly vexed at the wonderful things that he did; they could not deny them to be true miracles, and therefore were cut to the heart with indignation at them, as Acts 4. 16.—5. 33. The works that Christ did, fulfilled the prophecies, fulfilled the promises; and by wounds they set free every man's conscience. If they had any sense, they could not but own the miracle of them; and, if any good nature, could not but be in love with the mercy of them; yet, because they were resolved to oppose him, for these they envied him, and bore him a grudge.

(2.) They openly quarrelled at the children's hosannas; they thought that hereby an honour was given him, which did not belong to him, and that it looked like ostentation. Proud men cannot bear that honour should be done to any but to themselves, and are uneasy at nothing more than at the just praises of deserving men. Thus Saul envied David the women's songs; and "Who can stand before envy?" Now Christ is most honoured, his enemies are most displeased.

Just now we had Christ preferring the blind and the lame before the buyers and sellers; now here we have him (v. 16.) taking part with the children against priests and scribes.

Observe, (1.) The children were in the temple, perhaps playing there; no wonder, when the rulers make it a market-place, that the children might have a place but, a place to be heard; to hope that many of them were worshipping there. Note, It is good to bring children betimes to the house of prayer, for of such is the kingdom of heaven. Let children be taught to keep up the form of godliness, it will help to lead them to the power of it. Christ has a tenderness for the lambs of his flock. (2.) They were there, crying, Hosanna to the Son of David. This they did to expressly show that those that are the greatest in the kingdom should be the least in the world; little children say and do as they hear others say, and see others do; so easily do they imitate; and therefore great care must be taken to set them good examples, and no bad ones. Maximus debetur puero reverentia— Our intercourse with the young should be conducted with the most scrupulous care. Children will learn of those that are with them, either to curse and sneer, or to pray and praise. The Jews did best to teach their children to cry out in publica places, branches at the fast of tabernacles, and to cry Hosanna; but God taught them here to apply it to Christ. Note, Hosanna to the Son of David well becomes the mouths of little children, who should learn the language of Canaan.

(3.) Our Lord Jesus not only allowed it, but was very well pleased with it, and quoted a scripture which was fulfilled in it, (Ps. 8. 2.) or, at least, may be accommodated to it: Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise; which, some think, refers to the children's joining in the acclamations of the people, and the women's songs with which David was honoured when he returned from the slaughter of the Philistines, and therefore is very fitly applied here to the hosannas with which the Son of David was saluted, now that he was entering upon his conflict with Satan, the power of evil.

Note, [1.] Christ is so far from being ashamed of the services of little children, that he takes particular notice of them, (and children love to be taken notice of,) and is well pleased with them. If God may be honoured by babes and sucklings, who are made to hope at the best, much more by children who are grown up to maturity and some capacity.

[2.] Praise is perfected out of the mouth of such; it has a peculiar tendency to humble the children of God; and, when they join in his praises, the praise would be accounted defective and imperfect, if they had not their share in it; which is an encouragement for children to be good betimes, and to parents to teach them to be so; the labour neither of the one nor of the other shall be in vain. In this psalm it is, Thou hast ordained strength. Note, God perfeceth praise, by ordaining strength out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. When great things are brought about by weak and unlikely instruments, God is thereby much honoured, for his strength is perfected in weakness, and the infirmities of the babies and sucklings serve for a foil to the divine power. That which follows in the psalm, That thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger, was very applicable to the priests and scribes, but Christ did not apply it to them, but left it to them to apply it.

Lastly, Christ, having thus silenced them, forsook them, v. 17. He left them, in prudence, lest they should now have seized him before his hour was come; in justice, because they had forfeited the favour of his presence. By repining at Christ's praises, we drive him from us. He left them as incorrigible, and he went out of the city to Bethany, which was a very quiet retired place; not so much that he might sleep undisturbed as that he might pray undisturbed. Bethany was but two little miles from Jerusalem; thither he now went on foot, to show that, when he rode, it was only to fulfill the scripture. He was not lifted up with the hosannas of the people; but, as having forgot them, soon returned to his mean and toilsome way of travelling.

18. Now in the morning, as he returned into the city, he hungered. 19. And when he saw a fig tree in the way, he came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only, and said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. And presently the fig tree withered away. 20. And when the disciples saw it, they marvelled, saying, How soon is the fig tree withered away! 21. Jesus answered and said unto them, Verily I say unto you, If ye have faith, and doubt not, ye shall not only do this which is done to the fig tree, but also if ye shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; it shall be done. 22. And whatsoever ye ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive.

Observe,
I. Christ returned in the morning to Jerusalem, v. 18. Some think that he went out of the city over night, because none of his friends there durst entertain him, for fear of the great men; yet, having work to do there, he returned. Note, We must never be driven off from our duty, either by the malice of our foes, or the unkindness of our friends. Though he knew that in the city bonds and afflictions did follow him, yet none of these things moved him. Paul followed him when he went bound in the Spirit to Jerusalem. Acts 20. 22.

II. As he went he hungered. He was a Man, and submitted to the infirmities of nature; he was an active Man, and was so intent upon his work, that he neglected his food, and came out fasting; for the zeal of God's house did even eat him up, and his ministry and business did so absorb him. He was a poor Man, and had no present supply; he was a Man that pleased not himself, for he would willingly have taken up with green raw figs for his breakfast, when it was fit that he should have had something warm.

Christ therefore hungered, that he might have occasion to work this miracle, in curing, and so with the barren fig tree, and there might give us an instance of his justice and his power, and both instructive.

1. See his justice, v. 19. He went to it, expecting fruit, because it had leaves; but, finding none, he sentenced it to a perpetual barrenness. The miracle had its significance, as well as other his miracles. All Christ's miracles illustrato were wrought for the good of men, and proved the power of his grace and blessing; (the sending of the devils into the herd of swine was but a permission;) all he did was for the benefit and comfort of his friends, none for the terror or punishment of his enemies; but now, at last, to show that all judgment is committed to him, and that he is able not only to save, but to destroy, he would give a specimen of the power to his wrath and curse; yet this not on any man, woman, or child, because the great day of his wrath is not yet come, but on an inanimate tree, that is set forth for a type of the barren fig tree, of the parable of the fig tree, ch. 24. 25. The scope of it is the same with the parable of the fig tree, Luke 13. 6.

(1.) This cursing of the barren fig tree, represents the state of hypocrites in general; and so it teaches us, [1.] That the fruit of fig trees may, justly be expected from those that have the leaves. Christ looks for the power of religion from those that make profession of it; the favour of it from those that have the show of it; grapes from the vineyard that is planted in a fruitful hill: he hungered after it, his soul desires the first ripe fruits. [2.] Christ's just expectations from flourishing professors are often frustrated and disappointed; he comes to many, seeking fruit, and finds leaves only, and he discovers it. Many have a name to live, and are not found in the kingdom of God, doing nothing to merit the power of it. [3.] The sin of barrenness is justly punished with the curse and plague of barrenness; let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. As one of the chiefest blessings, and which was the first, is, Be fruitful; so one of the saddest curses is, Be no more fruitful. Thus the sin of hypocrites is made their punishment: they would not do good, and therefore they shall do none; he that is not faithful to him he be fruitful as 1; and lose his honour and comfort. [4.] A false and hypocritical profession commonly withers in this world, and it is the effect of Christ's curse; the fig tree, that had no fruit, soon lost its leaves. Hypocrites may look plausible for a time, but, having no principle, no root in themselves, their profession will soon come to nothing; the gifts wither, common graces decay, the credit of the profession declines and sinks, and the falseness and folly of the pretender is manifested to all men.

(2.) It represents the state of the nation and people of the Jews in particular; they were a fig tree planted in Christ's way, as a church. Now observe, [1.] The disappointment they gave to our Lord Jesus. He came among them, expecting to find some fruit, something that would be pleasing in the sight of the Lord. And when he found none, he was grieved at it, he needed it not, but fruit that might abound to a good account; but his expectations were frustrated, he found nothing but leaves; they called Abraham their father, but did not do the works of Abraham; they professed themselves expectants of the promised Messiah, but, when he came, they did not receive and entertain him. [2.] The doom he passed upon them, that was inflicted upon them for refusing him. The tree was gathered from them, as a church or as a people, from henceforward for ever. Never any good came from them, (except the particular persons among them that believed,) after they rejected Christ; they became worse and worse; blindness and hardness happened to them, and grew upon them, till they were unchurched, unpeopled, and undone, and their place and nation removed; their butter was taken from them, their wine and ornaments, their temple, and priesthood, and sacrifices, and festivals, and all the glories of their church and state, fell like leaves in autumn. How soon did their fig tree wither away, after they said, The blood be on us, and on our children? And the Lord was righteous in it.

2. See the power of Christ; the former is wrapped up in the figure, but this more fully discoursed.
Christ intending thereby to direct his disciples in the use of their powers.

(1.) The disciples admired the effect of Christ’s cure; (v. 26.) They marvelled; no power could do it but his, who spake and it was done. They marvelled at the suddenness of the thing; How soon is the fig tree withered away! There was not the least cause of the fig tree’s withering, but it was a direct blast, a worm at the root; it was not only the leaves of it that withered, but the body of the tree; it withered away in an instant, and became like a dry stick. Gospel curses are, upon this account, the most dreadful—that they work insensibly and silently, by a fire not blown, but effectually.

(2.) Christ empowered them by faith to do the like; (v. 23, 24.) as it is said, (John 14. 12.) Greater works than these shall ye do. Observe, [1.] The description of this wonder-working faith; If ye have faith, and doubt not, Note, Doubting of the power and promise of God is the greatest thing that spoils the efficacy and success of faith. “If you have faith, and dispute not,” (so some read it.) “dispute not with yourselves, dispute not with the promise of God, if you stagger not at the promise;” (Rom. 4. 20.) for, as far as we do, so our faith is deficient; as certain as the promise is, so confident our faith should be.

[2.] The power and prevalence of it expressed figuratively; If ye shall say to this mountain, (meaning the mount of Olives,) Be thou removed, it shall be done. There might be a particular reason for his saying so of this mountain, for there was a prophecy, that the mount of Olive, and of fine Jerusalem, shall cleave in the midst, and then remove, Zech. 14. 4. Whatever was the intent of that word, the same must be the expectation of faith, how impossible soever it might appear to sense. But this is a proverbial expression; intimating that we are to believe that nothing is impossible with God, and therefore that what he has promised shall certainly be performed, though to us it seem impossible. It was among the Jews a usual commendation of their learned Rabbins, that they were removers of mountains, that is, could solve the greatest difficulties; now this may be done by faith acted on the word of God, which will bring great and strange things to pass.

[3.] The way and means of exercising this faith, and of doing that which is to be done by it; All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive. For the soul, prayer is the body; both together make a complete man for any service. Faith, if it be right, will excite prayer; and prayer is not right, if it do not spring from faith. This is the condition of our receiving; we must ask in prayer, believing. The requests of prayer shall not be denied; the expectations of faith shall not be frustrated. We have many promises to this purport from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, and all to encourage both, the one by price, it is the principal duty, of a Christian. It is but ask and have, believe and receive; and what would we more? Observe how comprehensive the promise is—All things whatsoever ye shall ask; this is like all and every the promises in a conveyance. All things, is general; whatsoever, brings it to particulars; though generals include particulars, yet such is the folly of our unbelief, that, though we think we assent to particulars, we live by faith, and when it comes to particulars, and therefore, that we might have strong consolation, it is thus copiously expressed, All things whatsoever.

23. And when he was come into the temple, the chief priests and the elders of the people came unto him as he was teaching, and said, By what authority doest thou these things, and who gave thee this authority? 24. And Jesus answered and said unto them, I also will ask you one thing, which if ye tell me, I in like wise will tell you by what authority I do these things. 25. The baptism of John, whence was it? from heaven, or of men? And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say unto us, Why did ye not then believe him? 26. But if we shall say, Of men; we fear the people; for all hold John as a prophet. 27. And they answered Jesus, and said, We cannot tell. And he said unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.

Our Lord Jesus (like St. Paul after him) preached his gospel with much contention; his first appearance was in a dispute with the doctors in the temple, when he was twelve years old; and here, just before he died, we have him engaged in controversy. In this sense, he was like Jeremiah, a man of contention; not striving, but striving. The great doctors and teachers who were among the chief priests and the elders, the judges of two distinct courts: the chief priests presided in the ecclesiastical court, in all matters of the Lord, as they are called; the elders of the people were judges of the civil courts, in temporal matters. See an idea of both, 2 Chron. 19. 5, 11. These joined to attack Christ, thinking they should find or make him obnoxious either to the one or to the other. See how wofully degenerate that generation were, when the man of righteousness in the land, and state, who should have been the great promoters of the Messiah’s kingdom, were the great opposers of it! Here we have them disturbing him when he was preaching; v. 23. They would receive his instructions themselves, nor let others receive them. Observe, 1. As soon as he came into Jerusalem, he went to the temple, though he had been affrighted there the day before, and there he was in the midst of enemies, and in the mouth of danger; yet thither he went, for there he had a fairer opportunity of doing good to souls than any where else in Jerusalem. Though he came hungry to the city, and was disappointed of a breakfast at the barren fig tree, yet, for aught that appears, he went straight to the temple, as one that esteemed the words of God’s mouth, the preaching of them, more than his necessary food. 2. In the temple he was teaching; he had called it a house of prayer; (v. 13.) and here we have him preaching there. Note, In the solemn assemblies of Christians, praying and preaching must go together, and neither must encroach upon, or justly cut, the other. To make up communion with God, we must not only speak to him in prayer, but hear what he has to say to us by his word; ministers must give the word both to the word and to prayer, Acts 6. Note, That Christ taught in the temple, that scripture was fulfilled, (Isa. 2. 3.) Let us go up to the house of the Lord, and he will teach us his ways. The priests of old often taught there the good knowledge of the Lord; but they never had such a teacher as this.

III. When Christ was teaching the people, the priests and elders came upon him, and challenged him to produce his orders; the hand of Satan in this, to hinder him in his work. Note, It cannot but be a trouble to a faithful minister, to be taken off, or diverted from, plain and practical preaching, by an unavoidable necessity of engaging in controversies; yet good was brought out of this evil, for hereby occasion was given to Christ to dispel the objections that were advanced against him, to the greater satisfaction of his followers; and, while his adversaries thought by their power to have silenced him, they had only silenced the silent, the most effectual answer to arrogance.

Now, in this dispute with them, we may observe, 1. How he was assaulted by their insolent demand: 'By what authority doest thou these things, and who gave thee this authority?' Had they duly considered his miracles, and the power by which he wrought them, they needed not to have asked this question; for they must have something to say for the shelter of a obsolete question. This, the most illustrious in triumph into Jerusalem, received the hosannas of the people, controuled in the temple, drivest out such as had licence to be there, from the rulers of the temple, and paid them rent; thou art here preaching a new doctrine; whence hadst thou a commission to do all this? Was it from Caesar, or from the high priest, or from God? Perhaps they were in earnest, or perhaps not; but, aspersed, did he put too much upon thee? Note. It is good for all that take upon them to act with authority, to put this question to themselves, 'Who gave us that authority?' For unless a man be clear in his own conscience concerning that, he cannot act with any comfort or hope of success. They who run before their warrant, run without their blessing, Jer. 23. 21, 22.

Christ, however, did not shrink from this contradiction, and Nicodemus a master in Israel, had owned it, that he was a Teacher sent of God; (John 3. 2.) yet, at this time of day, when that point had been so fully cleared and settled, they come to him with this question. (1.) In the ostentation of their own power, as chief priests and elders, which, they thought, authorised them to call him to an account in this manner. How haughtily do they ask, 'Who gave thee this authority?' Intimating that he could have no authority, because he had none from them, 1 Kings 22. 24. Jer. 20. 1. Note, It is common for the greatest abusers of their power, to be the most rigorous asserters of it, and to take a pride and pleasure in any thing that looks like the exercise of it. (2.) It was to insnare and entangle him. Should he refuse to answer this question, they would enter judgment against him upon his own saying, 'This is my saying thing;' would condemn him as standing mute; and would insinuate to the people, that his silence was a tacit confessing of himself to be a Usurper; should he plead an authority from God, they would, as formerly, demand a sign from heaven, or make his defence his silence, and accuse him of blasphemy for it.

How he answered this demand with another, which would help them to answer themselves: (v. 24, 25.) 'I also will ask you one thing. He declined giving them a direct answer, lest they should take advantage against him; but answers them with a question. Those that are as sheep in the midst of wolves, have need to be wise as serpents: the heart of the wise studieth to answer. We must give a reason of the hope that is in us, not only with meekness, but with fear, (1 Pet. 3. 15.) with prudence, lest truth be damag'd, or ourselves endanger'd.

Now this question is concerning John's baptism, here put for his whole ministry, preaching as well as baptizing: 'Was this from heaven, or of men? One of the two it must be; either what he did was of his own head, or he was sent of God to do it.'

Gamaliel's argument turned upon this hinge; (Acts 5. 38, 39.) Even so scribes and Pharisees nam'd, not this man, but our nation, and the custom of our fathers did this. Though that which is manifestly had not been of God, yet that which is seemingly good may be of men, nay, of Satan, when he transforms himself into an angel of light. This question was not at all shuf fling, to evade their's; but, (1.) If they answered this question, it would answer their's; should they say, against their consciences, that John's baptism was of men, yet it would be easy to answer, John did no miracles, (John 10. 41.) Christ did many; but, should they say, as they could not but own, that John's baptism was from heaven, (which was supplied as clear evidence by the question answer'd) 'Then their demand was answered, for he bare testimony to Christ. Note, Truths appear in the clearest light when they are taken in their due order; the resolving of the foregoing question will be a key to the main question. (2.) If they refused to answer it, that would be a good reason why they should not offer proofs of his authority; 'We onely know the Son of man, and he will answer for us against the strongest conviction; it was but to cast pearls before swine. Thus he taketh the wise in their own craftiness; (1 Cor. 3. 19.) and those that would not be convinced of the plainest truths shall be convicted of the vilest mafice, against John first, then, against Christ, and in both against God. 3. How they were hereby baffled and run aground, they knew the truth, but would not own it, and so were taken in the snare they laid for our Lord Jesus. Observe. (1.) How they reasoned with themselves, not concerning the merits of the cause, what proofs there were of the divine original of John's baptism; no, their care was, how to make their part good against Christ. Two things they considered and consulted, in this reasoning with themselves, their authority, and their safety; the same things which they principally aim at, who seek their own things. (2.) They consider their own credit, which they would endanger, if they should own John's baptism to be of God; for then Christ would ask them, before all the people, Why did ye not believe him? And to acknowledge that a doctrine is from God, and yet rashly enucle and entertain it, is the greatest absurdity and iniquity that a man can be charged with. Many, that will not be kept by the fear of sin from neglecting and opposing that which they know to be true and good, are kept by the fear of shame from owning that to be true and good which they neglect and oppose. Thus they reject the counsel of God against themselves, in not submitting to John's baptism, and would not own it. (3.) They reason in their own safety, that they would expose themselves to the resentments of the people, if they should say that John's baptism was of men; We fear the people, for all hold John as a prophet. It seems, then, First, That the people had truer sentiments of John than the chief priests and the elders had, or, at least, were more free and faithful in declaring their sentiments. This people, of whom they make mention, and would not own John, that they knew not the law, and were cursed, (John 7. 49.) it seems knew the gospel, and were blessed. Secondly, That the chief priests and elders stood in awe of the common people, which is an evidence that things were in disorder among them, and that mutual jealousies were at a great height; that the government was become obsious to the hatred and scorn of the people, and the scripture was fulfilled, They made you contemptible and base, Mal. 2. 8, 9. If they had kept their integrity, and done their duty, they had kept up their authority, and needed not to fear the people. We find sometimes that the people feared them, and it served them for a reason why they did not confess Christ, John 9. 22.—12. 48. Note, Those could but fear the people, who studied obeying him whose face was set against them, and whose word they had cast down, that they knew not the law, and were cursed. That it is usually the temper even of common people, to be zealous for the honour of that which they account sacred and divine. If they account John as a prophet, they will not endure that it should be said, In his baptism was of men; hence the holiest contes have been about holy things. Fourthly, That the Chief priests and elders were kept from open denial of the truth, even against the conviction of their own minds, not by the fear of God, but purely by the fear of the people; as the fear of man may bring good people into a snare, (Prov. 29, 25.) so sometimes it may keep bad people from being over-much wicked, lest they should die before their time, Eccl.

7, 17. Many bad people would be a deal worse than they are, if they must.
(2.) How they replied to their Saviour, and so dropt the question. They fairly confessed, We cannot tell; that is, "We will not;" in other words—We never knew. The more shame for them, while they pretended to be leaders of the people, and by their office were obliged to take cognizance of such things;
when they would not confess their knowledge, they were constrained to confess their ignorance. And observe by the way, when they said, He cannot tell, they told a lie, for they knew that John's baptism was of God. Note, There are many who are more afraid of the shame of lying than of the sin, and therefore scruple not to speak that which they know to be false concerning their own thoughts and apprehensions, their affections and intentions, or their remembering or forgetting of things, because in those things they know nobody can disprove them. They make shift to answer the question of a man who sought an answer for himself, and justified himself in refusing to gratify them;
Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.
If they be so wicked and base as either not to believe, or not to confess, that the baptism of John was from heaven, (though it obliged to repentance, that great duty, and sealed the kingdom of God at hand, that great promise,) they were not fit to be discourse with concerning Christ's authority: for men of such disposition could not be convinced of the truth now, they could not but he provoked by it, and therefore he that is thus ignorant, let him be ignorant still.
Note, Those that imprison the truths they know, in unrighteousness, (either by not professing them, or by not practising according to them,) are justly denied the further truths they inquire after, Rom. 1.
18, 19. Take away the talent from him that buried it;
those that will not see, shall not see.
28. But what think ye? A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to-day in my vineyard. He answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented, and went. 30. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not. 31. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto him, The first, Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, that the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. 32. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness, and ye believed him not; but the publicans and the harlots believed him; and ye, when ye had seen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him.
As Christ instructed his disciples by parables, which made the instructions the more easy, so sometimes he convinced his adversaries by parables, which bring reproves more close, and make men, or ever they are aware, to reprove themselves. Thus Nathan convinced David by a parable, (2 Sam. 12. 1.) and the woman of Tekoa surprised him in like manner, 2 Sam. 14. 2. Reproving parables are appeals to the offenders themselves, and judge them out of their own mouths. This Christ designs here, as appears by the first words, (v. 28.) But what think ye?
In these verses, we have the parable of the two sons sent to work in the vineyard, the scope of which is to show that they who knew not John's baptism to be of God, were ashamed even by the publicans and harlots, who knew and professed. The parable itself, which represents two sorts of persons; some that prove better than they promise, represented by the first of those sons; others that promise better than they prove, represented by the second.
1. They had both one and the same father, which signifies that God is a common Father to all man.
kind. There are favours which all alike receive from him, and obligations which all alike lie under him; Have we not all one Father? Yes, and yet there is a vast difference between men's characters.
2. They had both the same command given them;
Son, go work to-day in my vineyard. Parents should not breed up their children in idleness; no-	hing is more pleasing, and yet nothing more pernicious, to youth than that, Lam. 3. 27. God sets his children to work, though they are all heirs. This command he gave not to the son that was not of us. Note, (1.) The work of religion, which we are called to engage in, is vineyard-work, creditable, profitable, and pleasant. By the sin of Adam we were turned out to work upon the common, and to eat the herb of the field; but by the grace of our Lord Jesus we are called to work again in the vineyard. (2.) The gospel-call to work in the vineyard, requires present obedience; Son, go work to-day, while it is called to-day, because the night comes when no man can We were not sent into the world to be idle, nor had we day-light given us to play by; and therefore, if ever we mean to do any thing for God and our souls, Why not now? Why not to-day? (3.)
The exhortation to go work to-day in the vineyard, speaketh unto us as unto children; (Heb. 12. 5.)
Son, go work. It is the command of a Father, which carries with it both authority and affection, a Father that pities his children, and considers their frame, and doth not over-task them, (Ps. 103. 13, 14.) a Father that is very tender of his Son that serves him, Mal. 3. 17. If we work in our Father's vineyard, we work for ourselves.
3. Their conduct was very different.
(1.) One of the sons did better than he said, proved better than he promised. His answer was bad, but his actions were good.
(2.) Here is the untoward answer that he gave to his father; he said, flat and plain, I will not. See to what a degree of impudence the corrupt nature of man rises, to say, I will not, to the command of a Father; such a command of such a Father; they are impudent children and stiff-hearted. Those that will not bend, surely they cannot blush; if they had any degree of modesty left them, they could not say, He will not, Jer. 2. 25. Excuses are bad, but downright denials are worse; yet such peremp-tory refusals do the calls of the gospel oft en meet with, First, Some love their ease, and will not work; they would live in the world, as leviathan in the waters, to play therein; (Ps. 104. 26.) they do not love working. Secondly, Their hearts are so much upon their own fields, that they are not for working in God's vineyard. They love the busi-ess of the world better than the business of their religion. Thus some by the delights of sense, and others by the employments of the world, are far from doing that great work which they were sent into the world about, and so stand all the day idle.
(3.) Here is the happy change of his mind, an
Vol. v.—2 H
of his way, upon second thoughts; Afterward he repented, and went. Note, There are many who in their beginning are wicked and willful, and very unpromising, who afterward repent and mend, and come to something. Some, that God hath chosen, are suffered for a great while to run to a great excess of riot; Such were some of you, 1 Cor. 6. 11. They were not immediately brought to an immediate end. The case is, that God permitted them to run in their evil ways for a long suffering, 1 Tim. 1. 16. Afterward he repented. Repentance is perseverance—an after-will; and perseverance—an after-care. Better late than never. Observe, When he repented, he went; that was the fruit meet for repentance. The only evidence of our repentance for our former resistance, is, immediately to comply, and set to work; and then what is past shall be pardoned, and not reproved, but what is past made good. What can a Father God be; he resents not the affront of our refusals, as justly he might. He that told his father to his face, that he would not as he bid him, deservd to be turned out of doors, and disinherited; but our God waits to be gracious, and, notwithstanding our former follies, if we repent and mend, will favourably accept of us: blessed be God, we are under a covenant that leaves room for such a repentance.

(2.) The other son said better than he did, promised better than he proved; his answer was good, but his actions bad. To him the father said likewise, v. 30. The gospel-call, though very different, is, in effect, the same to all, and is carried on with an even tenor. We have all the same commands, engagements, encouragements, though to some they are a call to everlasting life, to others of death unto death. Observe,

[1.] How fairly this other son promised; He said, I go, sir. He gives his father a title of respect, sir. Note, It becomes children to speak respectfully to their parents. It is one branch of that honour which the fifth commandment requires. He professes a ready obedience, I go; not, "I will go by and by," but, "Ready, sir, you may depend upon it, I go just now." This answer we should give from the heart heartily to all the calls and commands of the word of God. See Jer. 3. 22. Ps. 27. 8.

[2.] How he failed in the performance; He went not. Note, There are many that give good words, and make fair promises, in religion, and those from some good motions in the present, that rest there, and do not go on; and so come to nothing. There are many in the things, and many there are that say, and do not; it is particularly charged upon the Pharisees, ch. 23. 3. Many with their mouth show much love, but their heart goes another way. They had a good mind to be religious, but they met with something to be done, that was too hard, or something to be parted with, that was too dear, and so their purposes are to no purpose. Buds and blossoms are not fruit.

II. A general appeal upon the parable; Whither of them did the will of his father? v. 31. They both had their faults, one was rude, and the other was false; such variety of exercises parents sometimes have in the different humours of their children, and they have need of a great deal of wisdom and grace to know what is the best way of managing them. But the question is, Which was the better of the two, and the less faulty? And it was soon resolved; the first, because his actions were better than his words, and his latter end than his beginning. This they had learned from the common sense of mankind, who would much rather deal with one that will be better than his word, than with one that will be better than his work. And, as the attention of it, they had learned from the accounting God takes of us; the rule of his judgment, (Ezek. 18. 21, 22.) that if the sinner turn from his wickedness, he shall be pardoned; and if the righteous man turn from his righteousness, he shall be rejected. The tenour of the whole scriptures gives us to understand that those are accepted as doing their Father’s will, who, when they have missed it, are sorry for it, and do better.

III. A particular application of it to the matter in hand, v. 31, 32. The primary scope of the parable, is, to shew the difference between the publicans and harlots, who were generally reckoned among the most impious in the Baptist, and the rest of the world. The parable was thus talked of the Messias, the Messiah, his kingdom, yet entertained the doctrine, and submitted to the discipline, of John the Baptist, his forerunner, when the priests and elders, who were big with expectations of the Messiah, and seemed very ready to go into his measures, slighted John the Baptist, and run counter to the designs of his mission. But it has a further reach; the Gentiles were sometimes discoboured by John, as the publicans and harlots were; but they were not like the elder son; (Tit. 3. 3, 4.) yet, when the gospel was preached to them, they became obedient to the faith; whereas the Jews, who said, I go, sir, promised fair, (Exod. 24. 7. Josh. 24. 24.) yet went not; they did but flatter God with their mouth, Ps. 78. 36.

In Christ’s application of this parable, observe,

How he proves that John’s baptism was from heaven, and not of men. "If you cannot tell," saith Christ, "you might tell." (1.) By the scope of his ministry; John came unto you in the way of righteousness. Would you know whether John had his commission from Heaven, remember the rule of trial, By their fruits ye shall know them; the fruits of their doctrines, the fruits of their designs. Observe, to the baptism of John, how Christ thereupon observed; he may trace out both their rise and their tendency. Now it was evident that John came in the way of righteousness. In his ministry, he taught people to repent, and to work the works of righteousness. In his conversation, he was a great example of strictness, and seriousness, and contempt of the world, denying himself, and doing good to every body else. Christ therefore subverted all righteousness, and made it better to become him to fulfil all righteousness. Now, if John thus came in the way of righteousness, could they be ignorant that his baptism was from heaven, or make any doubt of it?

(2.) By the success of his ministry; The publicans and the harlots believed him; he did abundance of good among the worst sort of people. St. Paul proves his apostleship by the seals of his ministry, ch. 12. 3. He was, in the sight of men, a publican and a harlot; he would not have crowned his labours with such wonderful success, nor have made him so instrumental as he was for the conversion of souls. If publicans and harlots believe his report, surely the arm of the Lord is with him. The people’s profiting is the minister’s best testimonial.

2. How he reproves them for their contempt of John’s baptism, which yet, for fear of religion was expected. They promised little good, and those that knew them promised themselves little good from them. Their disposition was generally rude, and their conversation profane and debauched; and yet many of them were wrought upon by the ministry of John, who came in the spirit and power of Elias. See Luke 7. 29. These fidy represented the Gentile world; for, as Dr. Whitby observes, the Jews generally believed the publicans with the heathen; nay, and the heathen were represented by the Jews as harlots, and born of harlots, John 8. 41.

(2.) The Scribes and Pharisees, the chief priests and elders, and indeed the Jewish nation in general, were like the other son that gave good words; they made a specious profession of religion, and yet, when the kingdom of the Messiah was brought among them by the baptism of John, they slighted it, they turned their back upon it, nay they lifted up the heel against it. A hypocrite is more hardly convinced and converted than a gross sinner; the form of godliness, if that be rested in, becomes one of Satan’s strong-holds, by which he opposes the power of godliness. It was an aggravation of their unbelief.

[1.] That John was such an excellent person, that he came, and came to them, in the way of righteousness. The better the means are, the greater will be the account be, if not improved. [2.] That, when they saw the publicans and harlots go before them into the kingdom of heaven, they did not afterward repent and believe; were not thereby provoked to a holy emulation, Rom. 11. 14. Shall publicans and harlots go away with grace and glory; and shall not we put in for a share? Shall our interiors be more holy and more happy than we? They had not the wit and grace that Esau had, who was moved to take other measures than he had done, by the example of his younger brother, Gen. 28. 6. These proud priests, that set up for leaders, scorned to follow, though it were into the kingdom of heaven, especially to follow publicans; through the pride of their countenance, they would not seek after God, after Christ, Ps. 10. 4.

33. Hear another parable: There was a certain householder, which planted a vineyard, and hedged it round about, and digged a wine-press in it, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country: 34. And when the time of the fruit drew near, he sent his servants to the husbandmen, that they might receive the fruits of it. 35. And the husbandmen took his servants, and beat one, and killed another, and stoned another. 36. Again, he sent other servants more than the first: and they did unto them likewise. 37. But last of all he sent unto them his son, saying, They will reverence my son. 38. But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance. 39. And they caught him, and cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him.

40. When the Lord therefore of the vineyard cometh, what will he do unto those husbandmen? 41. They say unto him, He will miserably destroy those wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their seasons. 42. Jesus saith unto them, Did ye never read in the scriptures, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner; this is the Lord’s doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes? 43. Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. 44. And whosoever shall fall on this stone, shall be broken: but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder. 45. And when the chief priests and Pharisees had heard his parables, they perceived that he spake of them. 46. But when they sought to lay hands on him, they feared the multitude, because they took him for a prophet.

This parable plainly sets forth the sin and ruin of the Jewish nation; they and their leaders are the husbandmen here; and what is spoken for conviction to them, is spoken for caution to all that enjoy the privileges of the visible church, not to be high-minded, but fear God:

We have here the privileges of the Jewish church, represented by the letting out of a vineyard to the husbandmen; they were as tenants holding by, from, and under, God the great Householder. Observe,

1. How God established a church for himself in the world. The kingdom of God upon earth is here compared to a vineyard, furnished with all things requisite, an active generous management, and the improvement of it. (1.) He planted the vineyard. The church is the planting of the Lord, Isa. 61. 3. The forming of a church is a work by itself, like the planting of a vineyard, which requires a great deal of cost and care. It is the vineyard which his right hand has planted, (Ps. 80. 15.) planted with the chieftest vine, (Isa. 5. 2.) a noble vine, Jer. 2. 21. The earth of itself produces thorns and briars; vines must be planted. The being set up of a church is owing to God’s distinguishing favour, and his manifesting himself to some, and not to others. (2.) He hedged it round about. Note, God’s church in the world is taken under his special protection. It is a hedge round about, like that about Job on every side, (Job 1. 10.) a wall of fire, Zech. 2. 5. Wherever God has a church, it is, and will always be, his peculiar care. The covenant of circumcision and the ceremonial law were a hedge or a wall of partition about the Jewish church, which is taken down by Christ; who yet has appointed a gospel order and discipline to be the hedge of his church. He will not have his vineyard to lie in common, that those who are without may thrust in at pleasure; not to lie at large, that those who are within may lash out at pleasure; but care is taken to set bounds about this holy mountain. (3.) He digged a wine-press, and built a tower. The altar of burnt-offerings was the wine-press, to which all the offerings were brought. God instituted ordinances in his church for the due oversight of it, and for the promoting of its fruitfulness. What could have been done more to make it every way convenient?

2. How he intrusted these visible church privileges with the nation and people of the Jews, especially their chief priests and elders; he let it out to them, and made them, not because he had need of them, as landlords have of their tenants, but because he would try them, and be honoured by them. When in Judah God was known, and his name was great; when they were taken to be God for a people, and for a name, and for a praise; (Jer. 13. 11.) when he revealed his word unto Jacob; (Ps. 147. 19.) when the covenant of life and peace was made with Levi; (Mal. 2. 4, 5.) then this vineyard was of out of the breach, Gen. 41. 12. The Lord of the vineyard was to have a thousand pieces of silver, (compare Isa. 7. 13.) the main profit was to be his; but the keepers were to have two hundred, a competent and comfortable encouragement. And then he went into a far country. When God had in a visible appearance settled the
ST. MATTHEW, XXI.

(1.) Never did grace appear more glorious than in sending the Son. This was done last of all. Note, All the prophets were harbinger and forerunners to Christ. He was sent last; for if nothing else would work upon them, surely this would; it was therefore reserved for the ratio ultima—the last expedient. Surely they will reverence my Son, and therefore reverence me. Note, It might reasonably be expected that the Son of God, when he came to his own, should be revered; and reverence to Christ would be a powerful and effectual principle of fruitfulness and obedience, to the glory of God; if they will but reverence the Son, the point is gained. Surely they will reverence my Son, for he comes with more authority than the servants could; judge therefore, that all men who shall hear of me shall reverence our him. There is greater danger in refusing him than in despising Moses's law.

(2.) Never did sin appear more sinful than in the abusing of him, which was now to be done in two or three days. Observe,

[1.1] How it was plotted; (v. 38.) When they saw the Son: when he came, whom the people owned to be Messiah, and followed him; they could not have had the rent paid, or distrained for it; this touched their coprophyl, and they were resolved to make one bold push for it, and to preserve their wealth and grandeur by taking him out of the way, who was the only hinderer of it, and rival with them. This is the heir; come, let us kill him. Pilate and Herod, the princes of this world, knew not; for if they had known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. But they knew not; for they were enemies of Christ. They, and therefore Come, let us kill him. Many are killed for what they have. The chief thing they envied him, and for which they hated and feared him, was, his interest in the people, and their hosannas, which, if he was taken off, they hoped to engross securely to themselves. They pretended that he must die, to save the people from the Romans; (John 11. 50.) but really he must die, to save their hypocrisy and tyranny from that reformation which the expected kingdom of the Messiah would certainly bring along with it. He drives the buyers and sellers out of the temple; and therefore let us seize on his inheritance. They thought, if they could ruin this Jesus, they should carry all before them in the church without control, might impose what traditions, and force the people to what submissions, they pleased. Thus they take cannon against the Lord and his anointed; but he that sits in heaven, lunghs to see them out-shot in their own bow; for, while they thought to kill him, and so to seize on his inheritance, he went by his cross to his crown, and they were broken in pieces with a red iron, and their inheritance seized. Ps. 2. 8, 9. [2.] How this plot was executed, v. 39. While they were so set upon killing him, in pursuance of their design to secure their own pomp and power, and while he was so set upon dying, in pursuance of his design to subdue Satan, and save his chosen, no wonder if they soon caught him and slew him, when his hour was come. Though the Roman power exactions, and their inheritance seized. Ps. 2. 8, 9, 10. Ps. 46. 9. Priests and elders; for they were not only the procurers, but the principal agents, and had the greater sin. Ye have taken, Acts 2. 23. Nay, looking upon him to be as unworthy to live, as they were unwilling he should, they cast him out of the vineyard, out of the holy church, which they supposed to have the key or, and out of the holy city, and fed them with the crucified. Acts 13. 12. As if He had been the Shame and Reproach, who was the greatest glory, of his people Israel. Thus they who persecuted the servants, persecuted
the Son; as men treat God's ministers, they would treat Christ himself, if he were with them.

IV. Here is their doom read out of their own mouths, v. 40, 41. He puts it to them, When the Lord of the vineyard had cast them out, what will they do? He puts it to themselves, for their stronger conviction, that, knowing the judgment of God against them which do such things, they might be the more inexcusable. Note, God's proceedings are so unexceptionable, that there needs but an appeal to sinners themselves concerning the equity of them. God will be justified when he speaks. They could readily answer, He will miserably destroy these wicked men. Note, Many can easily prognosticate the dismal consequences of other people's sins, that see not what will be the end of their own.

1. Our Saviour, in his question, supposes that the Lord of the vineyard will come, and reckon with them. God is the Lord of the vineyard; the property is his, and he will make them know it, who now lord it over his heritage, as if it were all their own. The Lord of the vineyard will come. The persecutors say in their hearts, He delays his coming; he doth not see, he will not require; but they shall find, though he hear long with them, he will not hear always. It is comfort to abuses saints and ministers, that the Lord is at hand, the Judge stands before the door. When he comes, what will he do to carnal professors? What will he do to cruel persecutors? They must be called to account, they have their day now; but he sees that his day is coming.

2. They, in their answer, suppose that it will be a terrible reckoning; the crime appearing so very black, you may be sure,

(1.) That he will miserably destroy those wicked men; it is destruction that is their doom. Κατετελεσθήναι τοις ἀδικοῖς.—Malos male perdet. Let men never expect to do ill, and fare well. This was fulfilled upon the Jews, in that miserable destruction which was brought upon them by the Roman sword; and was completed about forty years after this; an unparalleled ruin attended with all the most dismal aggravating circumstances. It will be fulfilled upon all that tread in the steps of their wickedness; hell is everlasting destruction, and it will be the most miserable destruction to them of all others, that have enjoyed the greatest share of church privileges, and have not improved them. The hottest place in hell will be by those of those privileges and persecutors.

(2.) That he will let out his vineyard to other husbandmen. Note, God will have a church in the world, notwithstanding the unworthiness and opposition of many that abuse the privileges of it. The unbelief and forwardness of man shall not make the word of God of no effect. If one will not, another will. The Jews' leavings were the Gentiles' feast. Persecutors may destroy the ministers, but cannot destroy the church. The Jews imagined that, no doubt, they were the people, and wisdom and holiness must die with them; and if they were cut off, what would God do for a church in the world? But when God makes use of any to bear up his name, it is not because he needs them, nor is he at all beholden to them. If we were made a desolation and an astonishment, God could build a flourishing church upon our ruins; for he is never at a loss what to do for his glory, and the advancement of his kingdom, wherever comes of us, and of our place and nation.

V. The further illustration and application of this by Christ himself, telling them, in effect, that they had rightly judged.

1. He illustrates it by referring to a scripture fulfilled in this; (v. 42.) Did ye never read in the scripture? Yes, no doubt, they had often read and sung it, but had not considered it. We lose the benefit of what we read, for want of meditation. The scripture he quotes, is, Ps. 118. 22, 23. the same context out of which the children fetched their hosannas.

The same word yields matter of praise and comfort to Christ's friends and followers, which spiritual enemies shall be sore distinguished. Such a two-edged sword is the word of God. That scripture, the Stone which the builders refused is become the Headstone of the corner, illustrates the preceding parable, especially that part of it which refers to Christ.

(1.) The builders rejecting the stone is the same with the husbandmen's abusing of the son that was sent to them. The chief priests and the elders were the builders, and had the oversight of the Jewish church, which was God's building; and they would not allow Christ a place in their building, would not admit his doctrine or laws into their constitution; they threw him aside as a despised broken Vessel, a Stone that would serve only for a stepping-stone, to be trampled upon.

(2.) The advancing of this stone to be the head of the corner, is the same with letting out the vineyard to other husbandmen. He who was rejected by the Jews, was embraced by the Gentiles; and to that church where there is no difference of circumcision or uncircumcision. Christ is all and in all. His authority over the gospel-church, and influence upon it, his ruling it as the Head of the corner; his right hand and his holy arm brought it about; it was God himself that highly exalted him, and gave him a name above every name, and that marvellous in our eyes. The wickedness of the Jews that rejected him, is marvellous; that men should be so prejudiced against their own interest; See Isa. 29. 9, 10, 14. The honour done him by the Gentile world, notwithstanding the abuses done him by his own people, is marvellous; that he whom men despised and abhorred, should be adored by kings! Isa. 49. 7. But it is the Lord's doing.

2. He applies it to them, and application is the life of preaching.

(1.) He applies the sentence which they had passed, (v. 41.) and turns it upon themselves; not the former part of it, concerning the miserable destruction of the husbandmen, (he could not bear to speak of that,) but the latter part, of letting out the vineyard to others; because, though it looked black upon the Jews, it spoke good to the Gentiles. Know therefore,

[2.] That the kingdom of God shall be taken from you. This turning out of the husbandmen speaks the same doom with that of dismantling the vineyard, and laying it common, Isa. 5. 5. To the Jews had long pertained the adoption and the glory; (Rom. 9. 4.) to them were committed the oracles of God, (Rom. 3. 2.) and the sacred trust of revealed religion, and bearing up of God's name in the world; (Ps. 76. 2.) but now no more; for the Gentiles were not unfruitful in the use of their privileges, but, under pretence of them, opposed the gospel of Christ, and so forfeited them, and it was not long ere the forfeiture was taken. Note, It is a righteous thing with God, to remove church privileges from those that not only sin against them, but sin with them, Rev. 2. 4, 5. The kingdom of God was taken from the Jews, not only by the temporal judgments that befell them, but by the spiritual judgments they lay under, their kindliness of mind, hardness of heart, and indignation at the gospel, Rom. 11. 8—10. 1 Thess. 2. 13.

2. That the Gentiles shall be taken in. God needs not ask as leave, whether he shall have a church in the world; though his vine be plucked up in a meadow, and his grape plucked from the earth. He will give it 356—to the Gentile world, that will bring forth the fruit of it. They who had been not a people, and had not obtained mercy, became favourites of Heaven. This is the mystery which blessed Paul was so much affected with, (Rom. 11. 30, 33.) and which the Jews were so much affrighted by, Acts 22. 26. As at the first planting of Israel in Canaan, the fall of the Gentiles was the increase of Israel, (Ps. 110. 10, 11.) so, at their expiration, the fall of Israel was the riches of the Gentiles, Rom. 11. 12. It shall go to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. Note, Christ knows beforehand who will bring forth gospel-fruits in the use of gospel-means; because our fruitfulness is all the work of his own hands, and (even unto God) are all his works. They shall bring forth the fruits better than the Jews had done; God has had more glory from the New-Testament church than from that of the Old-Testament; for, when he changes, it shall not be to his loss.

2. He applies the scripture which he had quoted, (v. 42.) to their terror, v. 44. This Stone, which the builders refused, is set for the fall of many in Israel; and we have here the doom of two sorts of people. The fall it proves that Christ is set for a

[1.] Some, through ignorance, stumble at Christ, in his estate of humiliation; when this Stone lies on the earth, where the builders throw it, they, through their blindness and carelessness, fall on it, fall over it, and they shall be broken. The offence they take at Christ will not hurt him, any more than he that stumbles hurts the stone he stumbles at; but it will hurt themselves; they will fall, and be broken, and snared, Isa. 8. 14.—1 Pet. 2. 7, 8. The unbelief of sinners will be their ruin.

[2.] Others, through malice, oppose Christ, and bid defiance to him in his estate of exaltation, when this Stone is advanced to the head of the corner; and en them it shall fall, for they pull it on their own heads, as the Jews did by that challenge, His blood be upon your children, and it will grind them to powder. The effect of the sin and sorrows of all unbelievers; this is the greatest and soroser ruin, of persecutors, that kick against the pricks, and persist in it. Christ's kingdom will be a burrethensome stone to all those that attempt to overthrow it, or heave it out of its place; see Zech. 12. 3. This Stone, cut out of the mountain without hands, will break in pieces all opposing power, Dan. 2. 34, 35. Some make this an allusion to the manner of stoning to death among the Jews. The molefactors were first thrown down violently from a high scaffold upon a great stone, which would much bruise them; but then they threw another great stone upon them, which would crush them to pieces: one way or other, Christ will utterly destroy all those that fight against him. He be so stout-hearted, that they are not destroyed by the first stone, yet it shall fall on them, and so destroy them. He will stone through unto kings, he will fill the places with dead bodies, Ps. 110. 5, 6. None ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered.

Lastly, The entertainment which this discourse of Christ met with among the chief priests and elders, that is, their parable. 1. They refused that he shake of them, (v. 45.) and that, in what they said, (v. 41.) they had but read their own doom. Note, A guilty conscience needs no accuser, and sometimes will save a minister the labour of saying, Thou art the man. Mutato nomine, de te fabula narratur—Change but the name, the tale is told of thee. So quick and powerful is the word of God, and such a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart, that it is easy for bad men (if conscience be not quite feared) to perceive that it speaks of them.

2. They sought to lay hands on him. Note, When they who had heard the reproves of the word, perceive that it speaks of them, if it do not do them a great deal of good, it will certainly do them a great deal of hurt. If they be not prickled to the heart with conviction and contrition, as they were, Acts 2. 37. they will be cut to the heart with rage and indignation, as they were, Acts 5. 33.

3. They durst not do it, for fear of the multitude, who took him for a prophet, though not for the Messiah; this served to keep the Pharisees in awe. The fear of the people restrained them from speaking ill of John, (v. 26.) and here from doing ill to Christ. Note, God has many ways of restraining the remaining strays of wrath, as he has of making that which breaks out to redound to his praise, Ps. 76. 10.

CHAP. XXII.

This chapter is a continuation of Christ's discourses in the temple, or two or three days before his death. His discourses then are largely recorded, as being of special weight and consequence. In this chapter, we have, I. Instructio, given, by the parable of the marriage supper, concerning the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, (v. 1. 10.) and, by the doom of the guest that had not the wedding garment, the danger of hypocrisy in the profession of Christianity, v. 11—14. II. Disputes with the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Scribes, who opposed Christ, Concerning paying tribute to Caesar, v. 15—22. Concerning the resurrection of the dead, and the future state, v. 25—33. Concerning the great commandment of the law, v. 34—40. 4. Concerning the relation of the Messiah to David, v. 41—46.

1. And Jesus answered and spake unto them again by parables, and said, 2. The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his son. 3. And sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding: and they would not come. 4. Again, he sent forth other servants, saying, Tell them which are bidden, Behold, I have prepared my dinner; my oxen and my fatlings are killed, and all things are ready: come unto the marriage. 5. But they made light of it, and went their ways, one to his farm, another to his merchandise. 6. And the remnant took his servants, and entreated them spitefully, and slew them. 7. But when the king heard thereof, he was wroth: and he sent forth his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and burned up their city. 8. Then saith he to his servants, The wedding is ready, but they which were bidden were not worthy. 9. Go ye therefore into the highways, and as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage. 10. So those servants went out into the highways, and gathered together as many as they found, both bad and good: and the wedding was furnished with guests. 11. And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding garment: 12. And he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having a wedding garment?
And he was speechless. 13. Then said the king to the servants, Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. 14. For many are called, but few are chosen.

We have here the parable of the guests invited to the wedding feast. In this it is said, (v. 1.) Jesus answered, not to what his opponents said, (for they were put to silence,) but to what they thought, when they were wishing for an opportunity to lay hands on him, ch. 21. 46. Note, Christ knows how to answer men's thoughts, for he is a Discerner of them. Or, He answered, that is, he continued his discourse to the same purport; for this parable represents the gospel-offer, and the church's reception of it. These guests are of the former, but under another similitude. The parable of the vineyard represents the sin of the rulers, that persecuted the prophets; it shows also the sin of the people, who generally neglected the message, while their great ones were persecuting the messengers.

1. Gospel-preparations are here represented by a feast which a king made at the marriage of his son; such things are a provision made for precious souls, in and by the new covenant. The King is God, a great King, King of kings. Now, 1. Here is a marriage made for his son. Christ is the Bridegroom, the church is the bride; the gospel day is the day of his espousals, Cant. 3. 11. Behold by faith the church of the first born, that are written in heaven, and were given to Christ by him whose they were; and in them you see the bride, the Lamb's wife, as the spotless and victorious marriage covenant betwixt Christ and believers, and it is a marriage of God's making. This branch of the similitude is only mentioned, and not prosecuted here. 2. Here is a dinner prepared for this marriage, v. 4. All the privileges of church membership, and all the blessings of the new covenant, pardon of sin, the favour of God, peace of conscience, the promises of the gospel, and all the riches contained in them, access to the throne of grace, the comfort of the Spirit, and a well-grounded hope of eternal life. These are the preparations for this feast, a heaven upon earth now, and a heaven in heaven shortly. God has prepared it in his counsel, in his covenant. It is a dinner, denoting present privileges in the midst of our day, beside the supper at night in glory. (1.) It is a feast. Gospel-preparations were prophesied of as a feast, (Isa. 66. 1.) a feast of fat things, and were typified by the many festivals of the ceremonial law; (1 Cor. 5. 8.) Let us keep the feast. A feast is a good day; (Esth. 8. 7.) so is the gospel; it is a continual feast. Oxen and fatlings are killed for this feast; no niceties, but substantial food; enough, and enough of the best. The day of a feast is a day of slaughter, or sacrifice, Jam. 5. 5. Gospel-preparations are all founded in the death of Christ, his sacrifice is the feast. A feast was made for love, it is a reconciliation feast, a token of God's good will toward men. It was made for laughter, (Eccle. 10. 19.) it is a rejoicing feast. It was made for fulness; the design of the gospel was to fill every hungry soul with good things. It was made for fellowship, to maintain an intercourse between heaven and earth. We are sent for to the banquet of Zion, that we may tell what is our petition, and what is our request. (2.) It is a wedding. Gospel-preparations are usually rich, free, and joyful. The first miracle Christ wrought, was, to make plentiful provision for a wedding feast; (John 2. 7.) and surely then he will not be wanting in provision for his own wedding feast, when the marriage of the Lamb is come, and the bride has made herself ready, a victorious triunphant feast, Rev. 19. 7, 17, 18.

(3.) It is a royal wedding feast; it is the feast of a king, (1 Sam. 25. 36.) at the marriage, not of a servant, but of a son; and then, if ever, he will, like Amasias, show the riches of his glorious kingdom, Esth. 1. 4. The provision made for believers in the covenant of grace, is not such as worthless worms, like us, had any reason to expect; but it becomes the feast of f Engels in grace. He gives him himself, for he gives himself to be to them El-shaddai—A God that is enough, a feast indeed for a soul.

II. Gospel calls and offers are represented by an invitation to this feast. Those that make a feast, will have guests to grace the feast with. God's guests are the children of men. Lord, what is man, that he should be thus dignified! The guests that were first invited were the Jews; where the gospel is preached, this invitation is given; ministers are the servants that are sent to invite, Prov. 9. 4, 5. Now, 1. The guests are called, bidden to the wedding. All that are within hearing of the joyful sound of the gospel, to them is the word of this invitation sent. The servants that bring the invitation do not set down their names in a paper; there is no occasion for that, since none are excluded but those that exclude themselves, who will not come. The former, are bidden to the wedding; for all that partake of gospel privileges, are to give a due and respectful attendance on the Lord Jesus, as the faithful friend and humble servant of the Bridegroom. They are bidden to the wedding, that they may go forth to meet the Bridegroom; for it is the Father's will that all men should honour the Son. 2. The guests are called upon; for in the gospel there are not only gracious persuasions made, but gracious persuasives. We persuade men, we beseech them in Christ's stead, 2 Cor. 5. 11, 28. See how much Christ's heart is set upon the happiness of poor souls! He not only provides for them, in consideration of their want, but sends to them, in consideration of their weakness and forgetfulness. When the invited guests were slack in coming, the king sent forth other servants, v. 4. When the prophets of the Old Testament, and the ministers of the Gospel, and Christ himself, who told them the entertainment was almost ready, (the kingdom of God was at hand,) the apostles and ministers of the gospel were sent, after Christ's resurrection, to tell them it was come, it was quite ready; and to persuade them to accept the offer. One would think it had been enough to give men an intimation that they had leave to come, and should be welcome; that, during the solemnity of the wedding, the king kept the banquet open, but, because the natural man discerns not, and therefore desires not, the things of the Spirit of God, we are pressed to accept the call by the most powerful inducements, drawn with the cords of man, and all the bonds of love. If the repetition of the call will move us, Behold, the Spirit saith, Come; and the bride saith, Come; let him that hears say, Come; let him that is athirst, come, Rev. 22. 17. After the reason of the call will work upon us, Behold, the dinner is prepared, the oxen and fatlings are killed, and all things are ready; the Father is ready to accept of us, the Son to intercede for us, the Spirit to sanctify us; pardon is ready, peace is ready, comfort is ready; the promises are ready, as wells of living water for supply; ordinances are ready, as golden pipes for conveyance; angels are ready to attend us, creatures are ready to be in league with us, provided we are ready. But let heaven, at last, be ready to receive us; it is a kingdom prepared, ready to be revealed in the last time. Is all this ready; and shall we be unread? Is all this preparation made for us; and is there any room to doubt of our welcome, if we come in a right manner? Come, therefore, Oh come to the marriage; we beseech you, receive not all this grace of God in vain, 2 Cor. 6.

1. held about treatment which the gospel of Christ, often meets with among the children of men, represented by the cold treatment that this message met with, and the hot treatment that the messengers met with, in both which the king himself and the royal bridgroom are affronted. This reflects primarily upon the Jews, who rejected the counsel of God against their wills; and physicians to the people that would, by many in all ages, be put upon, and the opposition that would be given to, the gospel of Christ.

1. The message was basely slighted; (v. 3.) They would not come. Note, The reason why sinners come not to Christ and salvation by him, is, not because they cannot, but because they will not; (John 5. 46.); or, as this word, will not, signifies, will not come into, this will aggravate the misery of sinners, that they might have had happiness for the coming for, but it was their own act and deed to refuse it. I would, and ye would not. But this was not all; (v. 5.) they made light of it; they thought it not worth coming for; thought the messengers made more ado than needs; let them magnify the preparations ever so much, they could feast as well at home. Note, When taking light of Christ and the gospel, their salvation was wrought out by him, is the damning sin of the world.

And the reason why they made light of the marriage feast, was, because they had other things that they minded more, and had more mind to; they went their ways, one to his farm, and another to his merchandise. Note, The business and profit of worldly employments prove to many a great hinderance in closing with Christ: none turn their back on the feast, but with some plausible excuse or other, Luke 14. 18. The country people have their farms to look after, about which there is always something or other to do; the town's people must tend their shops, and be constant upon the exchange; they must buy, and sell, and get gain. It is true that both farmers and merchants must be diligent in their business, but not so as to keep them from making religion their main business. Lidds pergium ounes—These lawful things undo us, when they are unlawfully managed; when we are so careful and trust ourselves with the world, as to turn the other thing needful. Observe, Both the city and the country have their temptations, the merchandise in the one, and the farms in the other; so that, whatever we have of the world in our hands, our care must be to keep it out of our hearts, lest it come between us and Christ.

2. The messengers were basely abused: The rectitude of the rest of them, that is, those who had not gone to the marriage, was represented by the husbadminen nor tradesmen, but ecclesiastics, the Scribes, and Pharisees, and Chief priests; these were the persecutors, these took the servants, and treated them spitefully, and slew them. This, in the parable, is unaccountable, never any could be so rude and barbarous as this, to servants that came to invite them to a feast; for the application of the parable, it was matter of fact; when the guests had been beautiful, because they brought the glad tidings of the solemn feasts, ( Nahum 1. 15.) were treated as the offscouring of all things, 1 Cor. 4. 13. The prophets and John the Baptist had been thus abused already, and the apostles and ministers of Christ must count upon the same. The Jews were, either directly or indirectly, agents in most of the persecutions of the first preachers of the gospel; witness the history of the Acts, that is, the sufferings, of the apostles.

V. That this ruin that was coming upon the Jewish church and nation, is here represented by the revenge which the king, in wrath, took on these insolent recusants; (v. 7.) He was wrath. The Jews, who had been the people of God's love and blessing, by rejecting the gospel, became the generation of his wrath and curse. Wrath came upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. 2. 16. Now, observe here, 1. When Christ's church is in the greatest want of help, it was their being murderers. He does not say he destroyed those despisers of his call, but those murderers of his servants; as if God were more jealous for the lives of his ministers than for the honour of his gospel; he that toucheth them, toucheth the apple of his eye. Note, Persecution of Christ's faithful ministers models the measure of guilt more than any thing. Filling Jerusalem with innocent blood, was that sin of Manasseh which the Lord would not pardon, 2 Kings 24. 4. 2. What was the ruin itself, that was coming? He sent forth his armies. The Roman armies were his armies, of his raising, of his sending against the people of his wrath; and he gave them a charge to tread them under foot, Isa. 10. 6. God is the Lord of armies, and makes what he pleases of them, to serve his own purposes, though they mean not so, neither doth their heart think so, Mic. 4. 11, 12. His armies destroyed those murdurers, and burnt up their city. This points out very plainly the destruction of the Jews, and the burning of Jerusalem, by the Romans, forty years after this. No age ever saw a greater desolation than that, nor more of the direful effects of fire and sword. Though Jerusalem had been a holy city, the city that God had chosen to put his name there, beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth; yet that city being now become a harlot, righteousness being no longer lodged in it, but murderers, the worst of murderers, (as the prophet speaks, Isa. 1. 21.) judgment came upon it, and ruin without remedy; and it is set forth for an example to all that should oppose Christ and his gospel. It was the Lord's doing, to avenge the quarrel of his covenant.

V. The replenishing of the church again, by the bringing in of the Gentiles, is here represented by the furnishing of the feast with guests out of the highways, v. 8, 10.

Here is, 1. The complaint of the master of the feast concerning those that were first bidden; (v. 8.) No man, as the Antichrist of most of the written church, was to be seelched, a church ready to be founded; but they which were bidden, that is, the Jews to whom pertained the covenant and the promises, by which they were of old invited to the feast of fat things, they were not worthy, they were utterly unworthy, and, by their contempt of Christ, had forfeited all the privileges they were invited to. Note, It is not owing to God that sinners perish, but to their own obstinacy. 2. Then Israel of old, in the land of Canaan, the land of promise was ready, the milk and honey ready, but their unbelief and murmuring, and contempt of that pleasant land, shut them out, and their carcasses were left to perish in the wilderness; and these things happened to them for examples. See 1 Cor. 10. 11. Heb. 3. 16—1. 4.

2. The commission he gave to the servants to invite others, that is, to call upon the city, (v. 7.) was refused; Go to the high-ways then; into the ways of the Gentiles, which at first they were to decline, ch. 10. 5. Thus, by the fall of the Jews, salvation is come to the Gentiles, Rom. 11. 11, 12. Eph. 3. 8. Note, Christ will have a kingdom in the world, though many reject the grace, and resist the power, of that kingdom. Though Israel be not gathered, he will be glorious. The offer of Christ
Observe, This hypocrite was never discovered to be without a wedding garment, till the king himself came in to see the guests. Now, the guests that disguises will shortly be struck off, and every man will appear in his own colours; and an encouragement to us in our sincerity, that God is a witness to it.
15. Then went the Pharisees, and took counsel how they might entangle him in his talk. 16. And they sent out unto him their disciples with the Herodians, saying, Master, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth, neither carest thou for any man; for thou regardest not the person of men. 17. Tell us therefore, What thinketh thou? Is it lawful to give tribute unto Caesar, or not? 18. But Jesus perceived their wickedness, and said, Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? 19. Shew me the tribute money. And they brought unto him a penny. 20. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? 21. They say unto him, Caesar's. Then saith he unto them, Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's; and unto God the things that are God's. 22. When they had heard these words, they marvelled, and left him, and went their way.

It was not the least grievous of the sufferings of Christ, that he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, and had snares laid for him by those that sought how to take him off with some pretence. In these verses, we have him attacked by the Pharisees and Herodians, with a question about paying tribute to Caesar. Observe,

1. What the design was, which they proposed to themselves. They took counsel to entangle him in his talk. Hitherto, his encounters had been mostly with the chief priests and the elders, men in authority, who trusted more to their power than to their policy, and examined him concerning his commission; (ch. 21, 22.) but now he is set upon from another quarter; the Pharisees will try whether they can deal with him by their learning in the law, and in casuistical divinity, and they have a tentamen novum—a new trial for him. Note, It is vanity to think that, by their ingenuity, or interest, or industry, or even by their innocence and integrity, they can escape the hatred and ill-will of bad men, or screen themselves from the strife of tongues. See how unwearyed the enemies of Christ and his kingdom are in their opposition.

1. They took counsel. It was foretold concerning him, that the rulers would take counsel against him; (Ps. 2, 2.) and so persecuted they the prophets. Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah. See Jer. 18. 18.—20. 10. Note, The more there is indignation; they will be like a wild bull in a net, full of the fury of the Lord, Isa. 51. 20.—8, 21, 22. Let us therefore hear and fear.

Lastly, The parable is concluded with that remarkable saying which we had before, (ch. 20, 16.)

Many are called, but few are chosen, v. 14. Of the many that are called, few are chosen; and of the wedding feast, few set aside all those as unchosen, that made light of it, and avowedly prefer other things before it; if then you set aside all that make a profession of religion, but the temper of whose spirits, and the tenor of whose conversation, is a constant contradiction to it; if you set aside all the profane, and all the hypocritical, you will find that they are few, very few, that are chosen; and of those few, chosen by the Lord to the wedding feast, few chosen to the wedding garment, that is, to salvation, by sanctification of the Spirit. This is the strait gate, and narrow way, which few find.

Hitherto, or the like conclusions were drawn from the parable, but even so, how is it possible that they should have been taken up? If men are to be considered, it appears, that the sound of the voice is better than all words, He spake the word of God, and they could not understand it.

Complimented with the grace of the gospel, the heart will be wrought upon by the power of the Holy Spirit, and they will give up their former ways. He that is born of the Spirit, is born of the water and of the Spirit. If they could not understand the word of the Lord, they were blind and astronomy, and not be enlightened; and if they are enlightened by any means, they will not be content with that; but being committed to them, they will be rejected by them. The word of the Lord is a lamp to their feet, and a light to their path, but they will not walk in it. They will have no right or title to the word, if they reject it, they shall be spurned and despised. And if it be couched in a popular form as is the parable here, yet that will be of no avail; they shall be reproved in their own form, and their own language; and in their own reproach, and scorn, and hatred, and persecution, the sentence shall find them.

of contrivance and consultation about sin, the worse it is. There is a particular woe to them that devise iniquity, Mic. 2. 1. The more there is of the wicked wit in the contrivance of a sin, the more there is of the wicked will in the commission of it.

2. That which they aimed at, was, to entangle him as much as possible. They saw him free and bold in speaking his mind, and hoped by that, if they could bring him to some nice and tender point, to get an advantage against him. It has been the old practice of Satan's agents and emissaries, to make a man an offender for a word, a word misplaced, or mistaken, or misunderstood; a word, though innocently designed, yet perverted by strained invernos; thus they lay a snare for him that reproved in the gate (Isa. 28. 21.) and represent them to their teacher as the greatest troublers of Israel: thus the wicked plotted against the just, Ps. 37. 12, 13.

There are two ways by which the enemies of Christ might be revenged on him, and be rid of him; either by law, or by force. By law they could not do it, unless they could make him obnoxious to the civil government; for it was not lawful for them to put any man to death; (John 18. 31.) and the Roman governors were apt to consult the lives and fortunes of men; to ask questions of words, and names, and their laws. Acts 18. 14. By force they could not do it, unless they could make him obnoxious to the people, who were always the hands, whoever were the heads, in such acts of violence, which they called the beating of the rebels; but the people took Christ for a Prophet, and therefore his enemies could not raise the mob against him. Now, (as the serpent way, from the beginning more subtle than any beast of the field,) the design was, to bring him into such a dilemma, that he must make himself liable to the displeasure, either of the Jewish multitude, or of the Roman magistrates; let him take which side of the question he will, he shall run himself into a premunire; and so they will gain their point, and make his own tongue to fall upon him.

II. If the question which they put to him, pursuant to this design, v. 16, 17. Having devised this iniquity in secret, in a close cabal, behind the curtain, when they went abroad, without loss of time, they practised it. Observe,

1. The persons they employed; they did not go themselves, lest the design should be suspected, and Christ should stand the more upon his guard; but they sent their disciples, who would look less like tutors and notoriety than the Pharisees and teachers. Note, Wicked men will never want wicked instruments to be employed in carrying on their wicked counsels. Pharisees have their disciples at their beck, who will go on any errand for them, and say as they say; and they have this in their eye, when they are so industrious to make proscytes.

With them they sent the Herodians, a party among the Jews, who were for a cheerful and easy taxation under the Roman emperor, and to Herod his deputy; and who made it their business to concile people to that government, and pressed all to pay their tribute. Some think that they were the collectors of the land tax, as the publicans were of the customs, and that they went with the Pharisees to Christ, with this blind upon their plot, that, while the Herodians demanded the tax, and the Pharisees denied it, they were both willing to refer it to Christ, as in such a case he was able to decide the quarrel. Herod being obliged, by the usurpers of the sovereignty, to take care of the tribute, these Herodians, by assisting him in that, helped to endear him to his great friends at home. The Pharisees, on the other hand, were zealous for the liberty of the Jews, and did what they could to make them impatient of the Roman yoke. Now, if he should countenance the paying of tribute, the Pharisees would incense the people against him; if he should discontent them or disallow it, the Herodians would incense the government against him. Note, It is common for those that oppose one another, to continue in an opposition to Christ and his kingdom. Samson's foxes looked several ways, that might pass him through his most specious prerogative. See Jer. 3. 5, 7, 8. If they are unanimous in opposing, should not we be so in maintaining, the interests of the gospel?

2. The preface, with which they were plausibly to introduce the question; it was highly complimentary to our Saviour; (v. 16.) Master, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth. Note, It is a common thing for the most spiritful projects to be introduced with a most plausible preface. Had they come to Christ with the most serious and sincere intention, they could not have expressed themselves better. Here is hatred covered with deceit, and a wicked heart with burning lips; (Prov. 26. 23.) as Judas, who kissed, and betrayed, as Joab, who kissed, and killed. Now, (1.) What they said of Christ, was right, and, whether they knew it or no, blessed be God, whom we know.

[1.] That Jesus Christ was a faithful Teacher; Thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth. For himself, he is true, the Amen, the faithful Witness; he is the Truth itself. As for his doctrine, the matter of his teaching was the way of God, the way that God requires us to walk in, the way of duty, that leads to happiness; that is the way of God. The manner of it was in truth; he showed people that there is a way, the way in which they should go. He was a skilful Teacher, and knew the way of God; and a faithful Teacher, that would be sure to let us know it. See Prov. 8. 6—9. This is the character of a good teacher, to preach the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and not to suppress, pervert, or stretch, any truth, for favour or affection, hatred or good-will, either out of a desire to please, or a fear to offend, any man.

[2.] That he was a held Reformer. In preaching, he cared not for any; he valued no man's frowns or smiles, he did not court, he did not dread, either the great or the many, for he regarded not the person of man. In his evangelical judgment, he did not know faces; that Lion of the tribe of Judah turned not away for any, (Prov. 30. 30.) turned not a step from the truth, nor from his work, for fear of the most formidable. He reproved with equity, (Isa. 11. 4.) and never with partiality.

(2.) Though what they said was true for the matter of it, yet there was nothing but flattery and treachery in the intention of it. They called him Master, when they were contriving to treat him as the worst of malefactors; they pretended respect for him, when they intended mischief against him; and they affronted his wisdom as Man, much more his omniscience as God, of which he had so often given undeniable proofs, which they pretended that he could improve upon him with these pretences, and that he could not see through them. It is the grossest atheism, that is, the greatest folly in the world, to think to put a cheat upon Christ, who searches the heart, Rev. 2. 23. Those that mock God, do but deceive themselves, Gal. 6. 7.

3. The proposal of the case; What thinkest thou? As if they had said, "Many men are of many minds in this matter—many have a variety of opinion, or else let us have thy thoughts freely in the matter. Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar, or not?" This implies a further question; Has Caesar a right to demand it? The nation of the Jews was lately, about a hundred years before this, conquered by the Roman sword, and so, as other nations, made subject to the Roman yoke, and became a province of the empire; accordingly, toll, tribute, and custom, were demanded from them, and sometimes poll-money. By this it appeared that the scripture was departed from Judah; (Gen. 49. 16.) and therefore, if they had understood the signs of the times, they might have discerned in their midst either that this was he, or they must find out another more likely to be so.

Now, the question was, Whether it was lawful to pay these taxes voluntarily, or, Whether they should not insist upon the ancient liberty of their nation, and rather suffer themselves to be strained upon? The ground of the doubt was, that they were Abraham's seed, and should not consent be tributary to him, John 8. 33. God had given them a law, that they should not set a stranger over them; Did not that imply that they were not to yield any willing subscription to any prince, state, or potentate, that was not of their own nation and religion? This was an old mistake, arising from that pride, and that haughty spirit, which bring destruction and a fall. Jeremiah, in his time, though he spake in God's name, could not possibly beat them off it, nor persuade them to submit to the King of Babylon; and their obstinacy in that matter was then their ruin: (Jer. 27. 13.) and now again they stumbled at the same stone; and it was the very thing which, in a few years after, brought final destruction upon them by the Romans. They quite mistook the sense both of the precept and of the privilege, and, under colour of it, work out their own ruin, when they should have kissed the rod, and accepted the punishment of their iniquity.

However, by this question they hoped to entangle Christ, and, which way sower he solved it, to expose him to the fury either of the jealous Jews, or of the jealous Romans; they were ready to triumph, as Pharaoh did over Israel, that the wilderness had shut him in, and his doctrine would be concluded either injurious to the rights of the church, or hurtful to kings and provinces.

III. The breaking of this snares by the wisdom of the Lord Jesus.

1. He discovered it; (v. 18.) He perceived their wickedness; for, surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird, Prov. 1. 17. A temptation perceived has conquered, for our greatest danger lies in the sneaks; and avoided it. Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? Note, Whatever vizard the hypocrites put on, our Lord Jesus sees through it; he perceives all the wickedness that is in the hearts of pretenders, and can easily convict them of it, and set it in order before them. He cannot be imposed upon, as we often are, by flatteries and fair pretences. He that searches the heart, can call hypocrites by their own name, as Ahab did the wife of Jezebel, (1 Kings 14. 6.) Why feignest thou thyself to be another? Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? Note, Hypocrites tempt Jesus Christ; they try his knowledge, whether he can discover them through their disguises; they try his holiness and truth, whether he will allow of them in his church; but if they that of old tempted Christ, when he had not the mystery revealed, were destroyed of serpents, of how much sorer punishment shall they be thought worthy, who tempt him now in the midst of gospel-light and love! Those that presume to tempt Christ will certainly find him too hard for them, and that he is of more piercing eyes than not to see, and more pure eyes than not to hate, the disguised wickedness of hypocrites, that dig deep to his secrets, and attempt to ensnare him.

2. He evaded it; his convicting them of hypocrisy might have served for an answer; such captious malicious questions deserve a reproof, not a reply: but our Lord Jesus gave a full answer to their question, and introduced it by an argument sufficient to support it, so as to lay down a rule for his church in this matter, and yet to avoid giving offence, and to break the snare.

(1.) He forced them, ere they were aware, to confess Caesar's authority over them, v. 19, 20. In this they were willing that those that are captious should give our reasons, and, if possible, reasons of confessed cogency, before we give our resolutions. Thus the evidence of truth may silence gain-sayers by surprise, while they only stood upon their guard against the truth itself, not against the reason of it; shew me the tribute money. He had none of his own to convince them by; it should seem he had not said so much money as he had; but as for us, he emptied himself and became a curse; he despised the wealth of this world, and thereby taught us not to overvalue it; silver and gold he had none; why then should we covet to load ourselves with the thick clay? The Romans demanded their tribute in their own money, which was current among the Jews at that time; that, therefore, is called the tribute money; he does not name what piece, but the tribute money, to shew that he did not mind things of that nature, nor concern himself about them; his heart was upon better things, the kingdom of God, and the riches and righteousness thereof, and our's should be too. They presently brought him a penny, a Roman penny in silver, in value about seven pence halfpenny of our money, the most common piece then in use; it was stamped with the emperor's image, and the Roman superscription, which was the warrant of the public faith for the value of the pieces so stamped; a method agreed on by most nations, for the more easy circulation of money with satisfaction. The coining of money has always been looked upon as a branch of the prerogative, a flower of the crown, a royalty belonging to the sovereign powers; and the admitting of that as the good and lawful money of a country, is an implicit submission to those powers, and an owning of them in money matters. How happy is our constitution, and how happy we, who live in a nation where, though the image and superscription be the sovereign's, the property is the subjects, under the protection of the laws, and that what we have we can call our own!

Christ asked them, Whose image is this? They owned it was Caesar's, and thereby convicted those of falsehood, who said, Wc were never in bondage to any; and confirmed what afterwards they said, We have no king but Caesar. It is a rule in the Jewish Talmud, that "he is the king of the country whose coin is current in the country." Some think that the superscription upon this coin, was, a memorandum of the conquest of Judea by the Romans, anno frrorn captain Judah—be year after that event; and that they admitted that too.

(2.) From thence he inferred the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar; (v. 21.) Render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar's; not, Give it him, (as they expressed it, v. 17.) but "Render it;" Return, or, "Restore it;" if Caesar fill the purses, let Caesar command them. It is too late now to dispute about paying the tax; the Jews would have to the province of the empire, and, when once a relation is admitted, the duty of it must be performed. Render to all their due; and, particularly, tribute to whom tribute is due. Now, by this answer, [1.]

[1. No offence was given. It was much to the honour of Christ and his doctrine, that he did not interpose as a Judge or a Divider in matters of this more, but left them as a question for the people. This is not of this world; and in this he hath given an example to his ministers, who deal in sacred things, not to meddle with disputes about things secular, not to wade far into controversies relating to them, but to leave that to those whose proper business it is. Ministers, that would mind their busi-and yet not precious. They admire his wisdom, but will not be guided by it, his power, but will not submit to it. They went their way, as persons shamed, and made an inglorious retreat. The stratagem being defeated, they quitted the field. Note, There is nothing got by contending with Christ.

23. The same day came to him the Sadducees, which say that there is no resurrection, and asked him, 24. Saying, Master, Moses said, If a man die, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. 25. Now there were with us seven brethren: and the first, when he had married a wife, deceased, and, having no issue, left his wife unto his brother. 26. Likewise the second also, and the third, unto the seventh. 27. And last of all the woman died also. 28. Therefore in the resurrection whose wife shall she be of the seven? for they all had her. 29. Jesus answered and said unto them, Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. 30. For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels of God in heaven. 31. But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, 32. I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. 33. And when the multitude heard this, they were astonished at his doctrine.

We have here Christ's dispute with the Sadducees concerning the resurrection; it was the same day on which he was attacked by the Pharisees about paying tribute. Satan was now more than ever to ruffle and disturb him; it was an hour of temptation, Rev. 3. 10. The truth as it is in Jesus will still meet with contradiction, in some branch or other of it. Observe here,

I. The opposition which the Sadducees made to a very great truth of religion; they say, There is no resurrection, as there are some fools who say, There is no God. These heretics were called Sadducees, from one Sadoc, a disciple of Antigonus Socheus, who flourished about two hundred and eighty-four years before our Saviour's birth. They lie under heavy censures among the writers of their own nation, as men of base and debauched conversations, which their principles led them to. They were the fewest in number of all the sects among the Jews, but generally persons of some rank. As the Pharisees and Essenes seemed to follow Plato and Pythagoras, so the Sadducees were much of the genius of the Epicureans, they denied the resurrection, they said, There is no future state, no life after this; that, when the body dies, the soul is annihilated, and dies with it; that there is no state of rewards or punishments in the other world; no judgment to come in heaven or hell. They maintained, that, except God, there is no spirit (Acts 23. 8.) nothing but matter and motion. They would not own the divine inspiration of the prophets, nor any revelation from heaven, but what God himself spake upon mount Sinai. Now, the doctrine of Christ carried that great truth, of the resurrection and a future state, much farther than it had yet been revealed, and therefore the Sadducees in a particular manner set themselves against it. The Pharisees and Sadducees were contrary to each other, and yet federates against Christ. Christ’s gospel hath always suffered between superstitions ceremonial hypocrisies and bigotries on the one hand, and profane destines and infidelities on the other. The former abusing, the latter despising the form of godliness, but both denying the flower of it.

II. The objection they made against the truth, which was taken from a supposed case of a woman that had seven husbands successively; now, they take it for granted, that, if there be a resurrection, it must be a return to such a state as this we are now in, and to the same circumstances, like the imaginary Platonic year; and if so, it is an invincible absurdity for this woman in the future state to have seven husbands, or else an insuperable difficulty which of them should have her; he whom she had first, or he whom she had last, or he whom she loved best, or he whom she lived longest with.

1. They suggest the law of Moses in this matter, (v. 24.) that the next of kin should marry the widow of him that died childless; (Deut. 25. 5.) we have therefore (Ruth 4. 5.) It was a political law, founded in the particular constitution of the Jewish commonwealth, to preserve the distinction of families and inheritances, of both which there was special care taken in that government.

2. They put a case upon this statute, which, whether it were a case in fact, or only a moot case, is not at all material; if it had not really occurred, yet possibly it might. It was of seven brothers, who married the same woman, v. 25—27. Now, this case supposes,

(1.) The desolations that death sometimes makes in families when it comes with commission; how it often sweeps away a whole fraternity in a little time; seldom (as the case is put) according to seniority, (the land of darkness is without any order,) but heads upon heads; it diminishes families that had multiplied greatly, Ps. 107. 38, 39. When there were seven brothers grown up to man’s estate, there was a family very likely to be built up; yet this numerous family leaves neither son nor heir, nor any remaining in their dwellings, Job 18. 19. Well may we say then, Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it. Let none be sure of the advancement and perpetuity of their names and posterities, unless they could make a covenant of peace with death, or be at an agreement with the grave.

(2.) The obedience of these seven brothers to the law, though they had a power of refusal under the penalty of a reproach, Deut. 25. 7. Note, Discouraging providences should not keep us from doing our duty; because we must be governed by the rule, not the event. The seventh, who ventured last to marry the widow, as the law says, saith a bold man. I would say, if he did it purely in obedience to God, he was a good man, and one that made conscience of his duty.

But, last of all, the woman died also. Note, Survivorship is but a reprise; they that live long, and bury their relations and neighbours one after another, do thereby acquire an immortality; no, their day will come at last. Death’s bitter cup goes round, and, sooner or later, we must all pledge it in it, Jer. 25. 26.

3. They propose a doubt upon this case; (v. 28.) “In the resurrection, whose wife shall she be of the seven? You cannot tell whose; and therefore we must conclude there is no resurrection.” The Pharisees, who professed to believe a resurrection, had very gross and carnal notions concerning it, and concurring the future state; expecting to find there, as the Turks in their paradise, the delights and pleasures of the animal life, which perhaps drove the Sadducees to deny the thing itself; for nothing gives greater advantage to atheism and infidelity, than the carnality of those that make religion, either in its professions or in its prospects, a servant to their sensual appetites and secular interests; while those that are erroneous deny the truth, those that are right are not satisfied with it. Now they, in this objection, went upon the Pharisees’ hypothesis. Note, It is not strange that carnal minds have very false notions of spiritual and eternal things. The natural man receiveth not these things, for they are foolishness to him, 1 Cor. 2. 14. Let truth be set in a clear light, and then it appears in its full strength.

III. Christ’s answer to this objection; by reproving their ignorance, and rectifying their mistake, he shows the objection to be fallacious and unconvincing.

1. He reproves their ignorance; (v. 28.) Ye do err. Note, Those do greatly err, in the judgment of Christ, who deny the resurrection and a future state. Here Christ reproves with the meekness of wisdom, and is not so sharp upon them (whatever was the reason) as sometimes he was upon the chief of his accusers; Luke 23. 34. Note, Ignorance is the cause of error; those that are in the dark, miss their way. The patrons of error do, therefore, resist the light, and do what they can to take away the key of knowledge; Ye do err in this matter, not knowing. Note, Ignorance is the cause of error about the resurrection and the future state. What it is in its particular instances, the wisest and best know not; it doth not yet appear what we shall be, it is a mystery that is to be revealed; when we speak of the state of separate souls, the resurrection of the body, and of eternal happiness and misery, we are soon at a loss; we cannot order our speech, by reason of darkness, but that it is, is a thing about which we are not left in the dark; blessed be God, We are not; and those who deny it, are guilty of a willing and affected ignorance. It seems there were some Sadducees, some such monsters, among professing Christians, some among you, that say, There is no resurrection of the dead; 1 Cor. 15. 12.) and some that did in effect deny it, by turning it into an allegory, saying, The resurrection is past already. Now observe,

(1.) They know not the power of God; which would lead men to infer, that there may be a resurrection and a future state. Those who believe, disbelieve, or weak belief, of God’s power, is at the bottom of many errors, particularly their’s who deny the resurrection. When we are told of the soul’s existence and agency in a state of separation from the body, and especially that a dead body, which has lain many ages in the grave, and is turned into common and undistinguished dust, that this shall be raised the same body that it was, and made perfect, how can they, How can these be? Nature allows it for a maxim, Abrege ad habitudinem non clatur regresse—The habits attaching to a state of existence vanish irrecoverably with the state itself. If a man die, shall he live again? And vain men, because they cannot comprehend the way of it, question the truth of it; whereas, if we firmly believe in God the Father Almighty, that nothing is impossible with him, we do not so much as vainly. This, therefore, we must fasten upon, in the first place, that God is omnipotent, and can do what he will; and then no room is left for doubting but that he will do what he has promised; and if so, why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead? Acts 26. 8. His power far exceeds the power of nature.

(2.) They know not the scriptures, which de-cededly affirm that there shall be a resurrection and a future state. The power of God, determined and engaged by his promise, is the foundation for faith to build upon. Now, the scriptures speak plainly, that the soul is immortal, and there is another life after this; it is the scope both of the law and of the prophets, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, and a judgment of the just and the unjust, Acts 24. 14, 15. Job knew it, (Job 19. 26.) Ezekiel foresees it, (Ezek. 37.) and Daniel plainly foretold it, Dan. 12. 2. Christ rose again according to the scriptures; (1 Cor. 15. 3.) and so shall we. Those, therefore, who deny it, either have not conversed with the scriptures, or do not believe them, or do not take the true sense and meaning of them. Note, Ignorance of the scripture is the rise of abundance of mischief.

2. He rectifies his mistake, and (v. 30.) corrects those gross ideas which they had of the resurrection and a future state, and fixes these doctrines upon a true and lasting basis. Concerning that state, observe,

(1.) It is not like the state we are now in upon earth; They neither marry, nor are given in marriage, through the fear of death, (v. 2.) because it was instituted in innocency; whatever intermission or neglect there has been of other institutions, this was never laid aside, nor will be to the end of time. In the old world, they were marrying, and giving in marriage; the Jews in Babylon, when cut off from other ordinances, yet were bid to take them wives, Jer. 29. 6. All civilized nations have had a sense of the obligation of the marriage. The man and woman, and it is requisite for the gratifying of the desires, and recruiting the deficiencies, of the human nature. But, in the resurrection, there is no occasion for marriage; whether in glorified bodies there will be any distinction of sexes some too curiously dispute; (the ancients are divided in their opinions about it;) but whether there will be a distinction or no, it is certain that there will be no conjunction; where God will be all in all, there needs no other meeting; the body will be spiritual, and there will be in it no carnal desires to be gratified: when the mystical body is completed, there will be no further occasion to seek a godly seed, which was one end of the institution of marriage, Mal. 2. 15. In heaven there will be no decree of the individuals, and therefore no eating and drinking; no decree of the species, and therefore no marrying; where there shall be no more births, (Rev. 21. 4.) there needs be no other meeting. The married state is a composition of joys and cares; those that enter upon it, are taught to look upon it as subject to changes, richer and poorer, sickness and health; and therefore it is fit for this mixed, changing world; but, as in hell, where there is no joy, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride shall be heard no more at all, so in heaven, where there is all joy, and no care, or pain, or trouble, or trouble, or care, (Rev. 21. 4.) there needs be no other meeting. The state of death, death shall be swallowed up in victory, 1 Cor. 15. 54. The marriage of the Lamb, Rev. 19. 7, will be no other meeting. The body will be spiritual, and arise from the marriage of all of them to the Lamb, not of any of them to one another.

2. It is like the state angels are now in, in heaven; They are as the angels of God in heaven; they are so, that is, undoubtedly they shall be so. They are so already in Christ their Head, who has made them to dwell in holy places, Eph. 2. 6. The spirits of just men already glorified are in the same company with the innumerable company of angels, Heb. 12. 22, 23. Man, in his creation, was made a little lower than the angels; (Ps. 8. 5.) but, in his complete redemption and renovation, will be as the angels; pure and spiritual as the angels, knowing and loving as those blessed seraphim, ever praising God like them and with them. The bodies of the saints shall be raised incorruptible and glorious, like the uncompoundvehicles of those pure and holy spirits, (1 Cor. 15. 42, 82.) swift and strong like them. We should therefore desire and eudoe vour to do will the power of God now as the angels do it in heaven, because we hope shortly to be like the angels, who always beheld our Father's face. He saith nothing of the resurrection; but, by consequence, they shall be like the devils, whose lusts they have done.

IV. Christ's argument to confirm this great truth of the resurrection and a future state; the matters being of great concern. he did not think it enough (as in some other disputes) to discover the fallacy and sophistry of the objections, but backed the truth with a solid argument; for Christ brings forth judgmen to truth; this is proved by what he has said, and enables his followers to give a reason of the hope that is in them. Now observe,

1. Whence he fetched his argument—from the scriptures; that is the great magazine, or armory, whence we may be furnished with spiritual weapons, offensive and defensive. It is written, is Goliath's sword. Have ye not read that which was spoken to you by God? Note, (1.) What the scripture speaks, God speaks. (2.) What was spoken to Moses, was spoken to us; it was spoken and written for our learning. (3.) It concerns us to read and hear what God hath spoken, because it is spoken to us. It was spoken to you Jews, in the first place, for to them were committed the oracles of God. The argument is fetched from the books of Moses, because the Sadducees received them only, as some think, however, them chiefly, for canonical scripture; for Christ therefore fetched his proof from the most indisputable fountain. The latter prophets have more express proofs of a future state than the law of Moses has; for, though the law of Moses supposes the immortality of the soul and a future state, as principles of what is called natural religion, yet no express revelation of it is made by the law of Moses; because so much of that law was peculiar to that people, and was therefore guarded, as municipal laws used to be, with temporal promises and threatenings, and the more express revelation of a future state was reserved for the latter days; but our Saviour finds a very solid argument for the resurrection, even in the writings of Moses. Much scripture-treasure lies under ground, that must be digged for.

2. What his argument was; (v. 32.) I am the God of Abraham. This was not an express proof, totidem verbis—in so many words; and yet it was really a conclusive argument. Consequences from scripture, if rightly deduced, must be received as scripture; for it was written for those that have the use of reason.

Now the drift of the argument is to prove,

(1.) That there is a future state, another life after this, in which the righteous shall be truly and completely happy, as he has proved it from what God said; I am the God of Abraham.

(2.) For God to be any one's God, supposes some very extraordinary privilege and happiness; unless we know fully what God is, we could not comprehend the riches of that word, I will be to thee a God, that is, a Benefactor like myself. The God of Israel is a God to Israel, (1 Chron. 17. 24.) a spiritual Benefactor; for he is the Father of Faith, and brought them to liberty, and gave them the land that is to be an all-sufficient Benefactor, a God that is enough, a complete Good, and an eternal Benefactor; for he is himself an everlasting God, and will be to those that are in covenant with him an everlasting Good. This great word God had often said to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and it was intended as a recompense for their singular faith and obedience, in quieting their country at God's call. The Jews had a for themselves. But the multitude were astonished at his doctrine, v. 33. 1. Because it was new to them. See to what a sad pass the exposition of scripture was come among them, when people were astonished at it as a miracle, to hear the fundamental propositions of this great truth; they had never Scribes, or this had been no news to them. 2. Because it had something in it very good and great. Truth often shews the brighter, and is the more admired, for its being opposed. Observe, Many gain-sayers are silenced, and many hearers astonished, without being savorily converted; yet, even in the silence and astonishment of unsanctified souls, God not only gives his word, magnifies his gospel, and makes both honorable.

34. But when the Pharisees had heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence, they were gathered together. 35. Then one of them, which was a lawyer, asked him a question, tempting him, and saying, 36. Master, which is the great commandment in the law? 37. Jesus said unto him. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. 38. This is the first and great commandment. 39. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. 40. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

Here is a discourse which Christ had with a Pharisee lawyer, about the great commandment of the law. Observe,

I. The combination of the Pharisees against Christ, v. 34. They heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence, had stopped their mouths, though their understandings were not opened; and they were gathered together, not to return him the thanks of their party, as they ought to have done, for his effectual asserting and confirming of the truth against the Sadducees, the common enemies of their religion, but to tempt him, in hopes to get the reputation of puzzling him who had puzzled the Sadducees. Now they were all Pharisees. But Christ was honoured, than pleased that the Sadducees were silenced: being more concerned for their own tyranny and traditions, which Christ opposed, than for the doctrine of the resurrection and a future state, which the Sadducees opposed. Note, It is an instance of Pharisaical envy and malice, to be displeased at the maintaining of a confessed truth, when it is done by those we do not like; to sacrifice a public good to private piques and prejudices. Blessed Paul was otherwise minded, Phil. 1. 18.

II. The lawyer's question, which he put to Christ The lawyers were students in, and teachers of, the law of Moses, as the Scribes were; but some think that in this they differed, that they dealt more in practical questions than the Scribes; they studied and reckoned comic. This lawyer asked him a question, tempting him: not with any design to insnare him, as appears by St. Mark's relation of the story, where we find that this was he to whom Christ said, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God, Mark 12. 34, but only to see what he would say, and to draw on discourse with him, to satisfy his own and his friends' curiosity.

1. The question was, Master, which is the great commandment of the law? A needless question, when all the things of God's law are great things, (Hos. 8. 12.) and the wisdom from above is without partiality, partiality in the law, (Mal. 2. 9.) and hath respect to all men. Yet, it is true, there are some commands that are the principles of the oracles of God, more extensive and inclusive than others. Our Saviour speaks of the weightier matters of the law, ch. 23.

2. The design was to try him, or tempt him; to try, not so much his knowledge as his judgment. It was a question disputed among the critics in the law. Some would have the law of circumcision to be the commandment, others the law of the sabbath, others the law of sacrifices, according as they severally stood affected, and spent their zeal; now they would try what Christ said to this question, hoping to incense the people against him, if he should not answer according to the vulgar opinion; and if he should magnify one commandment, they would reflect on him as vilifying the rest. The question was harmless enough, and it appears, by a short letter and swift reply, and if that be the sub- point among the lawyers, that the law of God and our neighbour is the great commandment, and the sum of all the rest, and Christ had there approved it; so that the putting of it to him, here, seems rather a scornful design to catechise him as a child, than a pitiful design to dispute with him as an adversary.

It was the Christ's answer to this question. It is well for us that such a question was asked him, that we might have his answer. It is no dispensation to great men to answer plain questions. Now, Christ recommends to us those as the great commandments, not which are so exclusive of others, but which are therefore great, because inclusive of others. Observe,

1. Which these great commandments are; (v. 57-59) not the judicial laws, those could not be the greatest, now that the people of the Jews, to whom they pertained, were so little; not the ceremonial laws, those could not be the greatest, now that they were waxen old, and were ready to vanish away; nor any particular moral precept; but the love of God and our neighbour, which are the spring and foundation of all the rest, which (these being supposed) will follow of course.

(1.) All the law is fulfilled in one word, and that is, love. See Rom. 13. 10. All obedience begins in the affections, and nothing in religion is done right, that is not done there first. Love is the leading affection, which gives law, and gives ground, to the rest; and therefore that, as the main fort, is to be first secured and garrisoned for God. Man is a creature cut out for love; thus therefore is the law written in the heart, that it is a law of love. Love is the soul of the law, and fulness of the law, surely the yoke of the command is very easy. Love is the rest and satisfaction of the soul; if we walk in this good old way, we shall find rest.

(2.) The love of God is the first and great commandment of all, and the summary of all the commandments of the first table. The proper act of love being complacency, good is the proper object of it. Now God is every way good; therefore, finally, and essentially, is to be loved in the first place, and nothing loved beside him, but what is loved for him. Love is the first and great thing that God demands from us, and therefore the first and great thing that we should devote to him.

Now here we are directed,

[1.] To love God as our's; Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. The first commandment is, Thou shalt have no other gods; which implies, that we must have him for our God, and that will engage our love to him. Those that made the sun and moon their gods, loved them, Jer. 8. 2. Judges 18. 24. To love God as our's, is to love him because he is our's, our Creator, Owner, and Ruler, and to conduct ourselves to him as our's, with obedience to him, and dependence on him. We must love God as reconciled to us, and made our's by covenant; that is the foundation of this, Thy God.

[2.] To love him with all our heart, and soul, and mind. Some make this to signify one and the same thing, to love him with all our powers; others distinguish them; the heart, soul, and mind, are the will, affections, and understanding; the will and affections may run independently, and therefore have their own rules, and their own objects and actions, without the direction, or power of the understanding. Our love of God must be a sincere love, and not in word and tongue only, as their's is, who say they love him, but their hearts are not with him. It must be a strong love, we must love him in the most intense degree; as we must praise him, with all that is within us, Ps. 103. 1. It must be a singular and superlative love, we must love him more than any thing else; in this way the streams of our affections must entirely run. The heart must be united to love God, in opposition to a divided heart. All our love is too little to bestow upon him, and therefore all the powers of the soul must be engaged for him, and carried out toward him. This is the first and great commandment; for obedience to this is the spring of obedience to all the rest; which is then only acceptable, when it flows from these passions.

[3.] To love our neighbour as ourselves is the second great commandment; (v. 39.) It is like unto that first; it is inclusive of all the precepts of the second table, as that is of the first. It is like it, for it is founded upon it, and flows from it; and a right love to our brother, whom we have seen, is both an instance and an evidence of our love to God, whom we have not seen, 1 John 4. 20.

[1.] It is implied, that we do, and should, love ourselves. There is a self-love which is corrupt, and the root of the greatest sins, and it must be put off and mortified: but there is a self-love which is natural, and the rule of the greatest duty, and it must be preserved and sanctified. We must love ourselves, that is, we must have a due regard to the dignity of our own natures, and a due concern for the welfare of our own souls and bodies.

[3.] It is prescribed, that we love our neighbour as our-selves. We must honour and esteem all men, and must wrong and injure none; must have a good will to all, and good wishes for all, and, as we have opportunity, must do good to all. We must love our neighbour as ourselves, as truly and sincerely as we love ourselves, and in the same instances; nay, in many cases we must deny ourselves for the good of our neighbour, and must make ourselves servants to the true welfare of others, and be willing to spend and be spent for them, to lay down our lives for the brethren.

2. Observe what the weight and greatness of these commandments is; (v. 40.) On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets; that is, This is the sum and substance of all those precepts relating to practical religion, which were written in men's hearts by nature, revived by Moses, and backed and enforced by the preaching of the prophets. They are the foundation, and hang upon the law of love; take away this, and all falls to the ground, and comes to nothing. Rituals and ceremonial do no way to these, as must all spiritual gifts, for love is the more excellent way. This is the spirit of the law, which animates it, the cement of the law, which joins it; it is the root and spring of all other duties, the compendium of the whole Bible, not only of the law and the prophets, but of the gospel, too, only make the love to be the fruit of faith, and that we love God in Christ, and our neighbour for his sake. All hangs on these two commandments, as the effect doth both on its efficient and on its final cause; for the fulfilling of the law is love, (Rom. 13. 10.) and the end of the law is love, 1 Tim. 1. 5. The law of love is the nail, is the nail in the sure place, fastened by the masters of assemblies, (Excl. 12. 11.) on which is hung all the glory of the law and the prophets, (Heb. 11. 1.) and which stands on this nail all the glory of the new Jerusalem shall eternally hang. Love never faileth. Into these two great commandments therefore let our hearts be delivered as into a mould; in the defence and evidence of these let us spend our zeal, and not in notions, names, and striking of words, as if those were the mighty things on which the law and the prophets hang, and to them the love of God and our neighbour must be sacrificed; but to the commanding power of these let every thing else be made to bow.

41. While the Pharisees were gathered together, Jesus asked them. 42. Saying, What think ye of Christ? Whose son is he? They say unto him, The son of David. 43. He saith unto them, How then doth David in spirit call him Lord, saying, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool? 45. If David then call him Lord, how is he his son? 46. And no man was able to answer him a word, neither durst any man from that day forth ask him any more questions.

Many questions the Pharisees had asked Christ, oy which, though they thought to pose him, they did but expose themselves; but now let him ask them a question; and he will do it when they are gathered together, v. 41. He did not take some one of them apart from the rest, (as Hercules contra duos—Hercules himself may be overmatched,) but, to shame them the more, he took them all together, when they were in conference and consultation against him, and yet puzzled them. Note, God delighteth to baffle his enemies when they most strengthen themselves; he gives them all the advantages they can wish for, and yet conquers them. Associate yourselves, and you shall be broken in pieces, Isa. 5. 9, 10. Now here,

1. Christ proposes a question to them, which they could easily answer; it was a question in their own catechism; "What think ye of Christ? Whose son is he? Whose son do you expect the Messiah to be, who was promised to the fathers?" This they could easily answer, The son of David. It was the common personification of the Messiah; they called him the son of David. So the Scribes, who expounded the scripture, had taught them, from Ps. 89. 33, 36. I will not be unto David; his seed shall endure for ever, (Isa. 9. 7.) upon the throne of David. And Isa. 11. 1. A rod out of the stem of Jesse. The covenant of royalty made with David was a figure of the covenant of redemption made with Christ, who, and of whom, in the same line, his kingdom and will be humbled and then advanced. If Christ was the son of David, he was really and truly man. Israel said, We have ten parts in David; and Judah said, He is our bone and our flesh; what part have we then in the Son of David, who took our nature upon him? What think ye of Christ? They had put questions to him, one after another, out of the law; but he consented not to the question put to him. Many are so full of the law, that they forget Christ, as if their duties would save them without his merit and grace. It concerns each of us seriously to ask ourselves, What think we of Christ? Some think not of him at all, he is not in all, not in any of their thoughts; some think meanly, and some think hardly, of him; but, to them that believe he is precious; and he is precious then are the thoughts of him. While the daughters of Jerusalem think no more of Christ than of another beloved, the spouse thinks of him as the bride of ten thousands.

11. He then brings difficult question to their answer, which they could not so easily solve, v. 43—45. Many can so readily affirm the truth, that they think they have knowledge enough to be proud of, who, when they are called to confirm the truth, and to vindicate and defend it, show they have ignorance enough to be ashamed of. The objection Christ raised was, Is Christ the David's son, how then doth David, in spirit, call him Lord? This was not hereby design to insnare them, as they did him, but to instance in a truth they were loath to believe—that the expected Messiah is God.

1. It is easy to see that David calls Christ Lord, and this in spirit, being divinely inspired, and actuated therein by a spirit of prophecy: for it was the Spirit of the Lord that spake by him, 2 Sam. 23. 1, 2. It is impossible of those holy men that spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, especially in calling Christ Lord; for it was then, as it is still, (1 Cor. 12. 3.) that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. Now, to prove that David, in spirit, called Christ Lord, he quotes Ps. 110. 1, which psalm the Scribes themselves understood of Christ; of which it is certain, the prophet there speaks of him, and of no other man; and it is a prophetic summary of the doctrine of Christ. It describes him, executing the offices of a Prophet, Priest, and King, both in his humiliation and also in his exaltation. Christ quotes the whole verse, which shews the Redeemer in his exaltation; (1.) Siting at the right hand of God. His siting denotes both rest and rule; his siting at God's right hand denotes superlative honour and sovereign power. See in what great power it expresses this. (Heb. 1.) He is set at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty. See Phil. 2. 9. Eph. 1. 21. He did not take this honour to himself, but was entitled to it by covenant with his Father, and invested in it by commission from him, and here is that commission. (2.) Sustaining his enemies. There he shall sit, till they be all made either his friends or his footstool. The carnal mind, is enmity to Christ; and that is subdued in the conversation of the government of the world's glory, called to his foot, (as the expression is, Isa. 41. 2.) and in the commission of his omnipotent adversaries, who shall be brought under his foot, as the kings of Canaan were under the feet of Joshua.

But that which this verse is quoted for, is, that David calls the Messiah his Lord; The Lord, Jehovah, said unto my Lord. This intimates to us, that, in expounding scripture, we must take notice of, and improve, not only that which is the main scope and sense of a verse, but of the words and phrases, by which the Spirit chooseth to express that sense, which have often a very useful and instructive significance. Here is a good note from that word, My Lord.

2. It is not so easy for those who believe not the Godhead of the Messiah, to clear this from an absurdity, that he must be David's son. It is incongruous for the father to speak of his own son, as his Lord. If David call him Lord, that is laid down, (v. 45.) as the magis notum— the more evident truth; for whatever is said of Christ's humanity, and humiliation, must be construed and understood in consistency with the truth of his divine nature and dominion. We must hold this fast, that David is Christ's Lord, and by that explain his being David's Lord. The seeming differences of scripture, as here, may not only be accommodated, but contribute to the beauty and harmony of the whole.

Anicex scripturarum hies, utinam et nostrae—The differences observable in the scriptures are a friendly kind; would to God that our differences were of the same kind!
III. We have here the success of this gentle trial which Christ made of the Pharisees' knowledge, in two things.
1. It puzzled them; (v. 46.) No man was able to answer him a word. Either it was their ignorance that they did not know, or their impurity that they would not own, the Messiah to be God, which truth was the only key to unlock this difficulty. What those Rabines could not then answer, blessed be God, the plainest Christian, that is led into the understanding of the gospel of Christ, can now account for; that Christ, as God, was David's Lord; and Christ, as man, was David's son. This he did not now himself explain, but reserved it till the proof of it was completed by his resurrection; but we have it expressly declared by him in his glory: (Rev. 22. 16.) I am the root and offspring of David. Christ, as God, was David's root; Christ, as man, was David's offspring.

If we hold not fast this truth, that Jesus Christ is ever all God blessed for ever, we run ourselves into inextricable difficulties. And well might David, his remote ancestor, call him Lord, when Mary, his immediate mother, after she had conceived him, called him, Lord and God, her Saviour, Luke 1. 37.

2. It silenced them, and all others that sought occasion against him: Neither durst any man, from that day forth, ask him any more such captious, tempting, insinuating questions. Note, God will glorify himself in the silencing of many whom he will not glorify himself in the salvation of. Many are convinced, that are not converted, by the word. Had these been converted, they would have asked him more questions, especially that great question, What must we do to be saved? But, since they could not gain their point, they would have no more to do with him. But thus all that strive with their Master shall be convinced, as these Pharisees and lawyers were here of, the inequality of the match.

CHAP. XXIII.

In the foregoing chapter, we had our Saviour's discourses with the Scribes and Pharisees; here we have his discourse concerning them, or rather against them. 1. He allows their office, v. 2, 3. 2. He warns his disciples not to imitate their hypocrisy and pride, v. 4. 12. 3. He exhibits a charge against them for their谬论 and wicked methods, corrupting the law, opposing the gospel, and treacherous dealing both with God and man; and to each article he pronounces a woe, v. 13. 34. 14. He passes sentence upon Jerusalem, and foretells the ruin of the city and temple, especially for the sin of persecution, v. 34., 39.

1. THEN spake Jesus to the multitude, and to his disciples, 2. Saying, The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: 3. All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not. 4. For they bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders: but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers. 5. But all their works they do for to be seen of men: they make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments. 6. And love the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues. 7. And greetings in the market, and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi. 8. But he not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren. 9. And call no man your father upon the earth: for one is your Father, which is in heaven. 10. Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even Christ. 11. But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant. 12. And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted.

We find not Christ, in all his preaching, so severe upon any sort of people as upon these Scribes and Pharisees; for the truth is, nothing is more directly opposite to the spirit of the gospel than the former and practice of that generation of men, who were made up of pride, worldliness, and tyranny, under a cloak and pretence of religion; yet these were the idols and darlings of the people, who thought, if but two men went to heaven, one would be a Pharisee. Now Christ directs his discourse, here, to the multitude, and to his disciples, (v. 1.) to rectify their mistakes concerning these Scribes and Pharisees, by pointing them out in the true character, and so to take off the prejudice which some of the multitude had conceived against Christ and his doctrine, because it was opposed by those men of their church that called themselves the people's guides. Note, It is good to know the true characters of men, that we may not be imposed upon by great and mighty names, titles, and pretensions to power. People must be told of the wolves, (Acts 26. 20, 26.) the dragon, (Phil. 3. 2.) and when it is so, the men of God will not suffer the wicked, and the workers of iniquity, and the enemies of all the saints, to be committed to the workmen of darkness, (2 Corinthians 11. 13.) that they may know where to stand upon their guards. And not only the mixed multitude, but even the disciples, need these cautions; for good men are apt to have their eyes dazzled with worldly pomp.

Now, in this discourse, 1. Christ allows their office as expositors of the law; The Scribes and Pharisees, (that is, the whole Sanhedrin, who sat at the feet of Moses, and were the representation of the nation, who were all called Scribes, and were some of them Pharisees,) they sit in Moses' seat, (v. 2.) as public teachers and interpreters of the law; and, the law of Moses being the municipal law of their state, they were as judges, or a bench of justices; teaching and judging seem to be equivalent, comparing 2 Chron. 17. 7, 9, with 2 Chron. 19. 5, 6, 8. They were not the itinerant judges, that rode the circuit, but the standing bench, that determined suits, and corrected the errors of many, by the law; they sat in Moses' seat, not as he was mediator between God and Israel, but only as he was chief justice, Exod. 18. 26. Or, we may apply it, not to the Sanhedrin, but to the other Pharisees and Scribes that expounded the law, and taught the people how to apply it to particular cases. The justice of God, such as was made for Ezra, that readily wrote in the law of God. (Neh. 8. 4.) Here called Moses' seat; because Moses had those in every city, (so the expression is, Acts 15. 21.) who, in those pulpits, preached him; this was their office, and it was just and honourable; it was requisite that there should be some at whose mouth the people might inquire the law, Mal. 2. 7. Note, 1. Many a good place is filled with bad men; it is no new thing for the vilest of men to be exalted even to Moses' seat; (Ps. 12. 8.) and when it is so, the men of God are to much honoured by the seat as the seat is dishonoured by the men. Now they that sat in Moses' seat were so wretchedly degenerated, that it was time for the great Prophet to arise, like unto Moses, to erect another seat. 2. Good and useful offices and powers are not therefore to be condemned and abolished, because they fall sometimes into the hands of bad men, who abuse them. We must not therefore pull down Moses' seat, because Scribes and Pharisees have got possession of it; rather than so, let them grow together until the harvest, ch. 13. 30.

Hence he infers, (v. 3.) "Whatever they did you observe, that observe and do. As far as they sit in Moses' seat, that is, read and preach the law that was given by Moses," (which, as yet, continued in full force, power, and virtue,) "and judge according to that law, so far you must hearken to them, as rememberers to you of the doctrines of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." Pharsile made it their business to study the scripture, and were well acquainted with the language, history, and customs, of it, and its style and phraseology. Now Christ would have the people to make use of the helps they gave them for the understanding of the scripture, and do accordingly. As long as their comments did illustrate the text, and not pervert it; did make plain, and not make worse the things said and done in the scripture; or mislead, this, to prevent the evil which some would be apt to make at his following discourse; as if, by condemning the Scribes and Pharsiles, he designed to bring the law of Moses into contempt, and to draw people off from it; whereas he came not to destroy, but to fulfil. Note, It is wisdom to obviate the exceptions which may be taken at just reproofs, especially when there is occasion to distinguish between officers and their offices, that the ministry be not blamed, when the ministers are.

II. He condemns the man. He had ordered the multitude to do as they taught; but, here, he annexed a caution not to do as they did, to beware of their leaven; Do not ye after their works. Their traditions were their works, were their idols, the works of their fancy. Or, "Do not according to their example." Doctrines and practices are spirits that must be tried, and, where there is occasion, must be carefully separated and distinguished: and, as we must not swallow corrupt doctrines for the sake of any laudable practices of those that teach them, so we must not imitate any bad examples for the sake of the plausible doctrines of those that give them. The Scribes and Pharsiles boasted as much of the law, as the Pharisees did of the pharisaical system of their teaching, and hoped to be justified by them; it was the plea they put in; (Luke 18. 11, 12.) and yet these things, which they valued themselves so much upon, were an abomination in the sight of God.

Our Saviour here, and in the following verses, specifies divers particulars of their works, wherein we must not imitate them. In general, they were charged with hypocrisy, dissimulation, or double dealing, in religion; a crime which cannot be inquired of at men's bar, because we can only judge according to outward appearance; but God, who searcheth the heart, can convict of hypocrisy; and nothing is more displeasing to him, for he desireth truth.

Four things are in these verses charged upon them.

1. Their saying and doing were two things.

Their practice was no way agreeable to their preaching or to their profession; for they say, and do not; they teach out of the law that which is good, but their conversation gives them the lie; and they seem to have found another way to heaven for themselves than what they shew to others. See this illustrated and charged upon them, Rom. 2. 17-24. Those are all sinners most incurable, that allow themselves in the sins they condemn in others, or in worse. This doth especially touch wicked ministers, who will be sure to have their portion appointed them with hypocrites; (ch. 24. 51.) for what greater hypocrisy can there be, than to press that upon others, to be believed and done, which they themselves disbelieve and disobey; pulling down, in their practice, what they build up in their preaching; when in the pulpit, preaching scripture, they made it their business to hold up all the precepts of the law, but, when out of the pulpit, living so ill, that it is pity they should ever come in; like bells, that call others to church, but hang out of it themselves; or mercurial posts, that point the way to others, but stand still themselves. Such will be judged out of their own mouths.

It is applicable to all others that say, and do not; that make a profession of religion, but not live up to that profession; that make fair promises, but do not perform their promises; are full of good discourse, and can lay down the law to all about them, but are empty of good works; great talkers, but little doers; the voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. "Or, et preterea nihil—mere sound. They speak fair, I go, sir; but there is no trusting them, for there are seven abominations in their heart.

2. They were very severe in imposing upon others those things which they were not themselves willing to submit to the burthen of; (v. 4.) They bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne; but only insisting upon the minute circumstances of the law, which is called a voice, (Acts 15. 10.) and pressing the observation of them with more strictness and severity than themselves did, (whereas the meaning of the lawyers is, "Apices juris non sunt juris—Mere points of law are not law," but by adding to his words, and imposing their own inventions and traditions, under the highest penalties. They loved to shew their authority and to exercise their dominant faculty, lording it over God's heritage, and saying to men's souls, "Bene down, that we may go over;" witness their many additions to the law of the fourth commandment, by which they made the sabbath a burthen on men's shoulders, which was designed to be the joy of their hearts. Thus, with force and cruelty, did those shepherds rule the flock, as of old, Ezek. 34. 4.

But see their hypocrisy: They themselves will not move them with one of their fingers. (1.) They would not exercise themselves in these things which they imposed upon others; they would not be binders of men's consciences, and yet would force their people to a strictness in religion, which they themselves would not be bound by; but secretly transgressed their own traditions, which they publicly enforced. They indulged their pride in giving law to others; but consulted their ease in their own practice. Thus it has been said, to the reproach of the popish priests, that they fast with wine and sweetnesses, while they force the people to fast with bread and water; and decline the penances they enjoined the laity. (2.) They would not ease the people in these things, nor put a finger to lighten their burden, when they saw it pinched them. They could find out loose constructions to put upon God's law, and could dispense with that, but would not bate an ace of their own impositions, nor dispense with a failure in the least punctilio, or make any change to relieve the extremity of their common law. How contrary to this was the practice of Christ's apostles, who would allow to others that use of Christian liberty, which, for the peace and edification of the church, they would deny themselves in! They would lay no other burden than necessary things, and those easy, Acts 15. 28. How carefully did Paul spare those to whom he writes! 1 Cor. 7. 28. 12.

3. They were all for show, and nothing for substance, in religion; (v. 5.) All their works they do to be seen of men. We must do such works, that they who see them may glorify God: but we must not proclaim our good works, with design that others may see them, and glorify us; which our Saviour here chargeth upon the Pharisees in general, as he had before done in the particular instances of prayer and giving of alms. All their end was to be praised of men, and therefore all their endeavours were to be seen of men, to make a fair show in the flesh. In those duties of religion which fall under the eye of men, none were so constant and abundant as they; but in what lies between God and their souls, in the retirement of their closets, and the recesses of their hearts, they desire to be excused. The form of godliness will get them a name to live, which is all they aim at, and therefore they trouble not themselves with the power of it, which is essential to the thing. He that doth all to be seen, doth nothing to the purpose.

He specifies two things which they did, to be seen of men.

(1.) They made broad their phylacteries. Those were little scrols of paper or parchment, wherein were written, with great niceness, these four paragraphs of the law, Exod. 13. 2—11. Exod. 13. 11—16. Deut. 6. 4—9. Deut. 11. 13—21. These were worn about their heads, and pinned upon their foreheads and left arms. It was a tradition of the elders, which had reference to Exod. 13. 9. and Prov. 7. 3. where the expressions seem to be figurative, intimating no more than that we should hear the things of God in our minds as carefully as if we had them bound between our eyes. Now the Pharisees made broad these phylacteries, that they might be thought more holy, and strict, and zealous, for the law, than others. It is a grand ambition, to come to be really more holy than others, but it is a proud ambition to covet to appear so. It is good to excel in real piety, but not to exceed in outward shows; for overdoing is justly suspected of design, Prov. 27. 14. It is the guise of hypocrisy, to make more ado than needs in external services, more than is needful either to prove, or to improve, the good affection of the heart. It is the very fancy of the Jews.

(2.) They enlarged the borders of their garments. God appointed the Jews to make borders, or fringes, upon their garments, (Numb. 15. 38.) to distinguish them from other nations, and to be a memorandum to them of their being a peculiar people; but the Pharisees were not content to have these borders like other people's, which might serve God's design in appointing them; but they must be larger than others, and more abundant, and work upon their fringes of making themselves to be taken notice of; it seemed they were more religious than others. But those who thus enlarge their phylacteries, and the borders of their garments, while their hearts are straitened, and destitute of the love of God and their neighbour, though they may now deceive others, will in the end deceive themselves.

4. They much affected pre-eminence and superiority, and prided themselves extraneously. In pride was the darling reigning sin of the Pharisees, the sin that did most easily beset them, and which our Lord Jesus takes all occasions to witness against.

(1.) He describes their pride, v. 6, 7. They courted and coveted, [1.] Places of honour and respect. In all public appearances, as at feasts, and in the synagogues, they expected, and had, to their hearts' delight, the uppermost seats. They took the place of all others, and precedence was awarded to them, as persons of the greatest note and merit; and it is easy to imagine what a complacency they took in it; they loved to have the pre-eminence, 3 John 9. It is not possessing the uppermost rooms, nor sitting in the chief seats, that is condemned, (somebody must sit uppermost,) but loving them; for men to value such a little piece of sitting highest, going first, taking the wall, or the better hand, and to value themselves upon it, to seek it, and to feel resentment if they have it not; is that but making an idol of ourselves, and then falling down and worshipping it,—the worst kind of idolatry! It is had anywhere, but especially in the synagogues. There to seat themselves, to turn up where we appear in order to give glory to God, and to humble ourselves before him, is indeed to mock God, instead of serving him. David would willingly lie at the threshold in God's house; so far was he from coveting the chief seat there, Ps. 84. 10. It savours much of pride and hypocrisy, when people do not care for going to church, unless they can look fine, and make a figure there.

[2.] Titles of honour and respect. They loved greetings in the markets, loved to have people put off their hats to them, and shew them respect when they met them in the streets. Oh how it pleased them, and fed their vain humour, digito monstrare, et dicere, He est—to be jointed out, and to have it said, This is he, to have way made for them in the crowd of market-people; "Stand off, here is a Pharisee coming!" and to be thus complimented with the title of Rabbi, Master! This did not end in meat, and drink, and dainties to them; and they took as great a satisfaction in it as Nebuchadnezzar did in his palace, when he said, Is not this great Babylon that I have built? The greetings would not have done them half so much good, if they had not been in the markets, where every body might see how much they were respected, and how high they stood in the opinion of the people. It was but a small matter, before Christ's time, that the Jewish teachers, the masters of Israel, had assumed the titles of Rabbi, Rab, and Rabban, which signifies great, or much; and was construed as Doctor, or My lord.

And they laid such a stress upon it, that they gave it for a maxim, that "he who salutes his teacher, and does not call him Rabbi, provokes the Divine Majesty to depart from Israel." So much religion did they place in that which was but a piece of good manners, and gave a title to the teacher, that they would give respect to him that teaches, is commendable enough in him that gives it; but for him that teaches, to love it, and demand it, and affect it, to be puffed up with it, and to be displeased if it be omitted, is sinful and abominable; and, instead of teaching, he has need to learn the first lesson in the school of Christ, which is, Humility.

(2.) He cautions his disciples against being herein like them; wherein they must not do after their works; "But be not ye called so, for ye shall not be of such a spirit," v. 8, &c.

Here is, [1.] A prohibition of pride. They are here forbidden,

First, To challenge titles of honour and distinction to themselves, v. 8, 10. It is repeated twice; Be not called Rabbi, neither be ye called Master or Guide; not that it is unlawful to give civil respect to those that are over us in the Lord, nay, it is an instance of the honour and esteem which it is our duty to shew them; but, 1. Christ's ministers must not affect the name of Rabbi, or Master, by way of distinction from other people; it is not agreeable to the simplicity of the gospel, for them to covet or accept the honour which they have that are in kings' palaces. 2. They must not assume the authority and dignity belonging to those names; they must not be magistrates, nor ministers of the civil government, but only over God's heritage, as if they had dominion over the faith of Christians: what they received of the Lord, all must receive from them; but in other things they must not make their opinions and wills a rule and standard to all other people, to be admitted with an implicit obedience. The reasons for this prohibition are,

(1.) One is your Master, even Christ, v. 8. and again, v. 10. Note, [1.] Christ is our Master, our Teacher, our Guide. Mr. George Herbert, when he named the name of Christ, usually added, My Master. [2.] Christ only is our Master, ministers are but ushers in the company, disciples the servants of the great Prophet whom we must hear, and be ruled and overruled by; whose word must be an oracle and a law to us; Verily I say unto you, must be enough to us. And if he only be our Master, then for his ministers to set up for dictators, and to pretend to a supremacy, and an infallibility, is a daring usurpation of that honour of Christ which he will have none to advance to.

(2.) All ye are brethren. Ministers are brethren, not only to one another, but to the people; and therefore it ill becomes them to be masters, when there are none for them to master it over but their brethren; yea, and we are all younger brethren, otherwise the eldest might claim an excellency of dignity and power, Gen. 49. 3. But, to preclude that notion, Christ is First-born among many brethren, Rom. 8. 29. We are brethren, and as such, should help one another in getting their lesson; but it will by no means be allowed, that one of the scholars step into the master's seat, and give law to the school. If we are all brethren, we must not be many masters, Jam. 3. 1.

Secondly, They are forbidden to ascribe such titles to others (v. 9.) "All no man your father upon the earth; constitute no man the father of your religion, that is, the founder, author, director, and governor, of it." The fathers of our flesh must be called fathers, and as such we must give them reverence; but God only must be owned as the Father of our spirits, Heb. 12. 9. Our religion must not be derived from, or made to depend upon, any man. We are born again to the spiritual and divine life, not of corruptible seed, but by the word of God; not of the will of the flesh, or the will of man, but of God. Now the will of man, not being the rise of our religion, must not be the rule of it. We must not jurare in verba magistri—swear to the dictates of any creature, not the wisest or best, nor pin our faith on any man's sleeve, because we know not whether he will carry it. St. Paul calls himself a fellow-companion of; (1 Cor. 4. 15. Phil. 10.) but he pretends to no dominion over them, and uses that title to denote, not authority, but affection; therefore he calls them not his obliged, but his beloved, sons, 1 Cor. 4. 14.

The reason given, is, One is your Father, who is in heaven. God is our Father, and is All in all in our religion. He is the Fountain of it, and its Founder; the Life and our Lord; from whom alone, as the Original, our spiritual life is derived, and on whom it depends. He is the Father of all lights, (Jam. 1. 17.) that one Father, from whom are all things, and we in him, Eph. 4. 6. Christ having taught us to say, Our Father, who art in heaven, let us call no man Father upon earth; no man, because man is a worm, and the son of man is a worm, but of the earth, dust of the earth; specially not upon earth, for man upon earth is a spiritual worm, there is not a just man upon earth, that doth good, and sinneth not, and therefore no one is fit to be called Father.

(2.) Here is a precept of humility and mutual submission, (v. 11.) He that is greatest among you shall be your servant; not only call himself so, (we know of one that styles himself Servus servorum Dei—Servant of the servants of God, but acts as Rabbi, and father, and master, and Dominus Dei master—The Lord our God, and what not,) but he shall be so. Take it as a promise; "He shall be accounted greatest, and stand highest in the favour of God, that is most submissive and serviceable;" or as a precept; "He that is advanced to any place of dignity, trust, and honour, in the church, let him be your servant;" (some copies read xes, for xei,) let him not think that his patron of honour is a point of ease to him; he that is greatest is not a lord, but a minister." St. Paul, who knew his privilege as well as duty, though free from all, yet made himself servant of all; (1 Cor. 9. 19.) and our Master frequently pressed it upon his disciples, to be humble and self-denying, mild and condescending, and to abound in all offices of Christian love, though mean, and to the meanest; and of this he hath set us an example.

[3.] Here is a good reason for all this, v. 12. Consider,

First, The punishment intended for the proud; Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased. If God give them repentance, they will be abased in their own eyes, and will abhor themselves for it; if they repent not, sooner or later they will be abased before the world. Nebuchadnezzar, in the height of his pride, was turned to be a fellow-commoner with the beasts; Herod, to be a feast for the worms; and Babylon, that sat as a queen, to be the scorn of nations. God made the proud and aspiring priests contemptible and base, (Mal. 2. 9.) and the lying prophet to be the tail, Isa. 9. 15. But, if proud men have not marks of humiliation set upon them in this world, there is a day coming, when they shall rise from everlasting shame and contempt; (Dan. 12. 2.) so plentifully will be rewarded the proud door? Ps. 31. 23.

Secondly, The precept referred for the humble: He that shall humble himself shall be exalted. Humility is that ornament which is in the sight of God of great price. In this world the humble have the honour of being accepted with the holy God, and respected by all wise and good men; of being qualified for, and often called out to, the most honourable services; for honour is like the shadow, which flees from those that pursue it, and grasp at it, but follows those that flee from it. However, in the other world, they that have humbled themselves in contrition for their sin, in compliance with their God, and in condescension to their brethren, shall be exalted to inherit the throne of glory shall be set up in publicly owned, but crowned, before angels and men.

13. But woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men; for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in. 14. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayer; therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation. 15. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves. 16. Woe unto you, ye blind guides, which say, Whosoever shall swear by the temple, it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gold of the temple, he is a debtor. 17. Ye fools, and blind: for whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that sanctifieth the gold? 12.
And whosoever shall swear by the altar, it is nothing; but whosoever sweareth by the gift that is upon it, he is guilty. 13. Ye fools, and blind: for whether is greater, the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift? 14. Whoso therefore shall swear by the altar, sweareth by it, and by all things thereon. 15. And whoso shall swear by the temple, sweareth by it, and by him that dwelleth therein. 16. And he that shall swear by heaven, sweareth by the throne of God, and by him that sitteth thereon. 17. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint, and anise, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. 18. Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel. 19. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess. 20. Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them may be clean also. 21. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whitened sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness. 22. Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity. 23. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, 30. And say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. 31. Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. 32. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. 33. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell? 34. In these verses we have eight woes levelled directly against the Scribes and Pharisees by our Lord Jesus Christ, like so many claps of thunder, or flashes of lightning, from mount Sinai. Three woes are made to look very dreadful; (Rev. 8. 13. =9. 12.) but here are eight woes given, and operated upon the eight beatitudes, Matth. 5. 3. The gospel has its woes as well as the law, and gospel-curses are of all other the heaviest. These woes are the more remarkable, not only because of the authority, but because of the meekness and gentleness, of him that denounced them. He came to bless, and loved to bless; but, if his wrath be kindled, there is surely cause for it: and who shall entreat for him that the great Intercessor pleads against? A woe from Christ is a remediless woe. 35. This is here the burden of the song, and it is a heavy burden; Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites. Note, 1. The Scribes and Pharisees were hypocrites; that is it in which all the rest of their bad characters are summed up. All the mean things which they said and did. A hypocrite is a stage-player in religion; (that is the primary signification of the word;) he personates, or acts, the part of one that he neither is, nor may be; or, perhaps, that he neither is, nor would be. 2. That hypocrites are in a woeful state and condition. Woe to hypocrites; so he said, whose saying that their case is miserable makes it so; whereas theirs, that their religion is vain; when they die, their ruin is great. 36. Now each of these woes against the Scribes and Pharisees has a reason annexed to it, containing a separate crime charged upon them, proving their hypocrisy, and justifying the judgment of Christ upon them; for his woes, his curses, are never causeless. 1. They were sworn enemies to the gospel of Christ, and consequently to the salvation of the souls of men; (v. 12.) They shut up the kingdom of heaven against men, that is, they did all they could to keep people from believing in Christ, and so entering into his kingdom. Christ came to open the kingdom of heaven, that is, to lay open for us a new and living way into it, to bring men to be subjects of that kingdom. Now the Scribes and Pharisees, who sat in Moses' seat, and pretended to the key of knowledge, ought to have contributed their assistance herein, by opening those scriptures of the Old Testament, which pointed at the Messiah and his kingdom, in their true proper sense; they that under took to expound Moses and the prophets, should have shewed the people how they testified of Christ; that Daniel's weeks were expiring, the sacrifice was departed from Judah, and therefore now was the time for the Messiah's appearing. Thus they might have facilitated that great work, and have helped thousands to heaven; but, instead of this, they shut up the kingdom of heaven; they made it their business to press the ceremonial law, which was now in the vanishing, to suppress the prophecies, which were now in the accomplishing, and to beget and nourish up in the minds of people prejudices against Christ and his doctrine. 1. They would not go in themselves; Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on him? (John 7. 48.) No; they were too proud to stoop to his meanness, too formal to be reconciled to his plainness; they did not like a religion which insisted so much on humility, self-denial, contempt of the world, and spiritual worship. Repentance was the door of admission into this kingdom, and nothing could be more disagreeable to the Pharisees, who justified and admired themselves, than to repent, thus to accuse, and abase, and abhor themselves; therefore they went not in themselves; but that was not all. 2. They would not suffer them that were entering, to go in. It is bad to keep away from Christ ourselves, but it is worse to keep others from him; yet that is common to the way of hypocrites; they do not love that any should go beyond them in religion, or be better than they. Their not going in themselves, was no reason why others should be restrained from doing so great an interest in the people, multitudes rejected the gospel only because their leaders did; but, besides that, they opposed both Christ's entertainment of sinners, (Luke 7. 39.) and sinners' entertaining of Christ; they perverted his doctrine, confronted his miracles, quarrelled with his disciples, and represented him, and his institutes and manned to pray without ceasing too soon; where there are many sins to be confessed, and many wants to pray for the supply of, and many mercies to give thanks for, there is occasion for long prayers. But the Pharisees' long prayers were made up of vain repetitions, and (which was the end of them) they were for a pretence by them to get the reputation of pious devout men, that loved prayer, and were the favourites of Heaven; and by this means people were made to believe it was not possible that such men as they should cheat them; and, therefore, happy the widow that could get a Pharisee for her trustee, and guardian to her children! Thus, while they seemed to soar heavenly, their prayer, their eye, like the kite's, was all the while under the earth, some widows' house or other that lay convenient for them. Thus circumcision was the cloak of Shechemites' covetousness, (Gen. 34. 22, 23.) the payment of a vow in Hebron the cover of Ab- solom's rebellion, (2 Sam. 15. 7.) a fast in Jerzeel must patronise Naboah's murder, and the extirpa- tion of Baal is the footstool of Jehu's ambition. Po- pulous places, the price of justice, was sold for dead, masses, and dirges, and I know not what, en- rich themselves by devouring the houses of the wid- dows and fatherless. Note, It is no new thing for the show and form of godliness to be made a cloak to the greatest enormities. But dissembled piety, however it passeth now, will be reckoned for as double iniquity, in the day when God shall judge the secrets of hearts.

3. The doom passed upon them for this; The- refore we shall receive the greater damnation. (1.) There are degrees of damnation; there are some, whose sin is more inexcusable, and whose ruin will therefore be more intolerable. (2.) The pretences of religion, with which hypocrites disguise, or excu- se, their sin now, will aggravate their condemna- tion. Those, which are the deceitfulness of sin, that they will do and say the right as if that very thing by which sinners hope to ex- piate and atone for their sins, will come against them, and make their sins more exceeding sinful. But it is sad for the criminal, when his defence proves his offence, and his plea (We have prophesied in thy name, and in thy name made long prayers,) heightens the charge against him.

III. While they were such enemies to the con- vention of the Jews, they were very industrious in the perversion of them to their faction. They shut up the kingdom of heaven against those that would turn to Christ, but at the same time com- passed sea and land to make proselytes to them- selves. v. 15. Observe here,

1. Their commendable industry in making pro- selytes to the Jewish religion, not only proselytes of the gate, who obliged themselves to no more than the observance of the seven precepts of the son of Noah, but proselytes of righteousness, who addicted themselves wholly to all the rites of the Jewish reli- gion, for that was the game they flew at; for this, for one such, though but one, they compass sea and land, had many a cunning reach, and laid many a plot, and run, and sent and wrote, and laboured unwearyedly. And what did they aim at? Not the glory of God, and the good of souls; but that they might have the credit of making them proselytes, and the advantage of making a prey of them when they were made. Note, (1.) The making of pro- selytes, if it be to the truth and serious godliness, and be done with a good design, is a good work, well worthy of the utmost care and pains. Such is the value of souls, that nothing must be thought too much to be used for the recovery of them. The in- dustry of the Pharisees herein may shew the negli- gence of many, who would be thought to act from better principles, but will be at no pains or cost to propagate the gospel. (2.) To make a proselyte, and hand must be compassed; all ways and meth must be tried; first one way, and then other must be tried, all little enough; but all well paid, if the point be gained. (3.) Carnal hearts seldom shrink from the pains necessary to carry on their carnal purposes; when a penalty is imposed, many may serve a turn for themselves, they will com pass sea and land to make him, rather than be dis appointed.

2. Their cursed impiety in abusing their pros elytes when they were made; "Ye make him the disciple of a Pharisee presently, and he sucks in all a Pharisee's notions; and ye make him twofold the child of hell than yourselves. Note. (1.) Hyssop they call the lye of heaven, are, in the judgment of Christ, the children of hell. The rise of their hypocrisy is from hell, for the devil is the father of lies; and the tendency of their hypocrisy is toward hell, that is the country they belong to, the inheritance they are heirs to;
they are called children of hell, because of their routed enmity to the kingdom of heaven, which is the principle and genius of Pharisaism. (2.) Though all love to hear fine words, and are children of hell, yet some are twofold more so than others, more furious, and bigoted, and malignant. (3.) Per verted proselytes are commonly the greatest bigots;
the scholars outdid their masters. [1.] In fondness of ceremony; the Pharisees themselves saw the folly of their own impostions, and in their hearts smiled at the obsequiousness of those that conform to them; but their proselytes were eager for them.
Note. Weak hearts commonly admire those shows and ceremonies which wise men (however for public ends they may countenance them) cannot but think meanly of. [2.] In fury against Christianity; the proselytes readily imbibed the principles which their crafty leaders were not want going to possess them with, and so became extreme hot against the truth. The most bitter enemies the apostles met with in all places, were, the Hellenist Jews, who were mostly proselytes, Acts 13. 45.
14. 2. 19. — 17. 5. 18. 6.
Paul, a disciple of the Pharisees, was exceedingly mad against the Chris tians, (Acts 26. 11.) when his master, Gamaliel, seems to have been more moderate.

IV. Their seeking of their own worldly gain and honour more than God's glory, put them upon coin ing false and unwarrantable distinctions, with which they courted them to sin against their own consciences, becoming to dangerous mistakes, partic ularly in the matter of oaths; which, as an evi dence of a universal sense of religion, have been by all nations accounted sacred; (v. 16.) Ye blind guides. Note. 1. It is sad to think how many are under the guidance of such as are themselves blind; who undertake to shew others their way that which they are themselves willingly ignorant of. His watch men are blind; (Isa. 58. 10.) and too often the peo lple
love to follow the guides they know of; See not.
But the case is bad, when the leaders misuse the cause them to err, Isa. 9. 16. 2. Though the con tdition of those whose guides are blind is very sad, yet that of the blind guides themselves is yet more woeful. Christ denounces a woe to the blind guides who have the blood of so many souls to answer for.

Now, to prove their blindness, he specifies the matter of swearing, and shews what corrupt casuists they are;

(1.) He lays down the doctrine they taught.
[1.] They were allowed swearing by creatures, provided they were consecrated to the service of God, and stood in any special relation to him. They allowed swearing by the temple and the altar, though they were the work of men's hands, intended to be the servants of God's honour, not sharers in it. An oath is an appeal to God, to his omniscience and justice; and to make this appeal to any creature, is to put that creature in the place of God. See Deut.

6. 13.

[2.] They distinguished between an oath by the temple and an oath by the gold of the temple; an a oath by the altar and an oath by the gift upon the altar; making the latter an oath not to be gamed.
Here was a double wickedness; first, that there were some oaths which they dispensed with,
and made light of, and reckoned a man was not bound by to assert the truth, or perform a promise.
They ought not to have sworn by the temple, or the altar; but, when they had so sworn, they were taken in the words of their mouth. That doctrine cannot be of the word of truth, which gives counte teance to the breach of faith, and the exaction of oaths. Oaths are edged-tools, and are not to be jested with.
Secondly, That they preferred the gold before the temple, and the gift before the altar, to encourage people to bring gifts to the altar, and gold to the treasurers of the temple, which they hoped to be gainers by. They who had made gold their hope, and whose eyes were blinded by gifts in secret, were great friends to the Corban ; and gain being their goods, by a thousand artifices, they made reli gion truckle to their worldly interests. Corrupt church-guides make things to be sin or no sin, as it serves their purposes, and lay a much greater stress on that which concerns their own gain, than on that which is for God's glory and the good of souls.

(2.) He shews the folly and absurdity of this dis tinction; (v. 17. 19.) Ye fools, and blind. It was in the way of necessity reproved, not an easy revo cunch, that Christ called them fools. Lot it suffice us, from the word of wisdom, to show the folly of sinful opinions and practices; but, for the fastening of the character upon particular persons, leave that to Christ, who knows what is in man, and has for bidden us to say, Thou fool.

To convict them of folly, he appeals to them sewelves, Whether is greater, the gold, (the golden vesse
s, and ornaments, or the gold in the treasure,) or the temple that sanctifies the gift? Any one who will, Profes se a word aliquid, est tale, id est magis tale, that, on an account of which any thing is qualified in a par ticular way, must itself be much more qualified in the same way. They that swear by the gold of the temple, had an eye to it as holy; but what was it that made it holy but the holiness of the temple, to the service of which it was appropriated? And therefore the temple must be holy which exceeds gold, but must be more so; for the less is blessed and sanctified of the better, Heb. 7. 7. The tem ple and altar were dedicated to God, fixedly, the gold and gift but secondarily. Christ is our Altar, (Heb. 13. 10.) our Temple; (John 2. 21.) for it is he that sanctifies all our gifts, and puts an accept ableness in them, 1 Pet. 2. 5. Those that put their own works into the place of Christ's righteousness may be justly charged with the Pharisees' abuse not ity, who preferred the gift before the altar. Every true Christian is a living temple; and by virtue thereof common things are sanctified to him; unto the pure all things are pure, (Tit. 1. 15.) and the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the believing wife, 1 Cor. 7. 14.

(3.) He rectifies the mistake, (v. 20. 22.) by requiring the oaths to be limited to the true intent of an oath, which is, Be thou the Lord: so that though an oath by the temple, or the altar, or heaven, he formally bad, yet they are binding.
Quod fieri non debuit, fuitum vale—Enga gements which ought not to have been made, are not, when made, binding. A man shall never take advantage of his own fault.

[1.] He that swears by the altar, let him not think to shake off the obligation of it by saying, "The altar is but wood, and stone, and brass;" for his oath shall be construed most strongly against himself; because he was culpable, and so as that the obligation of it may be preserved, ut res patius vactat quam peracta—the obligation being hereby strengthened rather than destroyed. And therefore an oath by the altar should be interpreted by it and by all things thereon; for the appellant, whose word it was, was accursed both in the case and thereon being offered up to God, to swear by it and them, was, in effect, to call God himself to witness: for it was the altar of God; and he that went to that, went to God, Ps. 43. 4.—26. 6.

[2.] He that swears by the temple, if he understand what he does, cannot but apprehend that the ground of such a respect to it, is, not because it is a faithful temple of God, but because it is the house of God, dedicated to his service, the place which he has chosen to put his name there; and therefore he swears by it, and by him that dwells therein; there he was pleased in a peculiar manner to manifest himself, and give tokens of his presence; so that whose swears by it, swears by him who had said, This is my rest, here will I dwell. God Christians are God's people, and this is God's house; and God dwells in the temple. (1 Cor. 3. 16.—6. 19.) and God takes what is done to them as done to himself; he that grievances a gracious soul, grieves it, and the Spirit that dwells in it, Eph. 4. 30.

[3.] If a man swears by heaven, he sins; (ch. 5. 34.) yet he shall not therefore be discharged from the obligation of his oath; no, God will make him know that the heaven he swears by is his throne; (Isa. 66. 1.) and he that swears by the throne, appeals to him that sits upon it; who, as he resents the affront done to him in the form of the oath, so he will certainly revenge the greater affront done to him by the violation of it. Christ will not countenance the evasion of a solemn oath, though ever so plausible.

They were very strict and precise in the smaller matters of the law, but as careless and loose in the weightier matters, v. 23. 24. They were partial in the law, (Mal. 2. 9.) would pick and choose their duty, according as they were interested or stood affected. Sincere obedience is universal, and he that from a right principle obeyes any of God's precepts, will have respect to them all, Ps. 119. 6. But hypocrites, who act in religion for their own ends, and not for God, will do no more in religion than they can serve a turn for themselves. The partiality of the Scribes and Pharisees appears here, in two instances.

1. They observed smaller duties, but omitted greater: they were very exact in paying tithes, till it came to mint, anise, and cummin, their exactness in tithing of which would not cost them much, but would be increased up, and they would buy reputation cheap. The Pharisee boasted of this, I give tithes of all that I possess, Luke 18. 12. But it is probable that they had ends of their own to serve, and would find their own account in it; for the priests and Levites, to whom the tithes were paid, were in their interests, and knew how to return their kindness. Paying tithes was their duty, and what the law required of God, and they should buy reputation leave it undone. Note, All ought in their places to contribute to the support and maintenance of a standing ministry: withholding tithes is called robbing God, Mal. 3. 8—10. They that are taught in the word, and do not communicate to them that teach them, that love a cheap gospel, come short of the Pharisees.

But that, which Christ here condemns them for, is, that they omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith; and their niceness in paying tithes, was, if not to atone before God, yet at least to excuse and palliate to men the omission of those. All the things of God's law are weighty, but those are most weighty which are most expressive of inward holiness in the heart; the instances of self-denial, contempt of the world, and resignation to God, in which lies the life of religion. Judgment and mercy toward men, and faith toward God, are the weightier matters of the law, which the Lord our God requires, (Mic. 6. 8.) to do justly, and love mercy, and humble ourselves by faith to walk with God. This is the obedience which is better than sacrifice or tithes; judgment is preferred before sacrifice, Isa. 1. 11. To be just to the priests in their tithes, and yet to cheat and defraud every body else, is but to mock God, and deceive our own souls. Mercy and faith are greater things than the Lord our God requires. (Mic. 6. 8.) To feed those who made themselves fat with the offerings of the Lord, and at the same time to shut up the bowels of compassion from a brother or a sister that is naked, and disteute of daily food, to pay tithes-mint to the priest, and to deny a crumb to Lazarus, is to lie open to that judgment without mercy, which is awarded to those who were presuma tious in judgment the Lord of the world. They would not with divine revelation; for God will be honoured in his truths as well as in his laws.

2. They avoided lesser sins, but committed greater; (v. 24.) Ye blind guides; so he had called them before, (v. 15.) for their corrupt teaching; here he calls them so for their corrupt living, for their example was leading as well as their doctrine; in their ten they were blind and partial; they stranglnd at a gnat, and swallowed a camel. In their doctrine they strained at grats, warned people against every the least violation of the tradition of the elders. In their practice they strained at grats, heaved at them, with a seeming dread, as if they had a great abhorrence of sin, and were afraid of it in the least instance; but they made no difficulty of those sins which, in comparison with them, were as a camel to a gnat; when they devoured widows' houses, they did indeed swallow a camel; when they gave Judas the price of innocent blood, and yet scrupled to put the returned money into the treasury; (ch. 27. 6.) when they would not go into the judgment-hall, for fear of being defiled, and yet would stand at the door, and cry out against the holy Jesus; (John 18. 29.) when they quarrelled with the temple for being open at the sabbath; they who, yet, for the filling of the Corban, taught people to break the fifth commandment, they strained at grats, or lesser things, and yet swallowed camels. It is not the scrupling of a little sin that Christ here reproves; if it be a sin, though but a gnat, it must be strained at; but the doing of that, and then swallowing a camel. In the lesser matters of the law to be supercilious, and to be particular in the greater, is the hypocrisy here condemned.

VI. They were all for the outside, and not at all for the inside, of religion. They were more desirous and solicitous to appear pious to men, than to approve themselves so toward God. This is illustrated by two similitudes:

1. They are compared to a vessel that is clean washed out and filled with all dirt within, v. 25. 26. The Pharisees placed religion in that which at best was but a point of decency—the washing of cups, Mark 7. 4. They were in care to eat their meat in clean cups and platters, but made no conscience of getting their meat by extortion, and using it to excess. Now, what a foolish thing would it be for a man to wash only the outside of a cup, which is to be looked at, and to leave the inside dirty, which is to be used? so they do, who only avoid scandalous sins that would spoil their reputation with men, but allow themselves in heart-wickedness, which renders them odious to the pure and holy God. To reference to this, observe,

(1.) The practice of the Pharisees; they made clean the outside. In those things which fell under the observation of their neighbours, they seemed very exact, and carried on their wicked intrigues with so much artifice, that their wickedness was not suspected; people generally took them for very good men. In nothing of heart, and the chief ingredients of their lives, they were full of extortion and excess; of violence and incontinence; (so Dr. Hammond;) that is, of injustice and intemperance. While they would seem to be godly, they were neither sober nor righteous. Their inward part was very wicked; (Ps. 5. 9.) and that we are really, which we are inwardly.

(2.) The rule Christ gives, in opposition to this practice, 26. It is addressed to the blind Pharisees. They thought themselves the sons of the land, but (John 9. 40.) Christ calls them blind. Note, Those are blind, in Christ's account, who (how quick-sighted soever they are in other things) are strangers, and no enemies, to the wickedness of their own hearts; who see not, and hate not, the secret sin that lodgeth there. Self-ignorance is the most shameful and hurtful ignorance, Rev. 3. 17. The rule is, Cleanse first that which is within. Note, They should have made a careful search, and washed our hearts from wickedness, Jer. 4. 14. The main business of a Christian lies within, to get cleansed from the filthiness of the spirit. Corrupt affections and inclinations, the secret lusts that lurk in the soul, unseen and unobserved; those must first be mortified and subdued. Those sins must be conscientiously abstained from, which the eye of God only is a witness to, who searcheth the heart.

Observe, the method prescribed; Cleanse first that which is within; not that only, but that first; because, if due care be taken concerning that, the outside will be clean also. External motives and inducements may keep the outside clean, while the inside is filthy; but if renewing, sanctifying grace make clean the inside, that will have an influence upon the outside, for the commanding principle is within. If the heart be well kept, all is well, for our outward life will not only please but profit, and must needs be a comfort and refreshment of course. If the heart and spirit be made new, there will be a newness of life; here therefore we must begin with ourselves; first cleanse that which is within; we then make sure work, when this is our first work.

2. They are compared to whitened sepulchres, v. 27, 28. (1.) They were fair without, like sepulchres, which appear beautiful outward. Some make it to refer to the custom of the Jews to whiten graves, only for the notifying of them, especially if they were in unusual places, that people might avoid them, because of the ceremional pollution contracted by the touch of a grave, Num. 19. 16. And it was part of the charge of the overseers of the highways, to repair that when it was decayed. Sepulchres were thus made remarkable, 2 Kings 23. 15, 17. The formality of hypocrites, by which they study to recommend themselves to the world, doth but make all wise and good men the more careful to avoid them, for fear of being defiled by them. Beware of the Sepulchres, Luke 20. 46. It rather alludes to the custom of whitening the sepulchres of eminent persons, for the beautifying of them. It is said here, (v. 29.) that they garnished the sepulchres of the righteous; as it is usual with us to erect monuments upon the graves of great persons, and to straw flowers on the graves of dear friends. Now the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees was like the ornaments of a grave, or the dressing up of a dead body, only for show. The top of their ambition was to appear righteous before men, and to be applauded and had in admiration by them. But,

(2.) They were foul within, like sepulchres, full of dead men's bones, and all uncleanness; so vile are our bodies, when the soul has deserted them. Thus were they full of hypocrisy and iniquity. Hypocrisy is the worst iniquity of all other. Note, It is possible for those that have their hearts full of sin, to live and die free from blame, and to appear very good. But what is the true godly life? The life of our fellow-servants, if our Master doth not say, Will done? When all other graves are opened, these whitened sepulchres will be looked into, and the dead men's bones, and all the uncleanness, shall be brought out, and be spread before all the host of heaven, Jer. 8. 1, 2. For it is the day when God shall judge, not the shows, but the secrets, of men. And it will then be small comfort to them, who shall have held their portion with hypocrites, to remember how credibly and plausibly they went to hell, applauded by all their neighbours.

VII. They pretended a deal of kindness for the memory of the prophets that were dead and gone, while they hated and persecuted those that were present with them. This is put last, because it was the blackest part of their character. God is jealous for his honour in holy things, and makes it appear, that if they be harmed and abused; but he has often expressed an equal jealousy for his honour in his prophets and ministers, and resents it worse, if they be wronged and persecuted: and therefore, when our Lord Jesus comes to this head, he speaks more fully than upon any of the other; (v. 29—37.) for he that toucheth his ministers, toucheth his Anointed, and toucheth the apple of his eye. Observe here, 1. The respect which the Scribes and Pharisees pretended to the prophets, that were gone; v. 29, 30. This was the varnish, and that in which they outwardly appeared righteous.

(1.) They honoured the relics of the prophets, they built their tombs, and garnished their sepulchres. It seems, the places of their burial were known, David's sepulchre was with them, Acts 2. 29. There was a title upon the sepulchre of the man of God, (2 Kings 23. 17.) and Josiah thought it a glory to himself, that he had washed his feet there, 18. They were not content with the tombs of the dead; they would do more, and beautify them. Now consider this, [1.] As an instance of honour done to deceased prophets, who, while they lived, were counted as the off-scouring of all things, and had all manner of evil spoken against them falsely. Note, God can extort, even from bad men, an acknowledgment of the honour of piety and holiness. Them that honour God, he will honour, and some times with those from whom contempt is expected, 2 Sam. 6. 22. The memory of the just is blessed, when the names of those that hated and persecuted them shall be covered with shame. The honour of constancy and resolution, in the way of duty, will be a lasting honour; and those that are manifest to God, will be manifest in the consciences of those about them. [2.] As an instance of the hypocrisy of the Scribes and Pharisees who paid their respect to them. Note, Carnal people can easily honour the memories of faithful ministers that are dead and gone, because they do not reprove them, nor disturb them, in their sins. Dead prophets are seen; but we not, and those they can bear well enough; they do not torment them, as the living witnesses do, that bear their testimony vivâ voce—with a living voice, Rev. 11. 10. They can pay respect to the writings of the dead prophets, which tell them what they should be; but not the reproofs of the living prophets, which tell them what they are. Sit divini, modo non sit givas.—Let there be saints, but let them not be living here. The extravagant respect which the church of Rome pays to the memory of saints departed, especially the martyrs, dedicating days and places to their names, endowing their relics, praying to them, and offering to their images, while they make themselves drunk with the blood of the saints of their own day, is a manifest proof that they not only succeed, but exceed, the Scribes and Pharisees in a counterfeit hypocritical religion, which builds the prophets' tombs and damns the prophets' doctrine. If Simeon protested against the murder of the child Jesus (v. 30.) If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them. They would never have consented to the silencing of Amos, and the imprisonment of Micaiah, to the putting of Hanani in the stocks, and Jeremiah in the dungeon, to the stoning of Zecchariah, the mocking of all the messengers of the Lord, and the abuses put upon his prophets; no more than that they were sooner have lost their right hands than have done any such thing. What, is thy servant a dog? And yet they were at this time plotting to murder Christ, to whom all the prophets bore witness. They think, if they had lived in the days of the prophets, they would have heard them gladly, and obeyed; and yet they rebelled against the light that Christ brought into the world. This is true, a Herod and a Herodias to John the Baptist, would have been an Abah and a Jezebel to Elijah. Note, The deceitfulness of sinners' hearts appears very much in this, that, while they go down the stream of the sins of their own day, they fancy they should have swum against the stream of the sins of the former days; that, if they had had other people's opportunities, they would have improved them more faithfully; if they had been in other people's temptations, they would have resisted them more vigorously; yet they improve not the opportunities they have, nor resist the temptations they are in. We are sometimes thinking, if we had lived when Christ was upon earth, how constantly we would have followed him; we would not have despised and rejected him, as they then did; and yet Christ in his spirit, in his word, in his ministers, is still no better treated. 2. The enmity and opposition to Christ and his gospel, notwithstanding, and the ruin they were bringing upon themselves and upon that generation thereby, v. 31—33. Observe here, (1.) The indictment proved; Ye are witnesses against yourselves. Note, Sinners cannot hope to escape the judgment of God, without doing it against themselves, when it is easy to find it witnesses against themselves; and their very pleas will not only be overruled, but turned to their conviction, and their own tongues shall be made to fall upon them, Ps. 64. 8. [1.] By their own confession, it was the great wickedness of their fathers, to kill the prophets; so that they knew the fault of it, and yet they condemned in the same. Note, They who condemn sin in others, and yet allow the same or worse in themselves, are of all others most inexcusable, Rom. 1. 32.—2. 1. They knew they ought not to have been partakers with persecutors, and yet were the followers of them. Such self-contradiction will not do. They confess to their own building of the tombs of the prophets than what they intended; as if by beautifying their graves they justified their murdering, (Luke 11. 48.) for they persisted in the sin. [2.] By their own confession, these notorious persecutors were their ancestors; Ye are the children of your fathers. No more than that they were their children by blood and nature; but Christ turns it upon them, that they were so by spirit and disposition; You are of those fathers, and their lusts you will do. They are, as you say, your fathers, and you partake—take after your fathers; it is the sin that runs in the blood among you. As your fathers did, so do ye, Acts 7. 51. They came of a persecuting race, were a seed of evil doers, (Isa. 1. 4.) risen up in their fathers' stead, Numb. 32. 14. Malice, envy, and cruelty, were bred in the bone with them, and they had formerly espoused it for a principle, to do evil, in the days of their fathers. And it is told us here, (v. 36.) be careful they are to mention the relation; They were our fathers, that killed the prophets, and they were men in honour and power, whose sons and successors we are. If they had detested the wickedness of their ancestors, as they ought to have done, they would not have been so fond to call them their fathers; for it is no credit to be akin to persecutors, though they had even such high dignities and dominions.
under their tongues; the seed of the old serpent.
They were a generation of vipers; they, and those that went before them, they, and those that joined with them, were a generation of envenomed, engaged, spiritful adversaries to Christ and his gospel.
They loved to be called, of men, Righteous.
...and thus, they preach them serpents, and vipers; for he gives men their true characters, and delights to put contempt upon the proud.

Secondly, Their doom. He represents their condition as very sad, and in a manner desperate; How | can ye escape the damnation of hell? Christ himself preached hell and damnation, for which his ministers have often been reproach by those that care not of eternal matters. Note, 1. The damnation of hell will be the fearful end of all impenitent sinners.

This doom, coming from Christ, was more terrible than coming from all the prophets and ministers that ever were, for he is the Judge, into whose hands the keys of hell and death are put, and his saying they were damned made them so. 2. There is a way of escaping this damnation, this is implied here;
some are delivered from the wrath to come. 3. Of all sinners, those who are of the spirit of the Seraphs and Pharisees are least likely to escape this dis-creation; for repentance and faith are necessary to that escape; and how will they be brought to these, who are so concocted of themselves, and so prejudiced against Christ and his gospel, as they were? How could they be healed and saved, who would not hear to have their wound searched, nor the balm of Giblead applied to it? Publicans and harlots, who were sensible of their disease, and applied themselves to the Physician, were more likely to escape the damnation of hell than those; who, though they were in the high road to it, were confidant they were in the way to heaven.

34. Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: 35. That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. 36.
Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation. 37. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! 38. Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. 39. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

We have left the blind leaders fallen into the ditch, under Christ's sentence, into the damnation of hell; let us see what will become of the blind followers, call them the hirelings of the Jewish church, and particularly Jerusalem. 1. Jesus Christ designs yet to try them with the means of grace: I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: The connexion is strange; You are a generation of vipers, not likely to escape the damnation of hell; one would think it should follow, "Therefore you shall never have a prophet sent to you any more;" but no, Therefore I will send unto your prophets, to see if you will yet at length be wrought upon, or else to leave you insensible, and to justify God in your ruin." It is therefore usher| ed in with a note of admiration, behold! Observe, ye, who think it is God's will to prove you, I send.

By this he avows himself to be God, having power to gift and commission prophets. It is an act of kingly of| fice; he sends them as ambassadors to treat with us about the concern of our souls. After his resurrection, he made this word good, when he said, So send I you, John 20. 21. Though now he appeared mean, yet he was intrusted with this great authority.

2. He sends them to the Jews first; "I send them to you." The Jews were the most hardened, were as the prophets when they went, ther observed this rule, to make the first tender of gospel-grace to the Jews, Acts 13. 46.

3. Those he sends are called prophets, wise men, and scribes, Old-Testament names for New-Testament officers; to show that the ministers sent to them now should not be inferior to the prophets of the Old Testament, to Solomon, the wise, or Ezra the scribe. The extraordinary ministers, who in the first ages were divinely inspired, were as the prophets and scribes, instructed to the kingdom of God; (ch. 13.
32.) for the office of a scribe was honourable till the men dishonoured it.

II. He foresees and foretells the ill usage that his messengers would meet with among them; Some of them ye shall kill and crucify, and yet I will send them." Christ knows beforehand how ill his servants will be treated, and yet sends them, and appoints them their measure of sufferings; yet he leaves them never the less for his thus exposing them, for he designs to glorify himself by their sufferings, and them after them; he will counterbalance them, though not prevent them. Observe,
1. The cruelty of these persecutors; Ye shall kill and crucify them. It is no less than the blood, the life-blood, that they thirst after; their lust is not satisfied with anything short of their destruction, Exod. 15. 9. They killed the two James's, crucified Simon the son of Cleophas, and scourged Peter and John; thus did the members partake of the sufferings of the Head, he was killed and cruci-cified, and so were they. Christians must expect to resist into blood.

2. Their unwearied industry; Ye shall persecute them from city to city. As the apostles went from | city to city, to preach the gospel, the Jews dashed them, and haunted them, and stirred up persecution against them, Acts 14. 19. — 17. 12. They that did not believe in Judea, were more bitter enemies to the gospel than any other unbelievers, Acts 13.

31. The more they are stung by this, the more they encouraged them in their synagogues, their places of worship, where they kept their ecclesiastical courts, so that they did it as a piece of service to the church;
cast them out, and said, Let the Lord be glorified
Isa. 66. 5. John 16. 2.

III. He imputes the sin of their fathers to them, because they imitated it; That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, v. 35.

That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, v. 35.

Though Christ had preached this persecuting ge| neration, he will not bear always; and patience abused, turns into the greatest wrath. The longer sinners have been heapimg up treasures of wicked-

| ness, the deeper and fuller will the treasures of wrath be; and the breaking of them up will be like breaking up the foundations of the great deep.
Observe, 1. The extent of this imputation; it takes in all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, that is, the blood shed for righteousness’ sake, which has all been laid up in God’s treasury, and not a drop of it lost, for it is precious, Ps. 72. 14. He dates the account from the blood of righteous Abel; he is called righteous Abel, for he obtained witness from heaven that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts. How early did martyrdom come into the world! The first that died, died for his religion, and, being dead, he yet speaks. His blood not only cried against Cain, but continues to cry against all that shed blood; Cain, and God, and his brother, and all his sons and brothers. He cuts their brother, because their works are righteous. He extends it to the blood of Zacharias the son of Barachaiah, (ver. 36.) not Zechariah the prophet, (as some would have it,) though he was the son of Barach, (Zech. 1. 1.) nor Zechariah, the father of John Baptist, as others say; but, as is most probable, Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, who was slain in the court of the Lord’s house, 2 Chron. 24. 20, 21. His father is called Barachaiah, which signifies much the same with Jehoiada; and it was usual among the Jews for the same person to have two names; whom ye slew, ye of this nation, though not of this generation. This is specified, because the requiring of that is particularly spoken of, (2 Chron. 24. 22.) as that of Abel’s is. The Jews imagined that the captivity had sufficiently atoned for that guilt; but Christ lets them know it was not yet, nor is it yet, atoned, but remained upon the score. And some think that this is mentioned with a prophetic hint, for there was one Zecharias, the son of Baruch, whom Josephus speaks of, (De Bello Judaico, b. 5. cap. 1.) who was a just and good man, who was killed in the temple a little before it was destroyed by the Romans. Archbishop Tillotson thinks that Christ both and intended to give the history of the former Zecharias in Chronicles, and foretells the death of this latter in Josephus. Though the latter was not yet slain, yet, before this destruction comes, it will be true that they had slain him; so that all shall be put together from first to last.

2. The effect of it; All these things shall come; all the guilt of this blood, all the punishment of it, shall all come upon this generation. The misery and destruction shall be so severe as to be very great, that, though, considering the evil of their own sins, it was less than even those deserved; yet, comparing it with other judgments, it will seem to be a general reckoning for all the wickedness of their ancestors, especially their persecutions, to all which God declared this ruin to have special reference and relation. The destruction shall be so dreadful, as if God had once for all arranged them for all the righteous blood shed in the world. It shall come upon this generation; which intimates, that it shall come quickly; some here shall live to see it. Note, The sorer and nearer the punishment of sin is, the louder is the call to repentance and reformation.

IV. He laments the wickedness of Jerusalem, and justly upbraids them with the many kind offers he had made them, v. 37. See with what concern he speaks of Jerusalem: O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! The repetition is emphatical, and demands the utmost of remorse of condemnation. A day or two before, Christ had wept over Jerusalem, now he sighed and ground over it. Jerusalem, the vision of peace, (so it signifies,) must now be the seat of war and confusion. Jerusalem, that had been the joy of the whole world, must now be a hissing, and an astonishment, and a bane to all the earth; and Jerusalem, that has been a city compact together, shall now be a city divided among their own intestine broils. Jerusalem, the place that God has chosen to put his name there, shall now be abandoned to the spoil and the robbers, Lam. 1. 1.—4. 1.

But wherefore will the Lord do all this to Jerusalem? Why? Jerusalem hath grievously sinned, Lam. 1. 8.

1. She persecuted God’s messengers; Thou that killedst the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee. This sin is especially charged upon Jerusalem, because there the Sanhedrim, or great council, sat, who took cognisance of church-matters, and therefore a prophet could not perish but in Jerusalem, Luke 15. 33. It is true, they had not now a power to put any man to death, but they killed the prophets in popular tumults, mobbed them, as Stephen, and put the Roman powers on to kill them. At Jerusalem, when Christ was first preached, it was first persecuted, (Acts 4. 1.) and here was the head-quarters of the persecutors, whence warrants were issued out to other cities, and thither the saints were brought bound, Acts 9. 2. Thou stonest them: that was a capital punishment, in use only among the Jews. By the law, false prophets and seducers were to be stoned, (Deut. 13. 10.) under colour of which law, they put the true prophets to death. Note, It has often been the artifice of Satan, to turn that artillery against the church, which was originally planted in the defence of it. Brand the true prophets as seducers, and the true professors of religion as heretics and schismatics, and then it will be easy to persecute them. There was abundance of other wickedness in Jerusalem; but this was the sin that made the loudest cry, and which it was an easy thing to go a-calling, and bring that ruin upon them, as 2 Kings 21. 4, 5. 36. 16. Observe, Christ speaks in the present tense; Thou killedst, and stonest; for all they had done, and all they would do, was present to Christ’s notice.

2. She refused and rejected Christ, and gospel-offers. The former was a sin without remedy, this against the remedy. Here is, (1.) The wonderful grace and favour of Jesus Christ; How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings! Thus kind and condescending are the offers of gospel-grace, even to Jerusalem’s children, bad as she is, the inhabitants, the little ones not excepted.

[1.] The favour proposed, was the gathering of them. Christ’s design is to gather poor souls, gather them in from other parts of the earth, gather them home to himself, as the Centre of unity; for to him must the gathering of the people be. He would have taken the whole body of the Jewish nation into the church, and so gathered them all (as the Jews used to speak of proselytes) under the wings of the Divine Majesty. It is here illustrated by a humble similitude; as a hen checks her chickens together. Christ would have gathered them. First, With such a tenderness of affection as the hen does, which has, by instinct, a peculiar concern for her young ones. Christ’s gathering of souls comes from his love, Jer. 31. 3. Secondly, for the same end. The hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, for protection and safety, and for warmth and comfort; poor souls have in Christ both refuge and refreshment. The chickens naturally run to the hen for shelter, and there find them; so the souls, by coming to Christ, perhaps Christ refers to that promise, (Ps. 91. 4.) He shall cover thee with his feathers. There is healing under Christ’s wings; (Mal. 4. 2.) that is more than the hen has for her chickens.

[2.] The forwardness of Christ to confer this favour. His offers are, First, Very free: I would have done it. Jesus Christ is truly willing to receive and save the poor, and to make them partakers of his interest and favour. Note, Even the ruin of their ruin, he delights in their repentance. Secondly, Very frequent: How often! Christ often came up to Jerusalem, preached, and wrought miraculs there; and the meaning of all this, was, he would have gathered them. He keeps account how often his calls have been repeated. As often as we have heard the sound of the gospel, as often as we have felt the stirrings of the Spirit, so often Christ would have gathered them; but not like the terms upon which Christ proposed to gather them; they loved their sins, and yet trusted to their righteousness; they would not submit either to the grace of Christ or to his government, and so the bargain broke off.

3. Their wilful refusal of this grace and favour; Ye would not. How emphatically is their obstinacy opposed to Christ’s mercy! I would, and ye would not. He was willing to save them, but they were not willing to be saved by him. Note, It is wholly owing to the wicked wills of sinners, that they are not gathered under the wings of the Lord Jesus. They did not like the terms upon which Christ proposed to gather them; they loved their sins, and yet trusted to their righteousness; they would not submit either to the grace of Christ or to his government, and so the bargain broke off.

V. He reads Jerusalem’s doom; (v. 38, 39.) Therefore behold, your house is left unto you desolate. Both the city and the temple, God’s house and their own, all shall be laid waste. But it is especially meant of the temple, which they boasted of, and trusted to; that holy mountain because of which they were so haughty. Note, They that will not be gathered by the love and grace of Christ, shall be consumed and scattered by his wrath; I would, and you would not. Israel would none of me, so I gave them up, Ps. 81. 11, 12.

1. Their house shall be desolate; It is left unto you. Christ was now departing from the temple, and never came into it again; but by his word he beheaded it to ruin. They dealt on it, would have in themselves; Christ must have no room or interest there. “Well,” saith Christ, “it is left to you; take it, and make your best of it; I will never have any thing more to do with it.” They had made it a house of merchandise, and a den of thieves, and so it is left to them. Not long after this, the voice was heard in the temple, “Let us depart hence.” Then Christ went, and left them: the city also was left to them, destitute of God’s presence and grace; he was no longer a Wall of fire about them, nor the glory in the midst of them.

2. It shall be desolate; It is left unto you desolate; it is left the wilderness. (1.) It was immediately, when Christ left it, in the eyes of all that understood themselves, a very dismal melancholy place. Christ’s departure makes the best furnished, best replenished, place a wilderness, though it be the temple, the chief place of concourse; for what comfort can there be where Christ is not? Though there may be a crown of other contentments, yet if Christ’s special spiritual presence be withdrawn, that soul, that place, is become a wilderness, a land of darkness, as darkness itself. This comes of men’s rejecting Christ, and driving him away. (2.) It was, not long after, desolate, destroyed and ruined, and not only Christ, left out one another. The lot of Jerusalem’s enemies will now become Jerusalem’s lot, to be made of a city a heap, of a defended city a ruin, (Isa. 25. 2.) a lofty city laid low, even to the ground, Isa. 26. 5. The temple, that holy and beautiful house, became desolate. When God goes out, all enemies break in.

Lastly, Here is the final farewell that Christ took of Jerusalem the city, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh.

This speaks.

1. His departure from them. The time was at hand, when he should leave the world, to go to his Father, and be seen no more. After his resurrection, he was seen only by a few chosen witnesses, and they saw him not long, but he soon removed to the invisible world, and there will be till the time of the restitution of all things, when his welcome at his first coming will be repeated with loud acclama-

1. The prophetic vision of the destruction of Jerusalem, (Rev. 11. 1.) and, even they, who, when time was, rejected and pierced him, will be glad to come in among his accusers; they shall not only see the ruin of the house of God, but those that had bowed to Baal; and even the workers of iniquity will then cry, Lord, Lord, and will own, when his wrath is kindled, that blessed are all they that put their trust in him. Would we have our lot in that day with those that say, Blessed is he that cometh; let us be with them now, with them that truly worship, and truly welcome, Jesus Christ.

2. The judgments, blindness and obstinacy; Ye shall not see me, that is, not see me to be the Messiah, (for otherwise they did see him upon the cross,) not see the light of the truth concerning me, nor the things that belong to your peace, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh. They will never be convinced, till Christ’s second coming convince them, when it will be too late to make an interest in him, and nothing will remain but a fearful looking for of judgment. Note, (1.)Wilful blindness is often punished with judicial blindness. If they will not see, they shall not see. With this word he concludes his public preaching. After his resurrection, which was the sign of the prophet Jonas, they should have no other sign given them, till they should see the sign of the Son of man, ch. 24. 30. (2.) When the Lord comes with ten thousand of his saints, he will convince all, and will force acknowledgments from the proudest of his enemies of his being the Messiah, and even they shall be found bars of their own. They that would not now come at his call, shall then be forced to depart with his curse. The chief priests and scribes were displeased with the children for crying Hosanna to Christ; but the day is coming, when proud persecutors would gladly be found in the condition of the meanest and poorest they now trample upon. They who now reproach Christ in ridicule, shall repent in another mind shortly; it were therefore better to be of that mind now. Some make this to refer to the conversion of the Jews to the faith of Christ; then they shall see him, and own him, and say, Blessed is he that cometh; but it seems rather to look further, for, the complete manifestation of Christ, and conviction of sinners, are reserved to be the glory of the last day.

CHAP. XXIV.

Christ’s preaching was mostly practical; but, in this chapter, we have a prophetic discourse, a prediction of things to come; such, however, as had a practical tendency, and was intended, not to gratify the curiosity of his disciples, but to guide their consciences and conversations, and it is therefore concluded with a practical application. The church has always had particular prophesies, beside general prophesies, concerning the future salvation and bliss of believers: but it is observable, Christ preached this prophetic sermon in the close of his ministry, as the Apocalypse is the last book of the New Testament, and the prophecies books of the Old Testament; placed last, to intimate that we must be well grounded in plain truths and duties, and those must first be well digested, before we dive into those things that are dark and difficult; many run themselves into confusion by beginning their fible at the end. This discourse is divided into two parts.

1. The occasion of this discourse, v. 1. 3. II. The discourse itself, in which we have, 1. The prophecy of diviner events, especially referring to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the terrible fight of the Lord Jesus Christ, which were now hastening on, and were completed about forty years after; the prefaces to that destruction, the concomitants and consequences of it, yet looking further, to Christ’s coming at the end of time; and the summation of all things, of which that was a type and figure, v. 4. 21. 2. The practical application of this prophecy for the awakening and quickening of his disciples to prepare for these great and awful things, v. 32. 51.
1. AND Jesus went out, and departed from the temple: and his disciples came to him for to shew him the buildings of the temple. 2. And Jesus said unto them, See ye not all these things? Verily I say unto you, There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. 3. And as he sat upon the mount of Olives, the disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?

Here is,
1. Christ's quitting the temple, and his public work there. He had said, in the close of the foregoing chapter, Your house is left unto you desolate; and here he made his words good, He went out, and departed from the temple. The manner of expression is observable: he not only went out of the temple, but departed from it, took his final farewell of it; he departed from it, never to return to it any more; and this immediately follows a prophetic word. Note, That house is left desolate indeed, which Christ leaves. Woe unto them when I depart, Hos. 9. 12. Jer. 6. 8. It was now time to greaten out their Jehovah, The glory is departed, their defence is departed. Three days after this, the vail of the temple was rent; when Christ left it, all became common and unclean; but Christ departed not till they drove him away; did not reject them, till they first rejected him.

2. His private discourse with his disciples; he left the temple, but he did not leave the twelve, who were the seed of the gospel-church, which the casting off of the Jews was the encreasing of. When he left the temple, his disciples left it too, and came to him. Note, It is good being where Christ is, and leaving that which he leaves. They came to him, to be instructed in private, when his public preaching was over; for the secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. He had spoken of the destruction of the Jewish church to the multitude in parables, which here, as usual, he explains to his disciples. Observe,
1. His disciples came to him, to shew him the buildings of the temple. It was a stately and beautiful structure, out of the world, the world; no cost was spared, no art left untired, to make it sumptuous. Though it came short of Solomon's temple, and its beginning was small, yet its latter end did greatly increase. It was richly furnished with gifts and offerings, to which there were continual additions made. They shewed Christ these things, and desired him to take notice of them, either, (1.) As being greatly pleased with them; so the apostle, He rejoiced, and was glad with joy, Hos. 14. 5. Otherwise, they might have been more proper to have been admired. They had lived mostly in Galilee, at a distance from the temple, had seldom seen it, and therefore were the more struck with admiration at it, and thought he should admire, as much as they did, all this glory; (Gen. 51. 1.) and they would have him divert himself (after his preaching, and from his sorrow which they saw him perhaps almost overwhelmed with) was left to judge of and to commend it. Note, Good men are apt to be too much enamoured with outward pomp and gaiety, and to overvalue it, even in the things of God; whereas we should be as Christ was, dead to it, and look upon it with contempt. The temple was indeed glorious, but, (1.) Its glory was sullied and stained with the sin of the priests and people; that wicked doctrine of the Pharisees, which preferred the gold before the temple that sanctified it, was enough to deface the beauty of all the ornaments of the temple. [2.] Its glory was eclipsed and cut done by the presence of Christ in it, who was the glory of this latter house, (Hag. 2. 9.) so that the buildings had no glory, in comparison with that glory which excelled. Or, (2.) As grieving that this house should be left desolate; they shewed him the buildings, as if they would move him to reverse the sentence; "Lord, let not this house be, and beautiful house, which our fathers praised thee, be made a desolation." They forgot how many providences, concerning Solomon's temple, had manifested how little God cared for that outward glory which they had so much admired, when the people were wicked, 2 Chron. 7. 21. This house, which is high, will bring low. Christ had lately looked upon the precious stones, and wept for them, Luke 19. 41. The disciples look upon the temple buildings, and are ready to weep at them. In this, as in other things, his thoughts are not like our's. It was weakness, and meanness of spirit, in the disciples, to be so fond of fine buildings; it was a childish thing. Animus magni nihil magnus — To a great mind nothing is great. Seneca.

2. Christ, hereupon, foretells the utter ruin and destruction that were coming upon this place,
(1.) He speaks of it as a certain ruin; "I say unto you. I, that know what I say, and know how to make good what I say; take my word for it, it shall be so; I, the Amen, the true Witness, say it to you." All judgment being committed to the Son, the threatenings, as well as the promises, are all yea, and amen, in him, Heb. 6. 17. 18.

(2.) He speaks of it as a certain ruin. The temple shall be, stripped, plundered, and defaced, but utterly demolished and laid waste; Not one stone shall be left upon another. Notice is taken, in the building of the second temple, of the laying of one stone upon another; (Hag. 2. 15.) and here, in the ruin, of not leaving one stone upon another. History tells us, that this was fulfilled in the latter; for though Titus, when he took the city, did all he could to save the temple, and the true images of God; yet he did constrain the enraged soldiers from destroying it utterly; and it was done to that degree, that Turnus Rufus ploughed up the ground on which it had stood: thus that scripture was fulfilled, (Mic. 5. 12.) Zion shall, for your sake, be ploughed as a field. And afterward, in Julian the Apostate's time, when the Jews were encouraged by him to rebuild their temple, in reparation to the destruction of it, the seating of the ruins was quite pulled down, to level the ground for a new foundation; but the attempt was defeated by the miraculous eruption of fire out of the ground, which destroyed the foundation they laid, and frightened away the builders. Now this prediction of the final and irreparable ruin of the temple, includes a prediction of the period of the Levitical priesthood and the ceremonial law.

3. The disciples, not disputing either the truth of the equity of this sentence, nor doubting of the accomplishment of it, inquire more particularly of the time when it should come to pass, and the signs of its approach, v. 3. Observe,

(1.) Where they made this inquiry; privately, as he sat upon the mount of Olives; probably, he was returning to Bethany, and there sat down by the way, to rest, and the mouth of Olives was directly facing the temple, and from thence he might have a full prospect of it at some distance; there he sat as a judge upon the bench, the temple and city being before him as at the bar, and thus he passed sentence on them. We read (Ezek. 11. 23.) of the removing of the glory of the Lord from the temple to the mountain; so Christ, the great Shechinah, here removes to this mountain.

(2.) What the inquiry itself was; When shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world? Here are three questions.

[1.] Some think, these questions do all point at one and the same thing—the destruction of the temple, and the period of the Jewish church and nation, which Christ had himself spoken of at his coming, (ch. 21.) and which would be the consummation of the age, (for so it may be read,) the finishing of that dispensation. Or, they thought the destruction of the temple must needs be the end of the world. If that house be laid waste, the world cannot stand; for the Rabbins used to say, that the house of the sanctuary was one of the seven things for the sake of which the world was made; and they think, if so, the world will not survive the temple.

[2.] Others think their question, When shall these things be? refers to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the other two to the end of the world; or Christ's coming may refer to his setting up his kingdom, and the end of the world to the day of judgment. I rather incline to think that their question looked no further than the event Christ now foretold; but it appears, by other passages, that they had very confused thoughts of future events; so that perhaps it is not possible to put any certain construction upon this question of their's.

But Christ, in his answer, though he does not expressly rectify the mistakes of his disciples, (that must be done by the pouring out of the Spirit,) yet looks further than their question, and instructs his church, not only concerning the great events of that age, the destruction of Jerusalem, but concerning his second coming at the end of time, which here he insensibly slides into a discourse of; and of that, it is plain, he speaks in the next chapter, which is a continuation of this sermon.

4. And Jesus answered and said unto them, Take heed that no man deceive you. 5. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many. 6. And ye shall hear of wars, and rumours of wars; see that ye be not troubled: for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet. 7. For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places. 8. All these are the beginning of sorrows. 9. Then shall they deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you: and ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake. 10. And then shall many be offended, and shall betray one another, and shall hate one another. 11. And many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many. 12. And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. 13. But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved. 14. And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come. 15. When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand.) 16. Then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains. 17. Let him which is on the house-top not come down to take any thing out of his house: 18. Neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. 19. And woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days. 20. But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the sabbath day: 21. For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. 22. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened. 23. Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not. 24. For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect. 25. Behold, I have told you before. 26. Wherefore, if they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert; go not forth: behold, he is in the secret chambers; believe it not. 27. For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. 28. For wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together. 29. Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. 30. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. 31. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other.

The disciples had asked concerning the times, When these things should be? Christ gives them no answer to that, after what number of days and years his prediction should be accomplished, for it is not for us to know the times: (Acts 1:7.) but they had asked, What shall be the sign? That question he answered fully, for we are concerned to understand the signs of the times, ch. 16, 3.

Now the prophecy primarily respects the events near at hand—the destruction of Jerusalem, the period of the Jewish church and state, the calling of the Gentiles, and the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world; but as they more especially of the Old Testament, which has an immediate reference to the affairs of the Jews and the revolutions of their state, under the figure of them, do certainly look further, to the gospel-church and the kingdom of the Messiah, and are so expounded in the New Testament; and such expressions are found in those predictions as are peculiar thereto, and not applicable otherwise; so this prophecy, under the type of Jerusalem's destruction, looks as far forward as the general judgment: God, as is usual in prophecies, some passages are most applicable to the type, and others to the antitype; and toward the close, as usual, it points more particularly to the latter. It is observable, that what Christ here saith to his disciples, tends more to engage their attention than to satisfy their curiosity; much more for these events that should happen, than to give them any account of events themselves. This is that good understanding of the times which we should all covet, thence to infer what Israel ought to do: and so this prophecy is of standing lasting use to the church, and will be so to the end of time; for the thing that has been, is that which shall be. (Ecc. 1, 5, 6, 7, 9.) and the adverbies, conjunction, and presages, of events, are much the same still that they were then; so that upon the prophecy of this chapter, pointing at that event, moral prognostications may be made, and such constructions of the signs of the times, as the wise man's heart will know how to improve.

I. Christ here foretells the going forth of deceivers; he begins with a caution, Take heed that no man deceive you. They expected to be told when these things should be, to be let into that secret; but this caution is a check to their curiosity, What is that to you? Mind you your duty, follow me, and be not seduced from following me. Those that are most inquisitive concerning the secret things which belong not to them, are easiest imposed upon by seducers. 2 Thess. 2, 3. The disciples, when they heard that the Jews, their most inveterate enemies, should be destroyed, might be in danger of falling into a false joy. No, brethren, you are more exposed other ways. Seducers are more dangerous enemies to the church than persecutors.

Three times in this discourse he mentions the appearance of false prophets, which was, I. A presage of Jerusalem's ruin. Justly were they who killed the true prophets, left to be insaried by false prophets; and they who crucified the true Messiah, left to be deceived by false Christs and pretended Messiahs. The Jews had the occasion of dividing that people into parties and factions, which made their ruin the more easy and speedy; and the sin of the many, that were led aside by them, helped to fill the measure. 2. It was a trial to the disciples of Christ, and therefore agreeable to their state of probation, that they which are hewn down are not manifest. 3. Now concerning these deceivers, observe here.

(1.) The pretences they should come under. Satan acts most mischievously, when he appears as an angel of light; the colour of the greatest good is often the cover of the greatest evil.

[1.] There should appear false prophets, (v. 11, 24.) the deceivers would pretend to divine inspiration, and immediate mission, and a spirit of prophecy, when it was all a lie. Such there had been formerly, (Jer. 23, 16. Ezek. 13, 6.) as was foretold, Deut. 13, 3. Some think, the seducers were pointed to were such as had been settled teachers in the church, and had gained reputation as such, but afterward betrayed the truth they had taught, and revolted to error; and from such the danger is the greater, because least suspected. One false traitor in the garrison may do more mischief than a thousand avowed enemies without.

[2.] I am Christ, false Christs, coming in Christ's name, (v. 5.) assuming to themselves the name peculiar to him, and saying, I am Christ, pseudo-Christs, v. 24. There was at that time a general expectation of the appearing of the Messias; they spoke of him, as he that should come; but when he did come, the body of the nation rejected him; which those who were ambitious of making themselves a name, took advantage of, and set up for Christs. Josephus speaks of several such impostors between this and the destruction of Jerusalem; one Thendus, that was defeated by Cuspinus Fadus; another by Felix, another by Festus. Dosethens said, he was the Christ foretold by Moses, Origen adversus Caelum. See Acts 3, 36, 37. 21, 28. Simon Magus pretended to be the great power of God, Acts 8, 10. In after-ages there have been such pretenders, who have about them a great deal of what he himself called himself Bar-cohoba—The son of a star, but proved Bar-cobo—The son of a lie. About fifty years ago, Sabbati-Levi set up for a Messiah in the Turkish empire, and was greatly cared by the Jews; but in a short time his folly was made manifest: see Sir John Rycart's History. The popish religion doth, in effect, set up a false Christ; the Pope comes, in Christ's name, as his vicar, but invades and usurps all his offices, and so is a rival with him, and, as such, an enemy to him, a deceiver, and an antichrist.

[3.] These false Christs and false prophets would have their agents and emissaries busy in all places to draw people in to them, v. 23. Then public troubles are great and threatening, and people will be catching at any thing that looks like deliverance, then Satan will take the advantage of imposing on them; then they will say, Lo, here is a Christ, or there is one; but do not mind them: the true Christ did not strive, or cry; nor was it said of him, Lo here! or, Lo there! (Luke 17, 21.) therefore if any man say so concerning him, look upon it as a temptation. The hermits, who place religion in a monastical life, say, He is in the desert; the priests, who make the consecrated wafer to be Christ, say, He is in this bread, in this wafer, in the sacred chambers; lo, he is in this of the image. Thus some appropriate Christ's spiritual presence to one party or persuasion, as if they had the monopoly of Christ and Christianity; and the kingdom of Christ must stand and fall, must live and die, with them; Lo, he is in this church, in that council; whereas Christ is in all, not here or there, but meets his people. Blessing in every face, says he, under these names.

(2.) The proof they should offer for the making good of these pretences; They shall show great signs and wonders, (v. 24.) not true miracles, those are a divine seal, and with those the doctrine of Christ stands confirmed; and therefore, if any offer to draw us from that by signs and wonders, we must have recourse to that rule given of old, (Deut. 13, 1, 2, 3.) If any show a power to foretell the end of the world, then to shew signs they that would draw you in to believe other gods, or believe in other Christs, for the Lord your God proveth you. But these were lying wonders wrought by Satan, (God permitting him,) who is the prince of the power of the air, 2 Thess. 2, 9. It is not said, They shall work miracles, but, They shall show great signs; they are but a show; either they impose upon men's credulity by false narratives, or deceive their senses by tricks of legendarium, or arts of divination, as the magicians of Egypt by their enchantments.

(3.) The success they should have in these attempts.

[1.] They shall deceive many, (v. 5.) and again, (v. 10.) Note, The devil and his instruments may prevail far in deceiving poor souls; few find the strait gate, but many are drawn into the broad way; many will be imposed upon by their signs and wonders, and many drawn in by the hopes of deliverance from their oppressions. Note, Neither miracles nor multitudes are certain signs of a true church; for all the world wonders after the beast, Rev. 13. 3.

[2.] They shall deceive, if it were possible, the very elect, Matt. 24. This is the particular delusion of the delusion; it is such as many shall be carried away by, (so strange shall the stream be,) even those that were thought to stand fast. Men's knowledge, gifts, learning, eminent station, and long profession, will not secure them; but, notwithstanding these, many will be deceived; nothing but the almighty grace of God, pursuant to his eternal purpose, will be a protection. Secondly, The safety of the elect in the midst of this delusion is taken for granted in that parenthesis, If it were possible, plainly implying that it is not possible, for they are kept by the power of God, that the purpose of God, according to the election, may stand. It is possible for those that have been enlightened to fall away, (Heb. 6. 4, 5, 6.) but not for those that were elected. If God's chosen ones should be deceived, God's choice would be defaced, which belies the three graces, for whom he did predestinate, he called, justified, and glorified, Rom. 8. 30. They were given to Christ; and of all that were given to him he will lose none, John 10. 28. Grotius will have this to be meant of the great difficulty of drawing the primitive Christians from their religion, and quotes it as used proverbially by Galen; when he would express a thing very difficult and morally impossible, he said, You may sooner draw a wasp from Christ.

(4.) The repeated caution which our Saviour gives to his disciples to stand upon their guard against them; therefore he gave them warning, that they might watch; (v. 25.) Behold, I have told you before. He that is told before where he will be assaulted, may save himself, as the king of Israel did, 2 Kings 6. 9, 10. Note, Christ's warnings are designed to engage pursuers of unfaithfulness; and though the elect shall be preserved from delusion, yet they shall be preserved by the use of appointed means, and a due regard to the cautions of the word; we are kept through faith, faith in Christ's word, which he has told us before.

[1.] We must not believe those that say, Lo, here is Christ; or, Lo, he is there, v. 23. We believe that the true Christ is the right hand of God, and that his spiritual presence is where two or three are gathered together in his name. The devil therefore would draw you off from a Christ in heaven, by telling you he is anywhere on earth; or draw you off from the catholic church on earth, by telling you he is here, or he is there; believe it not. Note, There is not a greater enemy to true faith than vain credulity. The simple believe every word, and runs after every cry. Miserere mei, omnipotens virgo amabilis.

[2.] We must not go forth after those that say, He is in the desert, or, He is in the secret chambers, v. 26. We must not hearken to every empiric and pretender, nor follow every one that puts up the finger to point us to a new Christ, and a new gospel; Go not forth, for if you do, you are in danger of being taken by them; therefore keep out of harm's way; be not carried about with every wind; many a man's vain curiosity to go forth hath led him into a fatal apostacy; your strength at such a time is to sit still, to have the heart established with grace.

II. He foretells wars and great commotions among the nations, v. 6, 7. When Christ was born, there was a universal peace; but the birth of Janus was shewn; but think not that Christ came to send, or continue, such a peace; (Luke 12. 51.) no, his city and his wall are to be built even in troublesome times, and even wars shall forward his work. From the time that the Jews rejected Christ, and he left their house desolate, the sword did never depart from their house, the sword of the Lord was never quiet, because he had given it a charge against a good tithe of the people of his wrath, and by it brought ruin upon them.

Here is, 1. A prediction of the event of the day; You will now shortly hear of wars, and rumours of wars. When wars are, they will be heard; for every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, Isa. 9. 5. See how terrible it is, (Jer. 4. 10.) Thou hast heard, O my soul, the alarm of wars! Even the quiet in the land, and the least inquisitive after things of this world, hear of wars. See what comes of refusing the gospel! Those that will not hear the messengers of peace, shall be made to hear the messengers of war. God has a sword ready to avenge the quarrel of his covenant, his new covenant. Nation shall rise up against nation, that is, one part or province of the Jewish nation against another, one city against another; (2 Chron. 15. 5, 6.) and in the same province and city of another party of faction shall rise up against another, so that they shall be devoured by, and dashed in pieces against, one another, Isa. 9. 19, 21.

2. A prescription of the duty of the day; See that ye be not troubled. Is it possible to hear such sad news, and not be troubled? Yet, where the heart is fixed, trusting in God, it is kept in peace, and is not afraid, no not of the evil tidings of wars, and rumours of wars; no not the noise of Arm. arm. Be not troubled; and of this comfort, Be not just put into confusion or commotion; not put into throes, as a woman with child by a fright; See that ye be not—ignor. Note, There is need of constant care and watchfulness to keep trouble from the heart when there are wars abroad; and it is against the mind of Christ, that his people should have troubled hearts even in troublous times.

We must not be troubled, for two reasons:

(1.) Because we are bid to expect this; the Jews must be punished, ruin must be brought upon them; by this the justice of God and the honour of the Redeemer must be asserted; and therefore all those things must come to pass; the word is gone out of God's mouth, and it shall be accomplished in its season. Note, The consideration of the unchangeableness of the divine counsels, which govern all events, should compose and quiet our spirits, whatever happens. God is but performing the things which he has appointed for us, and our inordinate trouble is an intemperate quarrel with that appointment. Let us therefore acquiesce, because these things must come to pass; not only necessitate decreti—as the product of the divine counsel, but necessitate medit—as a means in order to a further end. The old house must be taken down, (though it cannot be done with out noise, and dust, and danger,) ere the new fabric can be erected; and the house of the new fabric (which is not to be utterly destroyed, though it may be shaken they,) must be removed, that the things which cannot be shaken may remain, Heb. 12. 27.

(2.) Because we are still to expect worse; The end is not yet; the end of time is not, and, while time lasts, we must expect trouble, and that the end of one affliction will be but the beginning of another; or, "The end of these troubles is not yet; there must be more judgments than one made use of to bring down the Jewish power; more vials of wrath must yet be poured out; there is but one woes past, more woes are yet to come, more arrows are yet to be spent upon them out of God’s quiver; therefore be not troubled, do not give way to fear and trouble, sink not under the present burden, but rather gather in all the strength and spirit you have, to encounter what is yet before you. You do not truly hear of wars and rumours of wars; for then what will become of you when the famines and pestilences come? If it be to us a vexation but to understand the report, (Isa. 28. 19.) what will it be to feel the stroke when it toucheth the bone and the flesh? If running with the footmen weary us, how shall we contend with horses? And if we be frightened at a little thing, what shall we do in the swellings of Jordan? Jer. 12. 5.

11. He foretells other judgments more immediately sent of God—famines, pestilences, and earthquakes. Famine is often the effect of war, and pestilence of famine. These were the three judgments which David was to choose one out of; and he was in a great strait, for he knew not which was the worse. But what dreadful desolations will they make, when they all proceed together? Beside war, (and that is enough,) there shall be, 1. Famine, signified by the black horse under the third seal, Rev. 6. 5, 6. We read of a famine in Judea, not long after Christ’s time, which was very impoverishing; (Acts 11. 28, 29.) but the sorest famine was in Jerusalem during the siege. See Lam. 4. 9, of it. 2. Pestilences, signified by the pale horse, and Death upon him, and the grave at his heels, under the fourth seal, Rev. 6. 7, 8. This destroys without distinction, and in a little time lays heaps upon heaps. 3. Earthquakes in divers places, or from place to place, pursuing those that flee from them, as they did from the earthquake in the days of Uzziah, Zech. 14. 5. Great desolations have sometimes been made by earthquakes, of late and formerly; they have been the death of many, and the terror of more. In the apocalyptic visions, it is observable, that earthquakes bode good, and no evil, to the church, Rev. 6. 12. Compare v. 15—11. 12, 13, 19, 16—17—19. When God shakes terribly the earth, (Isa. 2, 21.) it is to shake the wicked out of it, (Job 38. 13.) and to introduce the Desire of all nations, Hag. 2, 6, 7. But he speaks of these spoken judgments, and yet but the beginning of sorrows, Mirae—or travelling pains, quick, violent, yet tedious too. Note, When God judgeth, he will override; when he begins in wrath, he will make a full end, 1 Sam. 3, 12. When we look forward to the eternity of misery that is before the obstinate refusers of Christ and his gospel, we may truly say, concerning the greatest temporal judgments, “They are but the beginning of sorrows, as thine are with them, there is worse behind.”

IV. He foretells the persecution of his own people and ministers, and a general apostacy and decay in religion, thereupon, v. 9, 10, 12, 13. Observe, 1. The cross itself foretold, v. 9. Note, Of all future events, we are as much concerned, though constant temptations are desirous, to know of our own sufferings as of any other. 2. When famines and pestilences prevail, then shall they impiate them to the Christians, and make that a pretence for persecuting them; Christianas ad leones—Away with Christians to the lions. Christ had told his disciples, when he first sent them out, what hard things they should suffer, but they had hitherto experienced little of it. And therefore he reminds them again, that the less they had suffered, the more there was behind to be filled up, Col. 1, 24. 1. They shall be afflicted with bonds and prisons, cruel mockings and scourgings, as blessed Paul; (2 Cor. 11. 23, 25.) not killed outright, but killed all the day long, in deaths often, killed so as to feel themselves die, made a spectacle to the world, 1 Cor. 4. 9, 11.

2. They shall be killed; so cruel are the church’s enemies, that nothing less will satisfy them than the blood of the saints, which they thirst after, suck, and shed, like water.

3. They shall be hated of all nations for Christ’s name’s sake, as he had told them before, ch. 10. 22. The world was generally leavened with enmity and malignity to Christians; the Jews, though stupid to the heathen, were never persecuted by them so as the Christians were; they were hated by the Jews that were saved at the destruction of Jerusalem; they were the common butt of the world’s malice. What shall we think of this world, when the best men had the worst usage in it? It is the cause that makes the martyr, and comforts him; it was for Christ’s sake that they were thus hated; their professing and preaching his name incensed the nations so much against them; the devil, finding a fatal shock thereby given to his kingdom, and that his time was likely to be short, can do nothing in great wrath.

2. The offence of the cross, v. 10, 12. Satan thus carries on his interest by force of arms, though Christ, at length, will bring glory to himself out of the sufferings of his people and ministers. Three ill effects of persecution are here foretold: (1.) The apostasy of some. When the profession of Christianity begins to cost men dear, then shall many be offended; shall first fall out with, and then fall off from, their profession; they will begin to pick quarrels with their religion, sit loose to it, grow weary of it, and at length revolt from it. Note, [1.] It is no new thing (though it is a strange thing) for those that have known the way of righteousness, to turn aside out of it. Paul often complains of desertors, who began well, but sometimes hindered them. They were with us, but went out from us, because their profession cost them any thing, they quit it presently. (2.) The malignity of others. When persecution is in fashion, envy, enmity, and malice, are strangely diffused into the minds of men by contagion; and charity, tenderness, and moderation, are looked upon as singularities, which make a man like a speckled bird. Then they shall betray one another, that is, three times; for treasure is first accumulated, and then directly contrary to two of the best, (truth and love,) shall have the ascendant. This seems to refer to the barbarous treatment which the several contending factions among the Jews gave to one another; and justly were they, who eat up God’s people as they eat bread, left thus to bite and devour one another till they were consumed one of another; or it may refer to the mischiefs done to Christ’s disciples by those that were nearest to them, as ch. 10. 21. The brother shall deliver up the brother to death.
(3.) The general declining and cooling of most, v. 12. In seducing times, when false prophets arise, in persuading those when the saints are hated, expect these two things: 1. The abounding of iniquity; though the world always lies in wickedness, yet there are some times in which it may be said, that iniquity doth in a special manner abound; as when it is more extensive than ordinary, as in the old world, when all flesh had corrupted their way; and when it is more excessive than ordinary, as in Christ's time, when Christ's disciples were hot in their wickedness, (Exod. 7. 11.) so that hell seems to be broke loose in blasphemies against God, and enmities to the saints.

[2.] The abating of love; this is the consequence of the former: Because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. Understand it in general of true serious godliness, which is all summed up in love; it is too common for professors of religion to grow cold in their profession, when the wicked are hot in their wickedness; as the church of Ephesus in bad times left her first love, Rev. 2. 4. Or, may be understood more particularly of brethrenly love. When iniquity abounds, seducing iniquity, persecuting iniquity, this grace commonly waxeth cold. Christians begin to be shy and suspicious one of another; affections are alienated, distances created, parties made, and so love comes to nothing.

This gives a melancholy prospect of the times, that there shall be such a great decay of love; but, First, it is of the love of many not of all. In the worst of times, God has his remnant that hold fast their integrity, and retain their zeal, as in Elijah's days, when there was evil abounding throughout all the land, and the people were without bread; yet God was ready to save his prophets, and preserve and comfort them, as he did in the days of the judges, when the people were so wicked as to provoke God to cast them out of the land; yet God preserved a remnant, and gave strength to those that feared him, who were against the heathen by whom they were reproached, and by whom their lives were in danger.

3. Comfort administered in reference to this offence of the cross, for the support of the Lord's people under it; (v. 13.) He that endureth to the end shall be saved. This is a promise of the grace of God well to the cause of Christ in general, that, though many are offended, yet some shall endure to the end. When we see so many drawing back, we are ready to fear that the cause of Christ will sink for want of supporters, and his name be left and forgotten for want of some to make profession of it; but even at this time there is a remnant according to the election of grace, Rom. 11. 5. It is spoken of the same time that this prophecy has reference to; a remnant who are not of them that draw back unto perdition, but believe and persevere to the saving of the soul; they endure to the end, to the end of their lives, to the end of their present state of probation, or to the end of these suffering trying times, to the last encounter, though they shall be called to resist unto blood. (2.) It is comfortable to those who do thus endure to the end, and suffer for their constancy, that they shall be saved. Perseverance wins the crown through free grace, and shall wear it. They shall be saved; perhaps they may be delivered out of their troubles, and comfortably survive them in this world; but it is the eternal salvation that is here intended. They that endure to the end of their days, shall receive the end of their faith and hope, even the salvation of their souls. 1 Pet. 1. 9. Rom. 2. 7. Rev. 3. 20. The contrast of glory with self-love, and death, and abasing regard to that will enable us to choose rather to die at a stake with the persecuted, than to live in a palace with the persecutors.

V. He foretells the preaching of the gospel in all the world; (v. 14.) This gospel shall be preached, and then shall the end come. Observe here, 1. It is called the gospel of the kingdom, because it reveals the kingdom of grace, which leads to the kingdom of glory, sets up Christ's kingdom in this world; and secures ours in the other world. 2. This gospel, sooner or later, is to be preached in all the world, to every creature, and all nations are to be discipled by it; for in it Christ is to be Salvation to the ends of the earth; for this end the gift of tongues was the sign foretold, Acts 2. 33. It is preached to be a witness to all nations, that is, a faithful declaration of the mind and will of God concerning the duty which God requires from man, and the recompence which man may expect from God. It is a record, (1 John 5. 11.) it is a witness, for those who believe, that they shall be saved, and against those who persist in unbelief, that they shall be damned. See Mat. 10. 17. But how does this come in here? 1. It is intimated that the gospel should be, if not heard, yet at least heard of, throughout the then known world, before the destruction of Jerusalem; that the Old-Testament church should not be quite dissolved till the New-Testament was pretty well settled, had got considerable footing, and began to make some figure. Better is the face of a corrupt degenerate church than none at all. Within forty years after the first resurrection of Christ, the gospel was borne forth to the ends of the earth, Rom. 10. 18. St. Paul fully preached the gospel from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum; and the other apostles were not idle. The persecuting of the saints at Jerusalem helped to disperse them, so that they went everywhere, preaching the word, Acts 8. 1, 4. And when the tidings of the Redeemer are sent over all parts of the world, then shall come the end of the Jewish state. Thus, that which they thought to procure by means of the gospel to Christ to death, they thereby procured; all men believed on him, and the Romans came, and took away their place and nation, John 11. 48. Paul speaks of the gospel being come to all the world, and preached to every creature, Col. 1. 6, 23.

(2.) It is likewise intimated, that, even in times of temptation, trouble, and persecution, the gospel of the kingdom shall be dispersed by the preaching of it, and shall force its way through the greatest opposition. Though the enemies of the church grow very hot, and many of her friends very cool, yet the gospel shall be preached. And even then, when many fall by the sword and by flame, and many do wickedly, and are corrupted by flatteries, yet then the people that do know their God shall be strengthened to do the greatest exploits of all, in instructing many; see Dan. 11. 32, 33, and see an instance, Phil. 1. 12, 14.

(3.) That which seems chiefly intended here, is, that the end of the world shall be then, and not till then, when the gospel has done its work in the world. The gospel shall be preached, and that work carried on, when you are dead; so that all nations, first or last, shall have either the enjoyment, or the refusal, of the gospel; and then come the end, when the kingdom shall be delivered up to God, even the Father; when the mystery of God shall be finished, the mystical body completed, and the nations either converted and saved, or convicted and silenced, by the gospel; then shall the end come, of which he had said before, (v. 6, 7.) not yet, not till those intermediate counsels be fulfilled. The world shall stand as long as any of God's chosen ones remain uncalled; but, when they are all gathered in, it will be set on fire immediately.

VI. He foretells more particularly the ruin that was coming upon the people of the Jews, their city, temple, and nation, v. 15, &c. Here he comes more closely to answer their question concerning the deso
The Romans setting up the abomination of desolation in the holy place. v. 15. Now, (1.) Some understand by this an image, or statue, set up in the temple by some of the Roman governors, which was very offensive to the Jews, provoked them to rebel, and so brought the desolation upon them. The image of Jupiter Olympus, which Antiochus caused to be set up upon the altar of God, is called by the historian, 1 Mac. 1. 54. The abomination of desolation, the very word here used by the historian, 1 Mac. 1. 54. Since the captivity in Babylon, nothing was, nor could be, more distasteful to the Jews than an image in the holy place, as appeared by the mighty opposition they made when Gallipula offered to set up his statute there, which had been of fatal consequence, if it had not been prevented, and the matter accommodated, by the conduct of Petronius; but Herod did set up an eagle over the temple-gate; and, some say, the statue of Titus was set up in the temple. (2.) Others choose to expand it by the parallel place, (Luke 21. 20.) when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies. Jerusalem was the holy city, Canaan the holy land, the mount Moriah, which lay about Jerusalem, for its nearness to the temple, was, they thought, as it were a hand in the mouth of the country lying round about Jerusalem the Roman army was encamped, that was the abomination that made desolate. The land of an enemy is said to be the land which thou abhorrest; (Isa. 7. 16.) so an enemy's army, to a weak but wily people, may well be called the abomination. Now this is said to be spoken of by Daniel the prophet, who spoke more plainly of the desolation of Messiah and his kingdom than any of the Old-Testament prophets did. He speaks of an abomination making desolate, which should be set up by Antiochus; (Dan. 11. 31.—12. 11.) but this, that our Saviour refers to, we have in the message that the angel brought him, (Dan. 9. 27.) of what shall come to the end at seventy weeks, long after the former; for the overspreading of abominations, or, as the margin reads it, with the abominable armies, (which some understand means idolatry,) shall make it desolate. Armies of idolaters may well be called abominable armies; and, some think, the tumults, insurrections, and abominable faction and seditions, in the city and temple, may at least be taken in as part of the abomination making desolate. Christ refers them to that prophecy of Daniel, that they might see how the ruin of their city and temple was spoken of in the Old Testament, which would both confirm his prediction, and take off the odium of it. They might likewise from thence gather the time of it—soon after the cutting off Messiah the Prince; the sin that procured it—their rejecting him, and the certainty of it—it is a desolation determined. As Christ by his precepts confirmed the law, so by his predictions he confirmed the prophecies of the Old Testament, and it will be of good use to compare both together.

Reference being here had to a prophecy, which is commonly dark and obscure, Christ inserts this memorandum, "Whoso readeth, let him understand; whose readeth the prophecy of Daniel, let him understand that it is to have its accomplishment now shortly in the desolations of Jerusalem." Note, Those that read the scriptures should labour to understand the scriptures, else their reading is to little purpose; we cannot use that which we do not understand. See John 5. 39. Acts 8. 30. The angel, that delivered this prophecy to Daniel, stirred him up to know and understand, Dan. 9. 25. And we must not despair of understanding even dark pro-phiccies; the great New-Testament prophecy is called a revelation, not a secret. Now, things revealed belong to us, and therefore must be humbly and diligently searched into. Or, Let him understand, not as the Saviour means here, but the disciples. Thus the scriptures, let him understand the times. Chron. 12. 32. Let him observe and take notice, so some read it; let him be assured, that, notwithstanding the vain hopes with which the deluded people fed themselves, the abominable armies will make desolate.

2. The means of preservation which thinking men should betake themselves to; (v. 23.) Then let them which are in Judea flee. Then concludes, there is no other way to help yourselves than by flying for the same. We may take this,

(1.) As a prediction of the ruin itself; that it should be irresistible; that it would be impossible for the stoutest hearts to make head against it, or contend with it, but they must have recourse to the last shift, getting out of the way. It speaks that which Jeremiah so much insisted upon, but in vain, when Jerusalem was besieged by the Chaldeans, that it would be to no purpose to resist, but that it was their wisdom to yield and capitulate; and so Christ here, to shew how fruitless it would be to stand it out, bids every one make the best of his way.

(2.) We may take it as a direction to the followers of Christ what to do, not to say, A confederacy with those who are in Judea is the last hope of empire, or the preservation of the city and nation, only that they might consume the wealth of both upon their lusts; (for this very affair the struggles of the Jews against the Roman power, some years before their final overthrow, the apostle refers, Jam. 4. 1—3.) but let them acquiesce in the decree that was gone forth, and with all speed quit the city and country, as they would quitt a falling house or a sinking ship, and get away, if possible, before the storm. Thus did theusted of Jehoiakim and Ahabram; he shews them,

[1.] Whither they must flee—from Judea to the mountains; not the mountains round about Jerusalem, but those in the remote corners of the land, which would be some shelter to them, not so much by their strength as by their secrecy. Israel is said to be scattered among the mountains; (2 Chron. 13. 18.) and thus did the ten tribes, which were the descendants of the twelve who passed from the lion's den, and the mountains of the leopards, than among the seditious Jews, or the enraged Romans. Note, In times of imminent peril and danger, it is not only lawful, but our duty, to seek our own preservation by all good and honest means; and if God opens a door of escape, we ought to make our escape, otherwise we do not trust God, but tempt him. There may be a time when even those that are in Judea, where God is known, and his name is great, must flee to the mountains; and while we only go out of the way of danger, not out of the way of duty, we may trust God to provide a dwelling for his outcasts, Isa. 16. 4, 5. In times of public calamity, when it is manifest that we cannot be serviceable at home, and may be safe abroad, Providence calls us to make our escape. He that flees may find again.

[2.] What haste they must make, v. 17, 18. The life will be in danger, in imminent danger, the scourge will slay suddenly; and therefore he that is on the house-top, when the alarm comes, let him not come down into the house, to look after his effects there, but go the nearest way down, to make his escape; and so he that shall be in the field will find the house that he hath sought and was inquiring for the Romans to return to fetch his clothes or the wealth of his house, for two reasons, First, Because the time which would be taken up in packing up his things would delay his flight. Note, When death is at the door, delays are dangerous; it was the charge to Lot.
Look not behind thee. Those that are convinced of the misery of a sinful state, and the rain that attends them in that state, and, consequently, of the necessity of their fleeing to Christ, must take heed, lest, after all these convictions, they perish eternally by delays. Secondly, Because the carrying of his clothes, and his other moveables and valuables, with him, would but burden him, and clog his flight. The Syrians, in their flight, used not any thing to load them. 12 Sentenc. 7. 1. At such a time we must be thankful if our lives be given us for a prey, though we can save nothing. Jer. 45. 4, 5. For the life is more than meat, ch. 6. 25. Those who carried off, least, were safest in their flight. Cantabt vaccaea carrum larvator—The moneyless traveller can lose nothing by robbers. It was to his own disciples that Christ recommended this forgetfulness of their house and clothes, when he said, if the world be then heaven, treasure there, and durable clothing, which the enemy could not plunder them of. Omnia mea mecum porto—I have all my property with me, said Bias the philosopher in his flight empty-handed. He that has grace in his heart, carries his all along with him, when strip of all.

Now, those to whom Christ said this immediately, did not live to see this dismal day, none of all the thousands that perished in the destruction of Jerusalem; for they had gone up into the mountains, (Christ hid them in heaven,) but they left the direction to their successors in profession, who pursued it, and it was of use to them; for, when the Christians in Jerusalem and Judea saw the ruin coming on, they all retired to a town called Pelus, on the other side Jordan, where they were safe; so that, of the many thousands that perished in the destruction of Jerusalem, there was not so much as one. Christians, Euseb. Ecol. Hist. lib. 3. cap. 5. Thus the prudent man foresees the evil, and hides himself, Prov. 22. 3. Heb. 11. 7. This warning was not kept private. St. Matthew’s gospel was published long before that destruction, so that others might have taken the advantage of it; but their perishing through their unbelief of this, was a figure of their eternal perishing through their unbelief of the warnings Christ gave concerning the coming of such a conformation.

[3.] Whom it would go hard with at that time; (v. 19.) Woe to them that are with child, and to them that gave suck. To this same event that saying of Christ at his death refers, (Luke 23. 29.) They shall say, Blessed are the wombs that never bare, and the laps that never gave suck. Happy are they that have no children to see the murder of; but most unhappy those, whose labours are then heaven, their pains then giving suck; they of all others must be in the most melancholy circumstances. First, To them the famine would be most grievous, when they should see the tongue of the sucking child cleaving to the roof of his mouth for thirst, and themselves by the calamity made more cruel than the sea monsters, Lam. 4. 3, 4. Secondly, To them the sword would be most terrible, when it is in the hand of whose the brutal rage. It is a direful midwife, when the wound is delivered. Thirdly, To them the enraged conqueror, (2 Kings 15. 16. Hos. 13. 16. Amos 1. 13.) or the children brought forth to the murderers, Hos. 9. 13. Thirdly, To them also the flight would be most afflicting; the women with child cannot make haste, or go far; the sucking child cannot be left behind; or, if it should, can a woman forget it, that she should not have compassion of the opulent young mother? (2) 2 Peter 3. 9.) Carried along, it retarded the mother’s flight, and so exposes her life, and is in danger of Mephibosheth’s fate, who was lamed by a fall he got in his nurse’s flight, 2 Sam. 4. 4.

[4.] What they should pray against at that time—that your flight be not in the winter, or on the sabbath day, v. 20. Observe, in general, it becomes Christ’s disciples, in times of public trouble and calamity, to be much in prayer; that is a salve for every sore, never out of season, but in a special manner seasonable when we are distressed on every side. There is no remedy but you must flee, the decree is gone forth, so that God will not he treated to take away his wrath, no not if Noah, Daniel, and Job, stood before him. Let it suffice them sufficient that they desire to be taken away, to make the best of that which is; and when you cannot in faith pray that you may not be forced to flee, yet pray that the circumstances of it may be graciously ordered, that though the cup may not pass from you, yet the extremity of the judgment may be prevented. Note, God has the disposing of the circumstances of events, which sometimes make a great alteration one way or other; and therefore in such an hour of trouble as this, Christ’s bidding them pray for this favour, intimates his purpose of granting it to them; and in a general calamity we must not overlook a circumstantial kindness, but see and own wherein it might have been worse. Christ still bids his disciples to pray for themselves and their friends, that, whenever they were forced to flee, it might be in the most convenient time. Note, When the body of Christ is put to the test, it is proper to lay in a stock of prayers beforehand; they must pray, First, That their flight, if it were the will of God, might not be in the winter, when the days are short, the weather cold, the ways dirty, and therefore travelling very uncomfortable, especially for whole families. Paul hastens Timothy to come to him before winter, 2 Tim. 4. 21. Note, Though the case of the body is not to be mainly consulted, it ought to be duly considered; though we may make what God sends, and when he sends it, yet we may pray against bodily inconveniences, and are encouraged to do so, in that the Lord is for the body. Secondly, That it might not be on the sabbath day; not on the Jewish sabbath, because travelling then would give offence to them who were angry with the disciples for plucking the ears of corn on that day; not on the Christian sabbath, because being forced to travel on that day they should be free from grief to themselves. This intimates Christ’s design, that a weekly sabbath should be observed in his church, after the preaching of the gospel to all the world. We read not of any of the ordinances of the Jewish church, which were purely ceremonial, that Christ ever expressed any care about, because they were all to vanish; but for the sabbath he often shewed a concern. It intimates likewise that the sabbath was originally to be observed as a day of rest from travel and worldly labour; but that, according to his own explication of the fourth commandment, works of necessity were lawful on the sabbath day, as this of feasting from an enemy to save our lives; had it not been lawful, he would have said, “Whatever becomes of you, do not flee on the sabbath day; but abide by it, though you die by it.” For we must not commit the least sin, to escape the greatest trouble. But it intimates, that where it is very unseasonable uncomfortable to a good man, to be taken off by any work of necessity from the solemn service and worship of God on the sabbath day. We should pray that we may have quiet unobstructed sabbaths, and may have no other work than sabbath work to do on sabbath days; that we may attend upon the Lord without distraction. It was desirable, that, if they must flee, they might have the benevolence of him who desired them to help to bear their charges. To flee in the winter is uncomfortable to the body; but to flee on the sabbath day is so to the soul, and the more so when it remembers former sabbaths, as Ps. 42. 4. 3. The greatness of the troubles which should immediately ensue; (v. 21.) Then shall be great tribu-lution: then when the measure of iniquity is full; then when the servants of God are sealed and secured. Then shall the holy children be delivered out of the hand of Sodom till Lot is cutted into Zoor, and then look for fire and brimstone immediately. There shall be great tribulation. Great indeed, when within the city plague and famine raged, and (worse than either) faction and division, so that every man's sword was against his fellow; then, and there, it was, that the hands of the pitiful women flowered their own children. Without the city the Red Sea army, ready to swallow them up, with a particular rage against them, not only as Jews, but as rebellious Jews. War was the only one of the three sore judgments that David excepted against; but that was by it which the Jews were ruined; and there were famine and pestilence in extremity, besides. Josephus's History of the Wars of the Jews has it in more tragical passages than perhaps any history whatsover.

(1.) It was a desolation unparalleled, such as was not since the beginning of the world, nor ever shall be. Many a city and kingdom has been made desolate, but never any with desolation like this. Let not daring sinners think that God has done his worst, he can heat the furnace seven times, and yet seven times hotter, and will, when he sees greater and still greater absurdities. But, Jos. 37, 27, when they destroyed Jerusalem, were degenerated from the honour and virtue of their ancestors, which had made even their victories easy to be vanquished. And the wildness and obstinacy of the Jews themselves contributed much to the increase of the tribulation. No wonder that the ruin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled ruin, when the sin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled sin; even their crucifying Christ. The nearer any people are to God in profession and privileges, the greater and heavier will his judgments be upon them, if they abuse those privileges, and be false to that profession. Amos 3. 2.

(2.) It was a desolation which, if it should continue long, would be intolerable, so that no flesh should be saved, v. 22. So triumphantly would death ride, in so many dismal streets, and with such attendants, that there would be few escapees, either first or last, all would be cut off. He that escaped one sword, would fall by another, Isa. 24. 17, 18. The computation which Josephus makes of those that were slain in several places amounts to above two millions, No flesh shall be saved; he doth not say, "No soul shall be saved," for the destruction of the flesh may be for the saving of the spirit in the day of the Lord Jesus; but temporal lives will be sacrificed so profusely, that one would think, if it last a while, it would make a full end.

But here is one word of comfort in the midst of all this terror—that for the elect's sake these days shall be shortened, not made shorter than what God had determined, (for that which is determined shall be poured upon the desolate, Dan. 9. 27,) but shorter than the world, the end of which he will deal with them according to their sins; shorter than what the enemy designed, who would have cut all off, if God, who made use of them to serve his own purpose, had not set bounds to their wrath; shorter than one, who judged by human probabilities, would have imagined. Note, [1.] In times of common calamity God manifests his favour to the elect remaining, who, in a manner, will then make up, his peculiar treasure, which he will preserve when the common lumber is abandoned to the spoiler. [2.] The shortening of calamities is a kindness God often grants for the elect's sake. Instead of complaining that our afflictions last so long, if we consider our defects, we shall see reason to be thankful that they do not last always; when it is bad with us, it becomes us to say, "Blessed be God that it is no worse; blessed be God that it is not hell, and endless and remnant misery." It was a lamenting church that used the words here, 1. of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed; and it is for the sake of the elect, lest their spirit should fail before them, if he should contend for ever, and lest they should be tempted to put forth, if not their heart, yet their hand, to iniquity.

And now comes in the repeated caution, which was opened before, to take heed of being insnared by false Christs, false apostles, (27.) who would promise them deliverance, as the lying prophets in Jeremiah's time, (Jer. 14. 13.—25. 16, 17.—27. 16.—28. 2,) but would delude them. Times of great trouble are times of great temptation, and therefore we have need to double our guard then. If they shall say, Here is a Christ, or there is one, that shall deliver us from the Romans, do not heed them, it is all but talk; such a deliverance is not to be expected, and therefore not such a deliverer.

VII. He foretells the sudden spreading of the gospel in the world about the time of these great events; (v. 27, 28.) As the lightning comes out of the east, so shall the coming of the Son of man be. It comes in here, as an antidote against the poison of those seducers that said, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there; compare Luke 17. 23, 24. Hearken not to them, for the coming of the Son of man will be as the lightning.

1. It seems primarily to be meant of his coming to set up his spiritual kingdom in the world; where the gospel came in its light and power, there the Son of man came, and in a way quite contrary to the fashion of the seducers and false Christs, who came creeping in the desert, or the secret chambers; (2 Tim. 3. 5.) whereas Christ comes not with such a spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. The gospel would be remarkable for two things:

(1.) Its swift spreading; it shall fly as the lightning; so shall the gospel be preached and propagated. The gospel is light; (John 3. 19,) and it is not in this as the lightning, that it is a sudden flash, and away; for it is sun-light, and day-light; but it is lightning in these respects:

[1.] It is light from heaven, as the lightning. It is God, and not man, that sends the lightnings, and summons them, that they may go, and say, Here we are, Job 38. 35. It is God that directs it: (Job 37. 3.) To man it is one of nature's miracles, above his power to effect, and one of nature's mysteries, above his skill to account for, but is from above; his lightnings lightened the world, Ps. 97. 4.

[2.] It is visible and conspicuous as the lightning. The seducers carried on their depths in Satan in the desert, and the secret chambers, shunning the light; heretics were called lucifuge—light-shunners. But truth seeks no corners, however it may sometimes be forced into them, as the woman in the wilderness, though elusiveness with the sun, Rev. 12. 1, 6. Christ preached openly, as 2 Cor. 11. 10; and his apostles on the house-tops, (ch. 10. 27,) not in a corner, Acts 26. 26. See Ps. 98. 2.

[3.] It was sudden and surprising to the world as the lightning; the Jews indeed had predictions of it, but to the Gentiles it was altogether unlooked for, and came upon them with an unaccountable energy or ever they were aware. It was light out of darkness, ch. 4. 6. And the Lord made the confused armies of lightnings, 2 Sam. 22. 15. Ps. 144. 6. The powers of darkness were dispersed and vanquished by the gospel-lightning.

[4.] It spreads far and wide, and that quickly and irresistibly, like the lightning, which comes, supposing out of the east, (Christ is said to ascend from the east, Rev. 7. 2. Isa. 41. 2,) and lighteneth to the west. The propagating of Christianity to so many distant countries, of divers languages, by such unlikely instruments, destitute of all secular advantages, and in the face of so much opposition, and this in so short a time, was one of the greatest miracles that was ever wrought for the confirmation of it; here was Christ upon his white horse, denoting speed as well as strength, and going on conquering and to conquer, Rev. 19. 1. Gospel-light rose with the sun, and went with the same, so that the beams of it reached to the ends of the earth, Rom. 10. 18. Compare with Ps. 19. 3, 4. Though it was fought against, it could never be cooped up in a desert, or in a secret place, as the seducers were; but by this, according to Gamaliel's rule, proved itself to be of God, that it could not be overthrown, Acts 5. 38, 39. Christ speaks of shining into the west, because it spread most effectually into those countries which lay west from Jerusalem, as Mr. Herbert observes in his Church-Militant. He gathered them, not by external compulsion, but, as it were, by such a natural instinct and inclination, as brings the birds of prey to their prey; for where the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together, (v. 28.) where Christ is preached, souls will be gathered in to him. The lifting up of Christ from the earth, that is, the preaching of Christ crucified, which, one would think, should drive all men from him, will draw them to him. (John 12. 32.) According to Jacob's prophecy, that to him shall the gathering of the people be, Gen. 49. 10. See Isa. 60. 8. The eagles will be where the carcase is, for it is food for them, it is a feast for them; where the slay are, there is the shephe to Job 39. 30. Eagles are said to have a strange sagacity and quickness of scent to find out the prey, and then fly swiftly to it, Job 9. 26. So these, whose spirits God shall open, will be effectually drawn to Jesus Christ, to feed upon him; whither should the eagle go but to the prey? Whether should the soul go but to Jesus Christ, who has the words of eternal life? The eagles will distinguish what is proper for them from that which is not; so those who have spiritual senses exercised, will know the voice of the good Shepherd from that of a thief and a robber. Saints will be where the true Christ is, not the false Christs. This is applicable to the desires that are wrought in every grace-worked soul, who love Christ, and communion with him. Where he is in his ordinances, there will his servants choose to be. A living principle of grace is a kind of natural instinct in all the saints, drawing them to Christ, to live upon him.

2. Some understand these verses of the coming of the Son of man to destroy Jerusalem, Mal. 3. 1, 2. So there was there of an extraordinary display of divine power and justice in that event, that it is called the coming of Christ.

Now here are two things intimated concerning it.

(1.) That to the most it would be as unexpected as a flash of lightning, which indeed gives warning of the clap of thunder which follows, but is itself surprising. The seducers say, Lo, here is Christ to deliver us; or there is one, a creature of their own fancies; but here they are aware of the wrath of the Lord, the true Christ, will arrest them, and they shall not escape.

(2.) That it might be as justly expected as that the eagle should fly to the carcases; though they put far from them the evil day, yet the desolation will come as certainly as the birds of prey to a dead carcase, that lies exposed in the open field. [1.] The Jews were so corrupt and degenerate, so vile and vicious, that they were become a carcase, obnoxious to the righteous judgment of God: they were also so factious and seditious, and every way so provoking to the Romans, that they had made themselves obnoxious to their resentment, and an inviting prey to them. [2.] The Romans were as eagles upon a carcase, so eager to carry away and devour that carcase. The army of the Chaldeans is said to fly as the eagle that hateth to eat, Hab. 1. 8. The ruin of the New-Testament Babylon is represented by a call to the birds of prey to come and feast upon the slain, Rev. 19. 17, 18. Notorious malcontents have their eyes eaten out by the young eagles, Prov. 30. 17. The Jews were hung up in chains, Jer. 7. 23—16. 4. [3.] The Jews can no more preserve themselves from the Romans than the eagles can secure itself from the eagles. [4.] The destruction shall find out the Jews, wherever they are, as the eagle scents the prey. Note, When a people do by their sin make themselves carcases, putrid and loathsome, nothing can be expected but that God should send eagles among them, to devour and destroy them.

It is very applicable to the day of judgment, the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ in that day, and our gathering together unto him, 2 Thess. 2. 1. Now see here,

(1.) How he shall come; as the lightning. The time was now at hand, when he should depart out of the world, to go to the Father. Therefore these that inquire after Christ must not go into the desert or the secret places, nor listen to every one that will put on the fatten to invite them to a sight of Christ; but let them look upward, for the heavens must contain him, and thence we look for the Saviour; (Phil. 3. 20.) he shall come in the clouds, as the lightning doth, and every eye shall see him, as they say it is natural for all living creatures to turn their faces toward the lightning, Rev. 1. 7. Christ will appear to all the world, from one end of heaven to the other; nor shall any thing be hid from the light of his countenance.

(2.) How the saints shall be gathered to him; as the eagles are to the carcase by natural instinct, and with the greatest swiftness and alacrity imaginable. Saints, when they shall be fetched to glory, will be carried as on eagles' wings. (Exod. 19. 4.) as on angels' wings. They shall mount up with wings, like eagles, and, like them, renew their youth.

VIII. He foretells his second coming at the end of time, or to the end of the world. The sun shall be darkened, Jer. 12. 1. Some think this is to be understood only of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation; the darkening of the sun, moon, and stars, denotes the eclipse of the glory of that state, its convulsions, and the general confusion that attends that desolation. Great slaughter and devastation are in the Old Testament thus set forth: (as Isa. 13. 10—34. 4. Ezek. 32. 7. Joel 2. 31.) or by the sun, moon, and stars, may be intended the cities of Judah, Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, which should all come to ruin. The sign of the Son of man, (v. 36.) means a signal appearance of the power and justice of the Lord Jesus in it, avenging his own blood on them that imprecated the guilt of it upon them and their children; and the gathering of the elect, (v. 31.) signifies the delivering of a remnant from this sin and ruin. It seems rather to refer to Christ's second coming. The destruction of the particular enemies of the church was typical of the complete request of them all; and therefore what will be done really, at the great day, may be applied metaphorically to those destructions: but still we must attend to the principal scope of them; and, while we are all agreed to expect Christ's second coming, what need is there to put such strained constructions, as some do, upon these verses, which speak of it so clearly, and so agreeably to other scriptures, especially when Christ is here answering an inquiry concerning his coming at the end of the world, which Christ was never shy of speaking of to his disciples? The only objection against this, is, that it is said to be after the tribulation of those days; but, as to that, (1.) It is usual, in the prophetic style, to speak of things great and certain as near and just at hand, only to express the greatness and certainty of them. Enoch spake of Christ's second coming as within ken, Behold, the Lord cometh, Jude 14. (2.) A thousand years are, in God's sight but as one day, 2 Pet. 3. 8. It is there urged, with reference to this very thing, and so it might be said to be immediately after. The tribulation of those days includes not only the destruction of Jerusalem, but all the other tribulations which the church must pass through; not only its share in the calamities of the nations, but the tribulations peculiar to itself; while the nations are torn with wars, and the church with schisms, delusions, and persecutions, we cannot say that the tribulation of those days is over; the whole state of the world, the earth is militant, we must count upon that; but when the church's tribulation is over, her warfare accomplished, and what is behind of the sufferings of Christ fulfilled, then look for the end.

Now, concerning Christ's second coming, it is here foretold,

[1.] That there shall be then a great and amazing change of the creatures, and particularly the heavenly bodies; (v. 29.) The sun shall be darkened, and the moon not give her light. The moon shines with a borrowed light, and therefore if the sun, from whom she borrows her light, is turned into darkness, she must fall out of course, and become bankrupt. The stars shall fall; they shall lose their light, and disappear, and be as if they were fallen; and the powers of heaven shall be shaken. This intimates,

Firstly, That there shall be a great change, in order to the making of all things new. Then shall be the restitution of all things, when the heavens shall not be cast away as a rag, but changed as a vesture, to be worn in a better fashion, Ps. 102. 26. They shall pass away with a great noise, that there may be new heaven and new earth, Rev. 21. 5. 13. Secondly, It shall be a visible change, and such as all the world must take notice of; for such the darkening of the sun and moon cannot but be: and it would be an amazing change; for the heavenly bodies are not so liable to alteration as the creatures of this lower world are. The days of heaven, and the continuance of the sun and moon, are used to express that which is lasting and unchangeable; (as the sea and rivers,) which signifies, they shall be for ever. Thirdly, It shall be a universal change. If the sun be turned into darkness, and the powers of heaven be shaken, the earth cannot but he turned into a dungeon, and its foundation made to tremble. Howl, fr-teen, if the cedars be shaken. When the stars of heaven drop, no marvel if the everlasting mountains melt, and the perpetual hills bow. Nature's immovable pillars shall then be moved, which yet shall be no hindrance to the joy and rejoicing of heaven and earth before the Lord, when he cometh to judge the world; (Ps. 96. 11, 13,) they shall, as it were, glory in the tribulation.

Fourthly, The darkening of the sun, moon, and stars, which were made to rule over the day, and over the night, (which is the first dominion we find of any creature, Gen. 1. 16, 18,) signifies the putting down of all rule, authority, and power, (even that which seems of the greatest antiquity and usefulness,) that the kingdom may be delivered up to God, even the Father, and he may be All in all, 1 Cor. 15. 24, 28. The sun was darkened at the death of Christ, for then was, in one sense, the judgment of this world, (John 12. 31,) an indication what would be at the general judgment.

Fifthly, The glorious appearance of our Lord Jesus, who will then shew himself as the Brightness of the Father's glory, and the express Image of his person, will darken the sun and moon as a candle is darkened in the beams of the noon-day sun; they will have no glory, because of the Glory that excelleth, 2 Cor. 3. 10. Then the sun shall be ashamed, and the moon confounded, when God shall appear, Isa. 24. 23.

Sixthly, The sun and moon shall be then darkened, because then will be no occasion for them. To sinners who choose their portion in this life, all comfort will be eternally denied; as they shall not have a drop of water, so not a ray of light. Now God causeth his Son to rise on the earth, but then Interdicti tibi sole et luna—I forbid thee the light of the sun and the moon. Darkness must be their portion. To the saints that had their treasure above, such light of joy and comfort will be given, as will enable them to shine as the moon, and render it useless. What need is there of vessels of light, when we come to the Fountain and Father of light? See Isa. 60. 19. Rev. 22. 5.

[2.] That then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, (v. 30.) The Son of man himself, as it follows here, They shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds. At his first coming, he was for a sign that should be spoken against; (Luke 2. 34,) but, at his second coming, a Sign that should be admired. Ezekiel was a son of man, set for a sign, Ezek. 12. 6. Some make this a prediction of the harbinger and forerunners of his coming, giving notice of his approach; a light shining before him, and the fire devouring, (Ps. 30. 3. 1 Kings 19. 11, 12,) the beams coming out of his hand, where had long been the hindering of his power, Hab. 3. 4. It is a groundless conceit of some of the ancients, that this sign of the Son of man will be the sign of the cross displayed as a banner. It will certainly be such a clear convincing sign as will dash infidelity quite out of countenance, and fill their faces with shame, who said, Where is the promise of his coming?

[3.] That then all the tribes of the earth shall mourn, 30. See Rev. 1. 7. All the kindreds of the earth shall then wail because of him; some of all the tribes and kindreds of the earth shall mourn: for the greater part will tremble at his approach, while the chosen remnant, one of a family and two of a tribe, shall lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption draws nigh, and their Redeemer. Note, Sooner or later, all sinners will be convinced of sin, and horror-stricken with the sight, sinners, look to Christ, and mourn after a godly sort; and they who sow in these tears, shall shortly reap in joy; impenitent sinners shall look unto him whom they have pierced, and, though they laugh now, shall mourn and weep, after a devilish sort, in endless horror and despair.

[4.] That then they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. Note, First. The judgment of the great day will be conducted to this end, in pursuance, and in recompense, of his great undertaking for us as Mediator, John 5. 22, 27. Secondly, The Son of man will at that day come in the clouds of heaven. Much of the sensible intercourse between heaven and earth is by the clouds; they are betwixt them, as it were, the medium parcellations—the medium of parcellation, drawn by heaven from the earth, distilled by heaven upon the Christ went to heaven in a cloud, and will in like manner come again, Acts 1. 10. Behold, he cometh with clouds; Rev. 1. 7. A cloud will be the Judge’s chariot, (Ps. 104. 3.) his robe, (Rev. 10. 1.) his pavilion, (Ps. 18. 11.) his throne, Rev. 14. 14. When the world was destroyed by water, the judgment came in the clouds of heaven, for the windows of heaven were opened; so shall it be when it shall be destroyed by fire. Christ went before Israel in a cloud, which had a bright side and a dark side; so will the cloud have in it which Christ will come at the great day, it will bring forth comfort and terror. Thirdly, He will come with power and great glory: his first coming was in weakness and great meanness; (2 Cor. 13. 4.) but his second coming will be with power and glory, agreeable both to the dignity of his person and to the purposes of his coming. Fourthly, He will be seen with bodily eyes in his coming: therefore the Son of man will be in the clouds, and every eye shall see him, (Matt. 24. 30.) that he may be seen, that sinners thereby may be no more confounded, who shall see him as Balaam did, but not nigh, (Num. 24. 17.) see him, but not as their’s. It added to the torment of that damned sinner, that he saw Abraham after off. "Is this he whom we have slighted, and rejected, and rebelled against; whom we have crucified to ourselves afresh; who might have been our Saviour, but is our Judge, and will be our enemy." The Design of all nations will then be their bread. [5.] That he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, v. 31. Note, First, The angels shall be attendants upon Christ at his second coming; they are called his angels, which proves him to be God and Lord of the angels; they shall be obliged to wait upon him. Secondly, These attendants shall be employed by him as officers of the court. Take the cloud, and every eye shall see him, and they shall be ministering spirits sent forth by him, (Heb. 1. 14.) and will be so then. Thirdly, Their ministration will be ushered in with a great sound of a trumpet, to awaken and alarm a sleeping world. This trumpet is spoken of, 1 Cor. 15. 52. and 1 Thess. 4. 16. At the giving of the law on mount Sinai, the sound of the trumpet was remarkably terrible; (Exod. 19. 13, 14.) but much more will it be so in the great day of wrath. Take the cloud, and every eye shall see him, and they shall be ministering spirits sent forth by him, (Heb. 1. 14.) and will be so then. Thirdly, Their ministration will be ushered in with a great sound of a trumpet, to awaken and alarm a sleeping world. This trumpet is spoken of, 1 Cor. 15. 52. and 1 Thess. 4. 16. At the giving of the law on mount Sinai, the sound of the trumpet was remarkably terrible; (Exod. 19. 13, 14.) but much more will it be so in the great day of wrath. Take the cloud, and every eye shall see him, and they shall be ministering spirits sent forth by him, (Heb. 1. 14.) and will be so then. Very fitly, therefore, shall there be the sound of a trumpet at the last day, when the general assembly shall be called, when the praises of God shall be gloriously celebrated, when sinners shall fall as sacrifices to divine justice, and when the saints shall enter upon their eternal jubilee. [6.] That they shall gather together his elect from the four winds. At the second coming of Jesus Christ, there will be a general meeting of all the saints. First, The elect only will be gathered, the chosen remnant, who are but few in comparison with the many that are only called. This is the foundation of the saints’ eternal happiness, that they are God’s elect. The gifts of love to eternity follow the thoughts of love from eternity; and The Lord knows them that are his. Secondly, The angels shall be employed to bring them together, as Christ’s servants, and as the saints’ friends; we have the commission given them, Ps. 50. 5. Gather my saints together unto me; (Ps. 68.) say, it will be said to them, Habeas frater—These are your brethren; for the elect will then be equal to the angelic spirits. They shall be gathered from one end of heaven to the other; the elect of God are scattered abroad, (John 11. 52.) there are some in all places, in all nations; (Rev. 7. 9.) but when that great gathering day comes, there shall not one of them be missing; distance of place shall keep none out of heaven, if distance of affection do not. Undique ad caelos taturam est vix—Heaven is equally accessible from every place. See ch. 8. 11. Isa. 43. 6.—49. 12.

32. Now learn a parable of the fig-tree: When his branch is yet tender, and put forth leaves, ye know that summer is high. 33. So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. 34. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled. 35. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away. 36. But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only. 37. But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. 38. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, 39. And knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. 40. Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 41. Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 42. Watch therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. 43. But know this, that if the Goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. 44. Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. 45. Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his Lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season? 46. Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing. 47. Verily I say unto you, that he shall make him ruler over all his goods. 48. But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming; 49. And shall begin to smite his fellowservants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; 50. The Lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of. 51. And shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

We have here the practical application of the foregoing prediction; in general, we must expect and prepare for the events here foretold.

1. We must expect them: Now learn a parable of the fig-tree, v. 32, 33. Now learn what use to make of the things you have heard; so observe and understand the signs of the times, and compare them with the predictions of the word, as from thence to
to see what is at the door, that you may provide accordingly. The parable of the fig-tree is no more than this, that its budding and blossoming are a presage of summer; for as the rock in the heaven, so the trees of the field, know their appointed time. The beginning of the working of second causes assures us of the progress and perfection of it. Thus, when God begins to fulfil prophecies, he will make an end. There is a certain series in the works of providence, as there is in the works of nature. The signs of the times are compared with the prognostics of old, Luke 21. 16, 17: so before are those of the face of the earth; when that is renewed, we foresee that summer is coming, not immediately, but at some distance; after the branch grows tender, we expect the March winds, and the April showers, before the summer comes; however, we are sure it is coming; "so likewise ye, when the gospel-day shall dawn, count upon it, that through this variety of events, which I have told you of, the perfect day will come. The things revealed must shortly come to pass; (Rev. 1. 1.) they must come in their own order, in the order appointed for them. Know that it is near." He does not here say what, but it is that which the hearts of his disciples are upon, and which they are inquisitive after, and long for; the kingdom of God is near, so it is expressed in the parallel place, Luke 21. 31. Note, When the trees of right- eousness and love and faithfulness and patience and hope promise faithfulness, it is a happy presage of good times. In them God begins his work, first prepares their heart, and then he will go on with it; for, as for God, his work is perfect; and he will revive it in the midst of years.

Now, touching the events foretold here, which we are to expect,
1. Christ here assures us of the certainty of them; (v. 35.) Heaven and earth shall pass away; they continue this day indeed, according to God's ordinance, but they shall not continue forever; (Ps. 102. 25, 26. 2 Pet. 3. 10.) but my words shall not pass away. Note, The word of Christ is more sure and lasting than heaven and earth. Hath he spoken, and shall he not do it? We may build with more assurance upon the word of Christ than we can upon the props of the world; and the strong foundations of the earth; for, when they shall be made to tremble and totter, and shall be no more, the word of Christ shall remain, and be in full force, power, and virtue. See 1 Pet. 1. 24, 25. It is easier for heaven and earth to pass away, than the word of Christ; so it is expressed, Luke 16. 17. Compare Isa. 34. 10. The accomplishment of these prophecies might seem to be delayed, and intervening events might seem to disagree with them; but do not think that the work of Christ is fallen to the ground, for that shall never pass away: though it be not fulfilled, either in the time or in the way that we have prescribed; yet, in God's time, which is the best time, and in God's way, which is the best way, it shall certainly be fulfilled. Every word of Christ is very sure, and therefore, well worth our dependence upon.

2. He here instructs us as to the time of them, v. 34, 36. As to this, it is well observed by the learned Grothus, that there is a manifest distinction made between the وارع, (v. 34.) and the يمام, (v. 35.) these things, and that day and hour; which will help to clear this prophecy.
(1.) As to these things—the wars, seductions, and persecutions, here foretold, and especially the ruin of the Jewish nation; "This generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled;" (v. 34.) there are those now alive that shall see Jerusalem destroyed, and the Jewish church brought to an end." Because it might seem strange, he backs it with a solemn asseveration; "Verily, I say unto you. You may take my word for it, these things are at the door." Christ often speaks of the nearness of that desolation, the more to affect people, and quicken them to prepare for it. Note, There may be greater trials and troubles yet before us, in our own day, than we are aware of. They that are old, know not what sons of Anak may be reserved for their last encounters.

(2.) But as to that day and hour which will put a period to time, that knows no man, v. 36. Therefore take heed of confounding these two, as they did, who, from the words of Christ, and the apostles' answers, inferred that the destruction of Jerusalem was the end of the world. But is it not so; and many another, shall pass, before that day and hour come. Note, [1.] There is a certain day and hour fixed for the judgment to come; it is called the day of the Lord, because so unalterably fixed. None of God's judgments are adjourned sine die—without the appointment of a certain day. [2.] That day and hour are a great secret.

Prudent futuri temporis exitum
Caliginosa nocet premit Deus.
But Heav'n has wisely hid from human sight
The dark deuces of future fate,
And sown their seeds in depth of night.—Hor.

No man knows it; not the wisest by their sagacity, not the best by any divine discovery. We all know that the day of the Lord is coming, but when no one knows when it shall be, no, not the angels; though their capacities for knowledge are great, and their opportunities of knowing this advantageous, (they dwell at the fountain-head of light,) and though they are to be employed in the solemnity of that day, yet they are not told when it shall be: none knows, but my Father only. This is one of those secret things which belong to the Lord our God. The uncertainty of the time of Christ's coming is a trial to those who are watchful, a savour of life unto life, and makes them more watchful; but to those who are careless, it is a savour of death unto death, and makes them more careless.

[1.] To this end we must expect these events—that we may prepare for them; and here we have a caution against security and sensuality, which will make it to the worse. If we shall delay preparing for it, that day will be a surprising day, a surprising day, and a separating day. 1. It will be a surprising day, as the deluge was to the old world, v. 37—39. That which he here intends to describe, is, the posture of the world at the coming of the Son of man; besides his first coming to save, he has other comings, to judge. He saith, (John 9. 39.) For judgment I am come; and for judgment he will come; for all judgment is committed to him, both that of the word, and that of the sword.

Now this here is applicable,
(1.) To temporal judgments, particularly that which was now hastening upon the nation and people of the Jews; though they had fair warning given them of it, and there were many prodigies that were presages of it, yet it found them secure, crying, Peace and safety, I Thess. 5. 3. The siege was laid to Jerusalem by Titus Vespasian, when they were met at the passover in the midst of their mirth: like the men of Laish, they dwelt careless when the ruin arrested them, Judg. 18. 7, 27. The destruction of Babylon, both that day in the Old Testament, and that in the New, comes, when she saith, I shall be a lady for ever, Isa. 47. 7—9. Rev. 18. 7. Therefore the plagues come in a moment, in one day. Note, Men's unbelief shall not make God's threatenings of no effect.

(2.) To the eternal judgment; so the judgment of the great day is called, Heb. 6. 2. Though notice has been given of it from Enoch, yet, when it comes, it will be followed for by the deluge in the latter days, which are nearest to that day, will produce scoffers, that say, Where is the promise of his coming? 2 Pet. 3. 3, 4. Luke 18. 8. Thus it will be when the world that now is shall be destroyed by fire; for thus it was when the old world, being overflowed by water, perished, 2 Pet. 3. 6, 7. Now Christ here shows what were the temper and posture of the old world when the deluge came.

(1.) The sensual and worldly; they were eating and drinking, marrying, and giving in marriage. It is not said, They were killing and stealing, and whoring and swearing; (these were indeed the horrid crimes of some of the worst of them; the earth was full of violence;) but they were all of them, except Noah, over head and ears in the world, and regardless of the word of God, and this ruined them. Note, Universal neglect of religion is a more dangerous symptom to any people than particular instances here and there of daring irreligion. Eating and drinking are necessary to the preservation of man's life; marrying, and giving in marriage, are necessary to the preservation of mankind; but, Licus perimus omnes—These hateful things undo us, unlawfully managed. First, They were unreasonable in it, inordinate and entire in the pursuit of delight and pleasure; as the brutes do in the woods and fields, when wholly taken up with these things, Here they are;—they were eating; they were in these things as in their element, as if they had their being for no other end than to eat and drink, Isa. 56. 12. Secondly, They were unreasonable in it; they were entire and intent upon the world and the flesh, when the destruction was at the door, which they had had such fair warning of. They were eating and drinking, when they should have been repenting and praying; when God, by the ministry of Noah, called to weeping and mourning, then joy and gladness. This was to them, as it was to Israel afterwards, the unpardonable sin, (Is. 22. 12, 14.) especially, because it was in defiance of those warnings, by which they should have been awakened. Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die; if it must be a short life, let it be a merry one. The apostle James speaks of this as a great general practice of the wealthy Jews, before the destruction of Jerusalem: They are drunk with wine, and reeling in the醉ing, they have been weeping for the miseries that were coming upon them, they were living in pleasure, and nourishing their hearts as in a day of slaughter, Jam. 5. 1, 5.

[2.] They were secure and careless: they knew not, until the flood came, v. 39. 'Knew not! Surely, they could not but know. Did not God, by Noah, give them fair warning of it? Did he not call them to repentance, while his long-suffering waited? 1 Pet. 3. 19, 20. But they knew not, that is, they believed not; they might have known, but would not know. Note, What we know of the things that belong to our everlasting peace, if we do not mix faith with it, and improve it, is all one as if we did not know it at all. Their not knowing is joined with their eating, and drinking, and marrying; for, First, They were sensual, because they were secure. Note, The sensual are in the pursuit, and so entangled in the pleasures, of this world, is, because they do not know, and believe, and consider, the eternity which they are upon the brink of. Did we know aright, that all these things might shortly be dissolved, and we must certainly survive them, we should not set our eyes and hearts so much upon them as we do. Secondly, Therefore they were secure, because they were sensual; therefore they knew not that the flood was coming, because they were eating and drinking; were so taken up with things seen and present, that they had neither time nor heart to mind the things not seen as yet, which they were warned of. Note, As security makes a man courious and profligate in their brutish sensuality, so sensuality rocks them asleep in their carnal security. They knew not until the flood came. The flood did come; though they would not foresee it. Note, Those that will not know by faith, shall be made to know by feeling, the wrath of God revealed from heaven against their ungodliness and unrighteousness. The evil day is never the further off for men's putting it farther off. Note, They did not repent till it was too late to prevent it, as they might have done, if they had known it in time, which made it so much the more grievous. Judgments are most terrible and amazing to the secure, and those that have made a jest of them.

The application of this, concerning the old world, we have in these words; So shall the coming of the Son of man be; that is, (1.) In such a posture shall he find people eating and drinking, and not excusing him. Note, Security and sensuality are likely to be the epidemic diseases of the latter days. All stumber and sleep, and at midnight the bridegroom comes. All are on their watch, and at their ease. (2.) With such a power, and for such a purpose, will he come upon them. As the flood took away the sinners of the old world, irresistibly and irrecoverably, so shall secure sinners, that mocked at and laughed at the flood, and were taken from the waters of the Lamb, when the great day of his wrath comes; which will be like the coming of the deluge, a destruction which there is no fleeing from. 2. It will be a separating day; (v. 40, 41.) Then shall two be in the field. Two ways this may be applied:

(1.) We may apply it to the success of the gospel, especially at the first preaching of it; it divided the world; some believed, and were saved; others believed not, and were left to perish in their unbelief. Those of the same age, place, capacity, employment, and condition, in the world, grudging in the same mill, those of the same family, nay, those that were joined in the same bond of marriage, were, one effectually called, the other passed by, and left in the gall of bitterness. This is that division, that separating fire, which Christ came to send. Luke 13. 28, 29. 5. 21. 22. 27. Two are at work in the field together, and one of them was a Christian, he was taken into a place of shelter, and had his life given him for a prey, while the other was left to the sword of the enemy. Nay, if but two women were grinding at the mill, if one of them belonged to Christ, though but a woman, a poor woman, a servant, she was taken to a place of safety, and the other abandoned. Thus the mark of the earth is hid in the day of the Lord's coming, (2 Pet. 3. 12.) which will be an evening.
elect will be gathered together. Here he tells us, that, in order to that, they will be distinguished from those who were nearest to them in this world; the choice and chosen ones taken to glory, the other left to perish eternally. Those who sleep in the dust of the earth, two in the same grave, their ashes mixed, yet shall also, one to be taken to everlasting life, the other left to shame and everlasting contempt, Dan. 12. 2. Here it is applied to them who shall be found alive. Christ will come unlooked for, will find people busy at their usual occupations, in the field, at the mill; and then, according as they are vessels of mercy, prepared for glory, or vessels of wrath, prepared for ruin, accordingly it will be with those the one taken to meet the Lord and his angels in the air, to be for ever with him and them; the other left to the devil and his angels, who, when Christ has gathered out his own, will sweep up the residue. This will aggravate the condemnation of sinners—that others shall be taken from the midst of them to glory, and they left behind. And it speaks abundance of comfort to the Lord’s people. [2.] They are inexpressibly blessed, who know the man-servant in the field, or the maid at the mill? (Exod. 11. 5.) Yet they shall not be forgotten or overlooked in that day. The poor in the world, if rich in faith, are heirs of the kingdom. [3.] Are they dispersed in distant and unlikely places, where one would not expect to find the heirs of glory, in the field, at the mill? Yet the angels will find them there, hidden, as Saul among the stuff, when they are to be enthroned, as Saul was. And, if well may they be said to be changed, for a very great change it will be, to go to heaven from ploughing and grinding. [3.] Are they weak, and unable of themselves to move heavenward? They shall be taken, or laid hold on, as Lot was taken out of Sodom, by a gracious violence, Gen. 19. 16. Those whom Christ had once apprehended, and laid hold on, he will never lose his hold of. [4.] Are they intermixed with others, linked with them in the same habitations, societies, employments? Let not that discourage any true Christian; God knows how to separate between the precious and the vile, the gold and dross in the same lump, the wheat and the chaff in the same floor.

III. Here is a general exhortation to us, to watch and be ready against that day, when enforced by divers weighty considerations, v. 42, 43. Observe, I. The duty required; Watch, and be ready, v. 42, 44. (1.) Watch therefore, v. 42. Note, It is the great duty and interest of all the disciples of Christ, to watch, to be awake, and keep awake, that they may mind their business. As a sinful state and way is compared to sleep, senseless and inactive, (1 Thess. 5. 4.) so a gracious state and way is compared to watching and waking. We must watch for our Lord’s coming to us, in particular, at our death, after which is the judgement, that is, the great day with us, the end of our time; and his coming at the end of all time to judge the world, the great day with all mankind. To watch, implies not only to believe that our Lord will come, but to desire that he would come, and to be taken to everlasting life, and always looking for it, as sure and near, and as distant and remote, and as near and remote, as the day of the Lord. To watch for Christ’s coming, is to maintain that gracious temper and disposition of mind which we would be willing that our Lord, when he comes, should find us in. To watch, is to be aware of the first notices of his approach, that we may immediately attend his motions, and advance ourselves into the course of expecting him. Watching is supposed to be in the night, which is sleeping time; while we are in this world, it is night with us, and we must take pains to keep ourselves awake. (2.) Be ye also ready. We wake in van, if we do not get ready. It is not enough to look for such things; but we must therefore give diligence, 2 Pet. 3. 11, 14. We have then our Lord to attend upon, and we must have our lamps ready trimmed; a cause to be tried, and we must have our plea ready drawn, and signed by our Advocate; a reckoning to be made up, and we must have our accounts ready stated and balanced; there is an inheritance which we then hope to enter upon, and we must have ourselves ready, made meet to partake of it, Col. 1. 12. 2. The reasons to induce us to this watchfulness, and diligent preparation for that day; which are two:

(1.) Because the time of our Lord’s coming is very uncertain. This is the reason immediately annexed to the double exhortation; (v. 42, 44.) and it is illustrated by a comparison, v. 43. Let us consider, then,

[1.] That we know not what hour he will come, v. 42. We know not the day of our death, Gen. 27. 2. We may know that we have but a little time to live; The time of my departure is at hand; (2 Tim. 4. 6.) but we know not the hour. We may be sure to live, for our souls are continually in our hands; nor can we know how little a time we have to live, for it may prove less than we expect: much less do we know the time fixed for the general judgment. Concerning both we are kept at uncertainty, that we might, every day, expect that which may come any day; may never boast of a year’s continuance, (Jam. 4. 13.) no, nor of tomorrow’s return, as if it were our own; Luke 12. 17. 1. Luke 12. 20. (2.) That he may come at such an hour as we think not, v. 44. Though there be such uncertainty in the time, there is none in the thing itself; though we know not when he will come, we are sure he will come. His parting word was, Surely I come quickly; his saying, If I come surely, obliges us to expect him; his saying, I come quickly, obliges us to be always expecting him; for it keeps us in a state of expectancy. In such an hour as you think not, that is, such an hour as they who are unready and unprepared, think not; (v. 50.) may, such an hour as the most lively expectants perhaps thought least likely. The bridgewater came when the wise were slumbering. It is agreeable to our present state, that we should be under the influence of a constant and general expectation, rather than in that of a particular and particular anticipations, which we are sometimes tempted vainly to desire and wish for. [3.] That the children of this world are thus wise in their generation, that, when they know of a danger approaching, they will keep awake, and stand on their guard against it. This he shews in a particular instance, v. 43. If the master of a house had notice, that a thief would come such a night, and such a watch of the night, and when he added the night into four watches, allowing three hours to each,) and would make an attempt upon his house, though it were the midnight watch, when he was most sleepy, yet he would be up, and listen to every noise in every corner, and be ready to give him a warm reception. Now, though we know not just when our Lord will come, yet, knowing that he will come, and coming quietly, and without taking any warning from what he hath given in his word, it concerns us to watch always. Note, First, We have every one of us a house to keep, which lies exposed, in which all we are worth is laid up, that house is our own souls, which we must keep with all diligence. Secondly, The day of the Lord comes by surprise, as a thief in the night. Christ chooses to come when he is least expected, that the fruits of his labours may be turned into the greater shame, and the fears of his friends into the greater joy. Thirdly, If Christ, when he comes, finds us asleep and unready, our house will be broken up, and we shall lose all we are worth, not as a thief, unjustly, but as by a just and legal process; death and judgment will such as to have, to our trimmed, not damage, and utter undoing. Therefore be ready, be ye also ready; as ready at all times as the good man of the house would be at the hour when he expected the thief; we must put on the armour of God, that we may not only stand in that evil day, but, as more than conquerors, may divide the spoil. (2.) Because the issue of our Lord's coming will be very happy and comfortable to him that shall be found ready, but very dismal and dreadful to those that are not, v. 45, &c. This is represented by the different state of good and bad servants, when their lord comes to reckon with them. It is likely to be well or ill with us to eternity, according as we are found ready or unready at that day; for Christ comes to render to every man according to his works. Now this parable, with which the chapter closes, is applicable to all Christians, who are, in profession and obligation, God's servants; but it seems especially intended as a warning to ministers; for the servant spoken of is a steward. Now, observe what Christ here saith,

[1.] Concerning the good servant; he shews here what he is—a ruler of the household; what, being so, he should be—faithful and wise, and what, if he be so, he shall be eternally—blessed. Here are good instructions and encouragements to the ministers of Christ.

First, We have here his place and office. He is one whom his Lord has made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season. Note, 1. The church of Christ is his household, or family, standing in relation to him as the Father and Master of it. It is the household of God, a family named from Christ, Eph. 3. 15. 2. Gospel-ministers are and are those who are clothed in authority, (Christ has entered a caveat against that,) but as stewards, or other subordinate officers; not as lords, but as guides; not to prescribe new ways, but to shew and lead in the ways that Christ has appointed: that is the signification of the συνεργος, which we translate, having rule over you; (Heb. 13. 17.) as overseers, not to cut out new work, but to direct in, and quicken to, the work which Christ has ordained them to do, and which they have by him power and right to do. They are rulers by Christ; what power they have is derived from him, and none may take it from them, or abridge it to them; he is one whom the Lord has made ruler; Christ has the making of ministers. They are rulers under Christ, and act in subordination to him; and rulers for Christ, for the advancement of his kingdom. 3. The work of gospel-ministers, is, to give to Christ's household their meat in due season, as stewards, and therefore they have the keys delivered to them. (1.) Their work is to give, not take themselves, (Ezek. 34. 8.) but give to the family what the Master has bought, to dispense what Christ has purchased. And to ministers is said, that it is more blessed to give than to receive, Acts 20. 35. (2.) It is to give meat; not to give law, (that is Christ's work,) but to deliver those doctrines to the church, which, if duly digest-ed, will be nourishment to souls. They must give, not the poison of false doctrines, not the stones of hard and unprofitable doctrines, but the meat that is sound and wholesome. (3.) It must be given in due season, (v. 5.)—while there is time for it; when eternity comes, it will be too late; we must work while it is day: or in time, that is, whenever any opportunity offers itself, or in the stated time, time after time, according as the duty of every day requires.

Secondly, His right discharge of his office. The good servant, if thus preferred, will be a good steward; for,

1. He is faithful; stewards must be so, 1 Cor. 4. 2. He that is trusted, must be trusted; and the greater the trust is, the more is expected from him. It is a great good thing that is committed to ministers; (2 Tim. 2. 2.) and they must be faithful, as Moses was, Heb. 3. 2. Christ counts those ministers, and those only, that are faithful, 1 Tim. 1. 12. A faithful minister of Jesus Christ is one that sincerely designs his Master's honour, not his own; delivers the whole counsel of God, not his own fancies and conceits; follows Christ's institutions, and adheres to them; regards the meanest, reproves the greatest, and doth not respect persons.

2. He is wise to understand his duty, and the proper season of it; and in guiding of the flock there is need, not only of the integrity of the heart, but the skilfulness of the hands. Honesty may suffice for a good servant, but wisdom is necessary to a good steward; for it is profitable to direct.

He is one, so doing, as his office requires. The ministry is a good work, and they whose office it is have always something to do; they must not indulge themselves in ease, nor leave the work undone, or carelessly turn it off to others, but be doing, and doing to the purpose; so doing, giving meat to the household, minding their own business, and not meddling with that which is foreign; so doing, as the Master has appointed, as their office is to do, and to do the case, not talking, but doing. It was the motto Mr. Perkins used, Minister verbi est—You are a minister of the word. Not only Age—Be doing; but, Hoc agere—Be so doing.

4. He is found doing when his Master comes; which intimates, (1.) Constancy at his work. At what hour soever his Master comes, he is found busy at the work of the day. Ministers should not leave empty spaces in their time, lest their Lord should say, as he did, to the旌es, See xxv. 24, 25. As with a good God the end of one mercy is the beginning of another, so with a good man, the minister, the end of one duty is the beginning of another. When Calvin was persuaded to remit his ministerial labours, he answered, with some resentment, "What, who have my Master find me idle?" (2.) Perseverance in his work till the Lord come. Hold fast till then, Rev. 2. 25. Continue in these things, 1 Tim. 4. 15. Endure to the end.

Thirdly, The recompense of reward intended him for this, in three things,

1. He shall be taken notice of. This is intimated in these words, Who then is that faithful and wise servant? Which supposes that there are but few who answer this character; such an interpreter is one of a thousand, such a faithful and wise steward. Those who thus distinguish themselves now by humility, diligence, and sincerity in their work, Christ will in the great day both dignify and distinguish by the glory conferred on them.

2. He shall be blessed: Blessed is that servant; and Christ's pronouncing him blessed makes him so. All the dead that die in the Lord are blessed, Rev. 14. 13. But there is a peculiar blessedness secured to them that approve themselves faithful stewards, and are found so doing. Next to the honour of those who die in the field of battle, suffering for Christ as the martyrs, is the honour of those that die in the field of service, ploughing, and sowing, and reaping, for Christ.

3. He shall be preferred; (v. 47.) He shall make him ruler over all his goods. The allusion is to the way of great men, who, if the stewards of their house conduct themselves well in that place, commonly prefer them to be the managers of their estate, thus Joseph was preferred in the house of Potiphar; Gen. 39. 4, 6. But the greatest honour which the kindest master ever did to his most tried servants in this world, is nothing to that weight of glory which the Lord Jesus will confer upon his faithful watchful servants in the world to come. We may not be permitted to see for ourselves the circumstances of this glorious scene; but we are told that it will be great. The utmost passions of the heart, and the most hideous crimes, have been the subjects of a judicial description of the judgment-seat of Christ. The mention of these things is said more plainly, John 12. 26. He will my Father's honour. And God's servants, when thus preferred, shall be perfect in wisdom and holiness, to bear that weight of glory, so that there is no danger from these servants when they reign.

2. Concerning the evil servant. Here we have,

First, His description given; (v. 48, 49.) where we see the wicked servant, and he is wretched, the vilest of creatures is a wicked man, the vilest of men is a wretched Christian, and the vilest of them a wicked minister. Corruptum optimis est pessimum—What is best, when corrupted, becomes the worst. Wickedness in the prophets of Jerusalem is a horrible thing indeed, Jer. 23. 14. Here is,

1. The cause of his wickedness; and that is, a practical disbelief of Christ's second coming. He hath said in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming; and therefore he begins to think he will never come, but has quite forsaken his church. Observe, (1.) Christ knows what they say in their hearts, who with their lips cry, Lord, Lord, as this servant here. (2.) The delay of Christ's coming, though it is a gracious instance of his patience, is greatly abuse, that his heart of wickedness may be hardened in their wicked ways. When Christ's coming is looked upon as doubtful, or a thing at an immense distance, the hearts of men are fully set to do evil, Eccl. 8. 11. See Ezek. 12. 27. They that walk by sense, are ready to see of the unseeen Jews, as the people did of Moses, when he tarried in the mount upon their errand, We wait not what is become of him, and therefore up, make us gods, the world a god, the belly a god, any thing but him that should be.

2. The particulars of his wickedness; and they are sins of the first magnitude; he is a slave to his passions and his appetites.

(1.) Persecution is here charged upon him. He begins to smite his fellow-servants. Note, [1.] Even the stewards of the house are to look upon all the servants of the house as their fellow-servants, and therefore are forbidden to lord it over them. If the angel call himself fellow-servant to John, (Rev. 19. 10.) no marvel if John have learned to call himself brother to the Christians of the churches of Asia, Rev. 1. 9. [2.] It is no new thing to see evil servants smiting their fellow-servants; both private Christians and faithful ministers. He smites them, either because he despises them, or because they will not bow and do him reverence; will not say as he saith, and do as he doeth, against their consciences: he smites them with the tongue, as they smote the prophet, Jer. 18. 18. And if he got power into his hand, or can press those into his service, that have, as the ten horns upon the head of the beast, it goes further. Pashur the priest smote Jeremiah, and put him in the stocks, Jer. 20. 1. The revolters have smitten the people; xli. 8. The wicked, most profound to make slaughter, Hos. 5. 2. The steward, when he smites his fellow servants, does it under colour of his Master's authority, and in his name; he says, Let the Lord be glorified; (Isa. 66. 5.) but he shall know, that he could not put a greater affront upon his Master.

(2.) Profaneness and immorality; He begins to eat, drink, and be drunken. [1.] He associ-ates with the worst of sinners, has fellowship with them, is intimate with them; he walks in their counsel, stands in their way, sits in their seat, and sings their songs. The drunken are the merry jovial company, and those he is for, and thus he hardens them in their wickedness. [2.] He does like them; eat, and drinks, and is drunken; so it is in Luke. This is an inlet to all manner of sin. Drunk-are gone out. 9. But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. 10. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. 11. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. 12. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. 13. Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh.

I. That in general which is to be illustrated, is, the kingdom of heaven, the state of things under the gospel, the external kingdom of Christ, and the administration and success of it. Some of Christ's parables had showed us what it is like now in the present reception of it, as ch. 13. This tells us what it shall be like, when the mystery of God shall be finished, and that kingdom delivered up to the Father. The administration of Christ's government towards the world, and the church, the great day, may be illustrated by this similitude; or the kingdom is put for the subjects of the kingdom. The professors of Christianity shall then be likened to these ten virgins, and shall be thus distinguished.

II. That by which it is illustrated, is, a marriage solemnity. It was a custom sometimes used among the Jews, on that occasion, that the bridegroom came, attended with his friends, late in the night, to the house of the bride, where the bride was, attended with her bride-maids; who, upon notice given of the bridegroom's approach, were to go out with lamps in their hands, to light him into the house with ceremony and formality, in order to the celebration of the nuptials with great mirth. And some think that on these occasions they had usually ten virgins: for the Jews never held a synagogue, circumcised, kept the passover, or conducted marriage, except at least there were present. Boaz, when he married Ruth, had ten virgins, Ruth 4:2. Now in this parable.

1. The Bridegroom is our Lord Jesus Christ; he is so represented in the 45th Psalm, Solomon's Song, and often in the New Testament. It bespeaks his singular and superlative love to, and his faithful and inviolable covenant with, his spouse, the church. Believers are now betrothed to Christ; (Hos. 2. 19.)

2. The solemnizing of the marriage is reserved for the great day, when the bride, the Lamb's wife, will have made herself completely ready, Rev. 19. 7, 9.

3. The virgins are the professors of religion, members of the church; but here represented as her companions, (Ps. 45. 14.) as elsewhere her children, (Isa. 54. 1.) her ornaments, Isa. 49. 18. They that forsook their Lord, and his cause, are said to be virgins, (Rev. 13. 4.) this denotes their beauty and purity; they are to be presented as chaste virgins to Christ, 2 Cor. 11. 2. The bridegroom is a king; so these virgins are maid of honour, virgins without number, (Cant. 6. 8.) yet here said to be ten.

4. The office of these virgins is to meet the bridegroom, which is as much their happiness as their duty. They come to wait upon the bridegroom in the night, and stand in readiness to wait for him. See here the nature of Christianity. As Christians, we profess ourselves to be, (1.) Attendants upon Christ, to do him honour, as the glorious Bridegroom, to be to him for a name and a praise, especially then when he shall come to be glorified

CHAP. XXV.

This chapter continues and concludes our Saviour's discourse, which began in the foregoing chapter, concerning his second coming and the end of the world. This was his final, last sermon of caution, as John 14. 15, and 27, was of comfort, to his disciples; and they had need of both in a world of so much temptation and trouble as this is. The application of that discourse, was, Watch therefore, and be ye vigilant, as one that attendeth to his own business, and keepeth watch against any violent assault. Now, in prevention of these serious awakenings in this chapter we have three parables, the scope of which is the same— to quicken us all with the utmost care and diligence to get ready for Christ's second coming, which, in all his forewills to his church, mention was made of, as in that before he died. (John 14. 2.) at that in his ascension, (Acts 1. 11.) and in that at the shutting up of the canon of the scripture, Rev. 21. 8. prepared for eternal joy and happiness. It comes in thus.

1. That we may then be ready to attend upon him; and this is shewed in the parable of the ten virgins, v. 1. 13.

2. That we may then be ready to give up our account to him; and this is shewn in the parable of the talents, v. 14. 30.

3. That we may then be ready to receive from him our final sentence, and that it may be eternal life; and this is shewn in a more plain description of the process of the judgment, v. 31. 46. These are things of awful consideration, because of everlasting concern to every one of us.

1. Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. 2. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. 3. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: 4. But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. 5. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. 6. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. 7. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. 8. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out. 9. But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. 10. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. 11. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. 12. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. 13. Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh.
in his saints. We must follow him as honorary servants do their masters, John 12. 26. Hold up the name, and hold forth their name, of the exalted Jesus of their profession, and of the exalted Jesus Christ, of his second coming. As Christians, we profess, not only to believe and look for, to love and long for, the appearing of Christ, and to act in our whole conversation with regard to it. The second coming of Christ is the centre in which all the lines of our religion meet, and to which the whole of the day of life hath a constant reference and tendency.

4. Their chief concern is, to have light in their hands, when they attend the bridegroom, thus to do him honour and to do him service. Note, Christians are children of light. The gospel is light, and they who receive it, must not only be enlightened by it themselves, but must shine as lights must hold forth, Phil. 2. 15, 16. This in general.

Now, concerning these ten virgins, we may observe,

1. Their different character, with the proof and evidence of it.

1. Their character was, that five were wise, and five foolish, (v. 2.) and wisdom excelleth folly, as far as light excelleth darkness; so saith Solomon, a competent judge, Eccl. 2. 13. Note, Those of the same profession and denomination among men, may have no character vastly different in the sight of God. Sincere Christians are the wise virgins, and hypocrites the foolish ones, as in another parable they are represented by wise and foolish builders. Note, Those are wise or foolish indeed, that are so in the affairs of their souls. True religion is true wisdom; sin is folly, but especially the sin of hypocrisy, for those are the greatest fools that are wise in their own conceit, and those the worst of sinners, that feign themselves just men. Some observe, from the equal number of the wise and foolish, what a charitable decorum (it is Archbishop Tillotson's expression) Christ observes, as if he would have that the number of true believers were near equal to that of hypocrites, or, at least, would teach us to hope the best concerning those that profess religion, and to think of them with a bias to the charitable side. Though, in judging of ourselves, we must remember that the gate is strait, and few find it, yet, in judging of others, we ought to remember, that the Captain of our salvation brings many sons to glory.

2.] The evidence of this character was in the very thing which they were to attend to; by that there was a judgment of the wise and unwise ones.

First, It was the folly of the foolish virgins, that they took their lamps, and took no oil with them, v. 3. They had just oil enough to make their lamps burn for the present, to make a show with, as if they intended to meet the bridegroom; but no cruse or bottle of oil with them for a recruit, if the bridegroom tarried; thus hypocrites, who have no principle within. They have a lamp to shine, and use it, but have not in their hearts that stock of sound knowledge, rooted dispositions, and settled resolutions, which is necessary to carry them through the services and trials of the present state. They act under the influence of external inducements, but are void of spiritual life; like a tradesman, that sets up without a stock, or a wife, or seed on the stony ground, that wanted root.

2. They had provisions for, what is to come. They took lamps for a present show, but not oil for after-use. This incognti- nancy is the ruin of many professors; all their care is to recommend themselves to their neighbours, whom they now converse with, not to approve themselves to Christ, whom they must hereafter appear before; as if any thing will serve, provided it will but serve for the present. Tell them of things not seen as yet, and you are like Lot to his sons in law, as one that mocked. They do not provide for hereafter; for, when the sun is set, they go into their cellars, nor lay up for the time to come, 2 Cor. 12. 14.

Secondly, It was the wisdom of the wise virgins, that they took oil in their vessels with their lamps, v. 4. They had a good principle within, which would maintain and keep up their profession. 1. The heart is the vessel, which is our wisdom to get furnished; for out of a good treasure there, good things must be brought; but if that root be rotten-ness, the blossom will be dust. 2. Grace is the oil which we must have in this vessel; in the tabernacle there was constant provision made of oil for the light, Exod. 35. 14. Our light must shine before men in good works; but this cannot be, or not long, unless there be a fixed active principle in the heart, of faith in Christ, and love to God and our brethren, from which we must act in every thing we do in religion, with an eye to what is before us. They that took oil in their vessels, did it upon supposition, that perhaps the bridegroom might tarry. Note, In looking forward, it is good to prepare for the worst, to lay in for a long siege. But remember that this oil, which keeps the lamp burning, is derived to the candlestick from Jesus Christ, the great and good Olive, by the golden fifte of the ordinances, as it is said concerning wisdom, Proverbs 3. 13. Yet which is explained John 1. 16. Of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace.

2. Their common fault, during the bridegroom's delay; They all slumbered and slept, v. 5. Observe here,

1. The bridegroom tarried, that is, he did not come out so soon as they expected. What we look for as certain, we are apt to think is very near; many in the apostles' times imagined the day of the Lord was at hand, but it is not so. Christ, as to us, seems to tarry, and yet really does not, Hab. 2. 3. There is good reason for the Bridegroom's tarrying; there are many intermediate counsels and purposes to be accomplished, the elect must all be called in, God's patience must be manifested, and the saints' patience tried, the harvest of the earth must be reap- ed, the last great judgment brought to the harvest of history. But, though Christ tarry past our time, he will not tarry past the due time.

2. While he tarried, those that waited for him grew careless, and forgot what they were attending; They all slumbered and slept; as if they had given over looking for him; for, when the Son of man comes, he will not find faith, Luke 19. 8. Those that inferred the suddenness of it from its coming, when that answered not their expectation, were apt, from the delay, to infer its uncertainty. The wise virgins slumbered, and the foolish slept; so some distinguish it; however, they were both faulty. The wise virgins kept their lamps burning, but did not keep themselves awake. Note, Too many good Christians, when they have been long in profession, are like the foolish virgins, who are asleep when their presence is not coming; they intermit their care, abate their zeal, their graces are not lively, nor their works found perfect before God; and though all love be not lost, yet the first love is lost. If it was hard to the disciples to watch with Christ an hour, much more to watch with him an age. I sleep, saith the spouse, but my heart wakes. Observe, First, They slumbered, they were careless. Hence their first love is lost. Yet this is not a vice, provided it be not carelessness. Carelessness and remissness makes way for another. Those that allow themselves in slumbering, will scarcely keep themselves from sleeping; the refore dread the beginning of spiritual decays; Venienti occurrisce morbo—Attend to the first symptoms of disease. The ancients generally understood the virgins' slumbering and sleeping, of their dying; they all died, wise and foolish, (Ps. 49. 10.) before judg ment-day. So Ferus, Autequam veniat sponsus, omnibus obliviscendium est, hoc est, moriendium. Before the Bridegroom come, all must sleep, that is, do slumber. But I think it is rather to be taken as we have opened it.

(3.) The surprising summons given them to attend the bridegroom; (v. 6.) At midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh. Note, [1.] Though Christ tarried long, he will come at last; though he seems slow, he is sure. In his former coming, he was thought long by those that waited for the coming of the Lord, 2 Thess. 3. 20; but his second coming, though long deferred, is not forgotten; his enemies shall find, to their cost, that forbearance is no acquaintance; and his friends shall find, to their comfort, that the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and not lie. The year of the redeemed is fixed, and it will come. [2.] Christ's coming will be at our midnight, when we least look for him, and are most disposed to take our rest. His coming for the relief and comfort of his people, often is when the godly intended seems to be at the greatest distance; and his coming to reckon with his enemies, is when they put the evil day farthest from them. It was at midnight that the first-born of Egypt were destroyed, and Israel delivered, Exod. 12. 22. Death often comes when it is least expected; the soul is required this night, Luke 12: 20. Christ will come when his enemies are most secure, and it will not let us know when, to teach us our duty. [3.] When Christ comes, we must go forth to meet him. As Christians, we are bound to attend all the motions of the Lord Jesus, and meet him in all his outings. When he comes to us at death, we must go forth out of the body, out of the world, to meet him with affections and workings of soul suitable to the discoveries we then expect to make of himself. Go ye forth to meet him, is a call to those who are habitually prepared, to be actually ready. [4.] The notice given of Christ's approach, and the call to meet him, will be awakening; There was a cry made. His first coming was not with any observation at all, nor did they say, Lo, here is Christ, or Lo, he is there; he was in the world, and the world knew him not; but his second coming will be with the observation of all the world; Every eye shall see him. Isa. 11. 12. Then shall descend with a shout, Arise, ye dead, and come to judgment; and a cry from the earth too, a cry to rocks and mountains, Rev. 6. 16.

(4.) The address they all made to answer this summons; (v. 7.) They all arose, and trimmed their lamps, snuffed them, and supplied them with oil, and went about with all expedition to put themselves in a posture to receive the bridegroom. Now, [1.] This, in the wise virgins, bespeaks an actual preparation for the Bridegroom's coming. Note, Even those that are best prepared for death, have, upon the immediate arrest of it, work to do to get themselves actually ready, that they may be found in peace (2 Pet. 3. 14.) found doing, (ch. 24. 46.) and not found naked, 2 Cor. 5. 3. It will be a day of search and inquiry; and it concerns us to think how we shall then be found. When we see the day approaching, we must address ourselves to our dying work, and seek to fit ourselves for the Bridegroom's coming. Note, Even counterfeited graces will serve a man to make a show of when he comes to die, as well as they have done all his life long; the hypocrite's hopes blaze when they are just expiring, like a lightning before death.

(5.) The distress which the foolish virgins were in, for want of oil, v. 8, 9. This bespeaks, [1.] The strictness of those which some hypocrites have a regard to, for the misery of their state, even on this side death, when God opens their eyes to see their folly, and themselves perishing with a lie in their right hand. Or, however, [2.] The real misery of their state on the other side death, and in the judgment; how far their fair, but false, profession of religion, will be from availing them anything in the great day; see v. 26.

First, Their lamps are gone out. The lamps of hypocrites often go out in this life, when they who have begun in the spirit end in the flesh, and the hypocrisy breaks out in an open apostasy, 2 Pet. 2. 20. The profession withers, and the credit of it is lost; the hopes full, and the comfort of them is gone; how often is the candle of the wicked thus put out? Job 21. 17. Yet many a hypocrite keeps up his credit, and the comfort of his profession, such as it is, to the last; but what is it when God takes away his soul? Job 27. 8. If his candle be not put out before him, it is put out with him, Job 18. 5, 6. He shall lie down in sorrow, Isa. 50. 11. The gains of a hypocritical profession will not follow a man to judgment, ch. 7. 22, 23. The lamps are gone out, when the hypocrite's hope proves like the spider's web, (Job 8. 11, &c.) and like the giving up of the ghost, (Job 11. 20.) like Absalom's mule that left him in the oak.

Secondly, They wanted oil to supply them when they were going out. Note, Those that take up short of true grace, will certainly find the want of it one time or other. An external profession, well humoured, may carry a man far, but it will not carry him through; it may light him along this world, but the lamps of the valley of the shadow of death will put him out.

Thirdly, They would gladly be beholden to the wise virgins for a supply out of their vessels; Give us of your oil. Note, The day is coming when carnal hypocrites would gladly be found in the condition of true Christians. Those who now hate the strictness of religion, will, at death and judgment, wish for the solid comforts of it. Those who care not to live the life, yet would die the death, of the righteous. The day is coming when those who now are in league with those that are enemies of religion, would gladly get an interest in them, and would value those as their best friends and benefactors, whom now they set with the dogs of their flock. Give us of your oil; that is, 'Speak a good word for us,' so some; but there is no occasion for vouchers in the great day, the Judge knows what is every man's true character. But is it not well that they are brought to say, Give us of your oil? It is so; but, 1. This request was exerted by sensible necessities. Note, Those will see their need of grace hereafter, when it should save them, who will not see their need of grace now, when it should sanctify and rule them. 2. It comes too late. God would have given them oil, had they asked in time; but there is no buying when the market is over, no bidding when the inch of candle is dropped.

Fourthly, They were denied a share in their companions' oil. Their oil was suitable to such an age of grace, in which they were thus reproved by good people.

The wise answered, Not so; that peremptory declarative is not in the original, but supplied by the translators: these wise virgins would rather give a reason, without a positive refusal, than (as many do) give a positive refusal, without a reason. They were well inclined to help their neighbours in distress; but, We must not, we cannot, we dare not, do it, lest there be not enough for us and you; charity begins at home; but go, and buy for your selves. Note, 1. Those that would be saved, must have grace of their own. Though we have benefit by the communion of saints, and the faith and prayers of others may now redound to our advantage, yet our own sanctification is indispensably necessary to our own salvation. This may be seen in the case of Adam and Eve. They never had grace, and yet they were created in the image and likeness of God. But if they had been born in grace, then they could not have sinned. And this is the case with all sinners. Every man shall give account of himself, and therefore let every man prove his own work; for he cannot get another to muster for him in that day. 2. Those that have most grace have none to spare; all we have is little enough for ourselves to appear before God in. The best have need to borrow from Christ, but they have none to lend to any of the needful. Thus would the church live by his faith. Every man shall have account of himself, and therefore let every man prove his own work; for he cannot get another to muster for him in that day.

The Thirdly, never have grace to come, or have it, and be not renewed in the whole heart. The church shall be but a man's day dreams of works of supererogation and the imputation of the righteousness of saints, forgets that it was the wisdom of the wise virgins to understand that they had but oil enough for themselves, and none for others. But observe, These wise virgins did not upbraid the foolish with their neglect, nor boast of their own forecast, nor torment them with suggestions tending to despair, but gave them the best advice the case will bear, Go ye rather to them that sell. Note, Those that deal foolishly in the affairs of their souls are to be pitied, and not insulted over; for who made thee to differ? When ministers attend such as have been mindless of God and their souls all their days, but are under death-bed convictions; and, because true repentance is never too late, will not put to repentance, they are close with Christ; yet, because late repentance is seldom true, they do but as these wise virgins did by the foolish, even make the best of bad. They can but tell them what is to be done, if it be not too late; but whether the door may not be shut before it is done, is an unspeakable hazard. It is good advice now, if it be taken in time, Go to them that sell, and buy. Note. Those that would have grace, must have recourse to God and attend upon, the means of grace. See Isa. 55. 1.

(6.) The coming of the bridegroom, and the issue of all this different character of the wise and foolish virgins. See what came of it.

[i]While they went out to buy, the bridegroom came. Note, With regard to those that put off their good work no others. It is a thousand to one, that they have not time to do it. Getting grace is a work of time, and cannot be done in a hurry. While the poor awakened soul addresses itself, upon a sick-bed, to repentance and prayer, in awful confusion, it scarcely knows which end to begin at, or what to do first; and presently death comes, judgment comes, and the work is undone, and the poor sinner undone for ever. This comes of having oil to buy when we should, burn it, and grace to get when we should use it.

The bridegroom came. Note, Our Lord Jesus will come to his people, at the great day; as a bridegroom; will come in pomp and rich attire, attended with his friends: now that the Bridegroom is taken away from us, we fast, (ch. 9. 15.) but then will be an everlasting feast. Then the Bridegroom will fetch his countrymen to be his bridegroom, (John 17. 24.) and will rejoice over his bride, Isa. 62. 5.

[i]They that were ready went in with him to the marriage. Note, First, To be eternally glorified is to go in with Christ to the marriage, to be in his immediate presence, and in the most intimate fellowship and communion with him in a state of eternal rest, joy, and plenty. Secondly, Those, and those only, are fit for eternal joy, that are made ready for heaven here, that are turned to the Lord, and same thing, 2 Cor. 5. 5. Thirdly, The suddenness of death, and of Christ's coming to us then, will be no obstruction to our happiness, if we have been habitually prepared.

[i]The door was shut, as is usual when all the company is come that are to be admitted. The door was shut, First, To secure those that were with in; that, being now made pillars in the house of our God, they may go no more out, Rev. 3. 12.Adam was put into paradise, but the door was left open, and so he went out again; but when glorified saints are put into the heavenly paradise, they are shut in. Secondly, To exclude those that were out. The state of saints and sinners will then be unalterably fixed, and those that are shut out then will be shut out for ever. Now the gate is strait, yet it is open; but then it will be shut and bolted, and a great gulf fixed. This was like the shutting of the door of the ark; after the door was shut, no present preservation, so all the rest were finally abandoned.

[4.] The foolish virgins came when it was too late, (v. 11.) Aferward came also the other virgins. Note, First, There are many that will seek admission into heaven when it is too late; as profane Esau, who afterward would have inherited the blessing. God and religion will be glorified by those late solicitations, though sinners will not be saved by them; it is for the honour of Lord, Lord, that is, of fervent and importunate prayer, that those who slight it now will flee to it shortly, and it will not be called whining and canting then. Secondly, The vain confidence of hypocrites will carry them very far in their expectations of happiness. They go to heaven-gate, and demand entrance, and yet are shut out; lifted up to heaven to God, but shut out as to the goodness of their state, and yet thrust down to hell.

[5.] They were rejected, as Esau was; (v. 12.) I know you not. Note, We are all concerned to seek the Lord while he may be found; for there is a time coming when he will not be found. Time was, when Lord, Lord, open to us, would have sped well, by virtue of that promise, Knock, and it shall be opened to you; and yet it is too late. The Lord is come; nor is any now bound with, Verily I say unto you, which amounts to no less than swearing in his wrath, that they shall never enter into his rest. It bespeaks him resolved, and then silenced by it.

Lastly, Here is a practical inference drawn from this parable; (v. 13.) Watch therefore. We had it before, (ch. 24. 42.) and here it is repeated, as the most needful caution. Note, 1. Our great duty is to watch, to attend to the business of our souls with the utmost diligence and circumspection. Be awake, and be watchful. 2. It is a good reason for our watching, that the time of our Lord's coming is very uncertain; we know neither the day nor the hour. Therefore every day and every hour we must be ready, and not off our watch any day in the year, or any hour in the day. Be thou in the fear of the Lord every day, and all the day long.

14. For the kingdom of heaven is as a man travelling into a far country, who called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods. 15. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey. 16. Then he that had received the five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents. 17. And likewise he that had received two, he also gained other two. 18. But he that had received one went and dug in the earth, and hid his lord's money. 19. After a long time, the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them. 20. And so he that had received five talents came, and brought other five talents, saying, Lord, thou delivertest unto me five talents: behold, I have gained beside them five talents more. 21. His lord said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord. 22. He also that had received two talents, and said, Lord, thou delivertest unto me two talents: behold, I have gained two other talents beside them. 23. His lord said unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord. 24. Then he which had received one talent came, and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not straid: 25. And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine. 26. His lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strayed: 27. Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. 28. Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents. 29. For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath. 30. And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

We have here the parable of the talents committed to three servants; this implies that we are in a state of work and business, as the former implies that we are in a state of expectancy. That shewed the necessity of habitual preparation, the duty of actual diligence in our present work and service. In that, we were stirred up to do well for our own souls; in this, to lay out ourselves for the glory of God and the good of others.

In this parable, 1. The Master is Christ, who is the absolute Owner and Proprietor of all persons and things, and in a special manner of his church; into his hands all things are delivered. 2. The servants are Christians, his own servants, so they are called; born in his house, bought with his money, devoted to his praise, and employed in his work. It is probable that ministers are especially intended here, who are more immediately attending on him, and sent by him. St. Paul often calls himself a servant of Jesus Christ. See 2 Tim. 2. 24.

We have three things, in general, in this parable. 1. The trust committed to these servants; Their master delivered to them his goods; having appointed them to work, (for Christ keeps no servants to be idle,) he left them something to work upon. Note, Christ's servants have and receive their all from him: for they are of themselves worth nothing, nor have any thing they can call their own but sin. 2. Our receiving from Christ is in order to our working for him. Our privileges are intended to find us with business. The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. 3. Whatever we receive to be made use of for Christ, still the property is vested in him; we are but tenants upon his land, stewards of his manifold grace, 1 Pet. 4. 10. Now observe here,

(1.) On what occasion this trust was committed to these servants; The master was travelling into a far country. This is explained, Eph. 4. 8. When he ascended on high, he gave gifts unto men. Note, [1.] When Christ went to heaven, he was as a man travelling into a far country; that is, he went with a purpose to be away a great while. [2.] When he went, he took care to furnish his church with all things necessary for it during his personal absence. For, and in consideration of, his departure, he committed the church to his care; to his right, or to the duty of his servants; in his interest, or for his benefit. First, There were the spiritual—[1.] The great depositum, (as it is called, 1 Tim. 6. 20. 2 Tim. 1. 14.) the good thing that is committed to us; and he sent his Spirit to enable his servants to teach and profess those truths, to press and observe these laws, to improve and apply these promises, and to exercise and employ those powers, ordinary or extraordinary, this Christ, at his ascension, left to his church.

(2.) In what proportion this trust was committed. [1.] He gave talents; a talent of silver is computed to be in our money here more than forty-five pounds. For, and in consideration of, his departure, he committed the church to his care; to the duty of his servants; in his interest, or for his benefit. For, and in consideration of, his departure, he committed the church to his care; to the duty of his servants; in his interest, or for his benefit. For, and in consideration of, his departure, he committed the church to his care; to the duty of his servants; in his interest, or for his benefit. For, and in consideration of, his departure, he committed the church to his care; to the duty of his servants; in his interest, or for his benefit. For, and in consideration of, his departure, he committed the church to his care; to the duty of his servants; in his interest, or for his benefit. For, and in consideration of, his departure, he committed the church to his care; to the duty of his servants; in his interest, or for his benefit.
themselves to their business. Those that have so much work to do, as every Christian has, need to set about it quietly and steadily, and not waste no time. They went, and traded. Note, A true Christian is a spiritual tradesman. Trades are called mysteries, and without controversy great is the mystery of godliness; it is a manufacture trade; there is something to be done by us upon our own hearts, and for the good of others. It is a merchant-trade; things of less value to us are parted with for things of greater value; spiritual interests, for the world, Prov. 31. 10. 11. A tradesman is one who, having made his trade his choice, and taken pains to learn it, makes it his business to follow it, lays out all he has for the advancement of it, makes all other affairs bend to it, and lives upon the gain of it. Thus does a true Christian act in the work of religion; we have no stock of our own to trade with, but trade as factors with our Master's stock of the endowments of the mind—reason, wit, learning, must be used in subserviency to religion; the enjoyments of the world—estate, credit, interest, power, preferment, must be improved for the honour of Christ. The ordinances of the gospel, and our opportunities of attending them, bibles, ministers, sabbaths, sacraments, must be improved for the end for which they were instituted, and are made use of by him, and the gifts and graces of the Spirit must be exercised; and this is trading with our talents.

(2.) They were successful; they doubled their stock, and in a little time made cent. per cent. of it: he that had five talents soon made them other five. Trading with our talents is not always successful with others, but, however, it shall be so to ourselves, Isa. 49. 4. Note, The honest and diligent makes rich in graces, and comforts, and treasures of good works. There is a great deal to be got by industry in religion. Observe, The returns were in proportion to the receivings. [1.] From those to whom God hath given five talents, he expects the improvement of five, and to reap plentifully where he sows plentifully. The greater gifts any have, the more pains they ought to take, as those must that have a large stock to manage. [2.] From those to whom he hath given but two talents, he expects only the improvement of two, which may encourage those who are placed in a lower and narrower sphere of usefulness; if they lay out themselves to do good according to the best of their capacity and opportunity, they shall be accepted, though they do not so much prosper.

2. The third did ill; (v. 18.) He that had received the one talent, went and hid his lord's money. Though the parable represents but one in three unfaithful, yet, in a history that answers this parable, we find the disproportion quite the other way, when ten lepers were cleansed, nine of the ten hid the talent, and only one returned to give thanks. Luke 17. 17. A Christian faithful servant had that had but one talent; doubtless, there are many that have five talents, and bury them all; great abilities, great advantages, and yet do no good with them: but Christ would hint to us, (1.) That, if he that had but one talent be reckoned with thus for burying that one, much more will they be accounted offenders that have more, that have many, and bury them. In a man's own mind, in the small corner of his own, he is in outer darkness, because he did not improve what he had, as he might have done, of how much fonder punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, that tramples under foot the greatest advantages? (2.) That those who have least to do for God, frequently do least of what they have to do. Some make it an excuse for their laziness, that they have not the opportunities of serving God that others have; and, because they have not wherewithal to do what they say they would, they will not do what they are able, and can, and so sit down and do nothing; it is really an aggravation of their sloth, they when they have but one talent to take care about, they neglect that one.

He digged in the earth, and hid the talent, for fear it should be stolen; he did not misdoubt or misemploy it, did not enmembel it or squander it away, but he hid it. Money is like manure, (so my lord Bacon used to say,) good for nothing in the heap, but it is a great treasure, and as it has been often seen under the sun, treasure heaped together, (Jam. 5. 3. Eccl. 6. 1, 2,) which does good to nobody; and so it is in spiritual gifts; many have them, and make no use of them for the end for which they were given them. Those that have estates, and do not lay them out in works of piety and charity; that have power and interest, and do not with it promote religion in the places where they live; millions that have capacities and opportunities of doing good, but do not stir up the gift that is in them, are those slothful servants that seek their own things more than Christ's.

He hid his lord's money; had it been his own, he might have done as he pleased; but whatever abilities and advantages we have, they are not our own, and therefore must be used as instruments to do good to our Lord, whose goods they are. It was an aggravation of his slothfulness, that his fellow-servants were busy and successful in trading, and their zeal should have provoked his. Are others active, and shall we be idle?

III. The account of this improvement, v. 19. 1. The account is deferred; it is not till after a long time that they are reckoned with; not that the master neglected his affairs, or that God is slack concerning his promise; (2 Pet. 3. 9.) no, he is ready to judge; (1 Pet. 4. 5.) but every thing must be done in its time and order. 2. Yet the day of account comes at last; The lord of those servants recketh with them. Note, The stewards of the manifolds grace of God must shortly give account of their stewardship. [1.] We must all be reckoned with—what good have we got to our own souls, and what good have we done to others, by the advantages we have enjoyed. See Rom. 14. 10, 11. Now here is, [1.] The good account of the faithful servants, and there observe,

[1.] The servants giving up the account; (v. 20. 22.) Lord thou deliverest to me five talents, and to me two; behold, I have gained five talents, and I two talents more.

First, Christ's faithful servants acknowledge with thankfulness his vouchsafements to them; Lord, thou deliverest to me such and such things. Note, 1. It is good to keep a particular account of our receivings from God, to remember what we have received, that we may know what is expected from us, and may render according to the benefit. 2. We must own our luck that has come, when the general mention of God's favour to us, of the honour he has put upon us, in intrusting us with his goods, and of that grace which is the spring and fountain of all the good that is in us, or is done by us. For, the truth is, The more we do for God, the more we are indebted to him for making use of us, and enabling us, for his service.

Secondly, They produce, as an evidence of their faithfulness, what they have gained. Note, God's good stewards have something to show for their diligence: Show me thy faith by thy works. He that is a good man, let him shew it, Jam. 3. 13. If we be careful in our spiritual trade, it will soon be seen by us, and our works will follow us, Rev. 14. 13. Not that the saints will, in the great day, make mention of their own good deeds; no, Christ will do that for them; (v. 35.) but it intimates, that they who faithfully improve their talents shall have boldness in the day of Christ, 1 John 2. 28. — 17. And it is observable, that he who had but two talents, gave up his account as cheerfully as he who had five; for our comfort, in the day of account, will be according to our faithfulness, not according to our usefulness; our sincerity, not our success; according to the degree of the grace we had, not according to the degree of our opportunities.

[2.] The master's acceptance and approbation of their account, v. 21, 23.

First, He commended them; Well done, good and faithful servant. Note, The diligence and integrity of those who approve themselves the good and faithful servants of Jesus Christ, will certainly be found of great avail; it will secure them against the judgment of their own consciences, and recommend them to the approbation of their Lord. Now, they are justly commended, if they have been found, as Jesus says, faithful from the beginning, Luke 12. 14. 1. Their persons will be accepted; Thou good and faithful servant. He that knows the integrity of his servants now, will witness to it in the great day; and they that are found faithful shall be called so. Perhaps they were censured by men, as righteous overmuch; but Christ will give them their just characters; God will commended them, 1 Cor. 4. 5. 2. Their performances will be accepted; Well done. Christ will call those, and those only, good servants, that have done well; for it is by patient continuance in well-doing that we seek for this glory and honour; and if we seek, we shall find; if we do that which is good, and do it well, we shall have praise of the same. Some masters are so morose, that they will not commend their servants, though they do their work ever so well; it is thought enough not to chide: but Christ will commend his servants that do well; whether their praise be of men or no, it is of him; and if we have the good word of our Master, the matter is not great what our fellow-servants say of us; if he saith, Well done, we are happy, and it should then be a small thing to us to be judged of men's judgment; as, on the contrary, not he who commendeth himself, or whom his neighbours commend, is approved, but whom the Lord commends.

Secondly, He rewards them. The faithful servants of Christ shall not be put off with bare commendation; no, all their work and labour of love shall be rewarded.

Now this reward is here expressed two ways. 1. In one expression agreeable to the parable; Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. It is usual, in the courts of princes and families of great men, to advance those to higher offices that have been faithful in lower. Note, Christ is a Master that will prefer his servants who acquit themselves well. Christ has honour in store for those that honour him—a crown, 2 Tim. 4. 8. a throne, Rev. 3. 21. a kingdom, ch. 25. 34. Here they are beggars, in heaven they shall be rulers. The upright shall have dominion. Christ's servants are all princes.

Observe, the discretion of God in his work, and the reward; there are but few things in which the saints are serviceable to the glory of God, but there are many things wherein they shall be glorified with God. What charge we receive from God, what work we do for God in this world, is but little, very little, compared with the joy set before us. I put together all our services, all our sufferings, all our impropriations, and we are but a few things, next to nothing, not worthy to be compared, not fit to be named, the same day with the glory to be revealed.

2. In another expression, which slips out of the parable into the thing signified by it; Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. Note, 1. The state of the blessed is a state of joy, not only because all tears shall then be wiped away, but all the springs of comfort shall be opened to them, and the fountains of joy broken up. Where there are the vision and fruition of God, a perfection of holiness, and the society of the blessed, there cannot be but a fulness of joy. 2. This joy is the joy of our Lord; the joy which he himself has purchased and provided for them; the joy of the redeemed, bought with the blood of the Lamb. It is the joy which he himself is in the possession of, and which he had his eye upon when he endured the cross, and despised the shame, Heb. 12. 2. It is the joy of which he himself is the Fountain and Centre. It is the joy of the Lord, for it is joy in the Lord, who is our exceeding Joy. Abraham was not willing that the steward of his house, though faithful, should be his heir; whereas Christ commends his faithful stewards into his own joy, to be joint-heirs with him.

(3.) Glorified saints shall enter into this joy, shall have a full and complete possession of it, as the heir, when he comes of age, enters upon his estate, or as they that were ready went in to the marriage feast. Here the joy of our Lord enters into the saints, in the earnest of the Spirit; shortly they shall enter into it, shall be in it to eternity, as in the element of fire.

(2.) The bad account of the slothful servant. Observe, [1.] His apology for himself, v. 24, 25. Though he had received but one talent, for that one he is called to account. The smallness of our receiving will not excuse us from a reckoning. None shall be called to an account for more than they have received; but for what we have we must all account. Observe, First, What he cooly does. He comes to the account with a deal of assurance, relying on the plea he had to put in, that he was able to say, Lo, thou hast that is thine; if I have not made more, as the others have done, yet this I can say, I have not made it less. This, he thinks, may serve to bring him off, if not with praise, yet with safety.

Note, Many a one goes very securely to judgment, presuming upon the validity of a plea that will be overruled as vain and frivolous. Slothful professors, who* are afraid of doing too much for God, yet hope to come off as well as those that take so much pains in religion. Thus the sluggard is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason, Prov. 26. 16. This servant thought that his account would pass well enough, because he could say, There thou hast that is thine; and Lord, I was not afraid of the loss of my estate, nor afraid of my profaner of my sabbaths, no opposer of good ministers and good preaching; Lord, I never ridiculed my Bible, nor set my wits to work to banter religion, nor abused my power to persecute any good man; I never drowned my parts, nor wasted God's good creatures in drunkenness and glutonny, nor ever to my knowledge did I injury to any body. Many, that are called Christians, build great hopes for heaven upon their being a hazards with such an account; yet all this amounts to no more than, There thou hast that is thine; as if no more were required, or could be expected.

Secondly, What he confesses. He owns the burying of his talent, I hid thy talent in the earth. He speaks as if that were no great fault; nay, as if he deserved praise for his prudence in putting it in a safe place, and running no hazard with it. Note, Those who are communicative, who make a very light matter of that which will be their condemnation in the great day. Or, if he was conscious to himself that it was his fault, it intimates how easily slothful servants will be convicted in the judgment; there will need no great search for proof, for their own tongue shall fall upon them.

Thirdly, What he makes his excuse; I knew that thou wast a hard man, and I was afraid. Good thoughts of God would beget love, and that love would make us diligent and faithful; but hard thoughts of God beget fear, and that fear makes us slothful and unfaithful. His excuse bespeaks,

1. The sentiments of an enemy; I knew thee, that thou art a hard man. This was like that wicked saying of the house of Israel, The way of the Lord is not equal, Ezek. 18. 25. Thus his defence is his offence. The foolishness of man perverteth his way, and then, as if that would mend the matter, his ways are straighter than the transgression, as Adam, who implicitly laid the fault on God himself; The woman which thou gavest me. Note, Carnal hearts are apt to conceive false and wicked opinions concerning God, and with them to harden themselves in their evil ways. Observe how confidently he speaks; I knew thee to be so. How could he know him to be so? What inquiry have we or our fathers found in him? Jer. 2. 5. Wherin has he wearied us with our work, or deceived us in his wages? Mic. 6. 3. Has he been a wilderness to us, or a land of darkness? Thus long God has governed the world, and may ask, with more reason than Samuel himself could, Whom have I deformed, or whom have I oppressed? Does not all the world know the contrary, that he is so far from being a hard Master, other than that he is full of his goodness, so far from reaping where he sowed not, that he sows a great deal where he reaps nothing? For he causes the sun to shine, and his rain to fall, upon the evil and unthankful, and fills their hearts with food and gladness, who says to the Almighty, Depart from us. This suggestion bespeaks the common reproach which wicked people cast upon God, as if all the blame of their sin and ruiner were upon him. And here it is observed, whereas it is certain that never any, who faithfully improved the common grace they had, perished for want of special grace; nor can any shew what could in reason have been done more for an unfruitful vineyard than God has done in it. God does not demand brick, and deny straw; nor, whatever is required in the covenant, is promised in the covenant; so that if we perish, it is owing to ourselves.

2. The spirit of a slave; I was afraid. This ill affection toward God arose from his false notions of him; and nothing is more unworthy of God, nor more hinders our duty to him, than slavish fear. This has bondage and torment, and is directly opposite to that entire love which the great commandment requires. Note, Hard thoughts of God drive us from, and cram us in, his service. Those who think it impossible to please him, and in vain to serve him, will do nothing to purpose in religion.

[2.] His Lord's answer to this apology. His plea will stand him in no stead, it is overruled, nay, it is made to turn against him, and he is struck speechless with it; for here we have his conviction and his condemnation.

And the conviction, v. 26, 27. Two things he is convicted of:

1. Slothfulness; Thou wicked and slothful servant. Note, Slothful servants are wicked servants, and will be reckoned with as such by their Master; for he that is slothful in his work, and neglects the good that God has commanded, is brother to him that is a great waster, by doing the evil that God hates. v. 26, 27. He that is careless in God's work, is near akin to him that is busy in the devil's work, Satia est malis nihil frevisse bonum—To do no good is to incur very serious blame. Omissions are sins, and must come into judgment; slothfulness makes way for wickedness; all become filthy, for there is none that doeth good, Ps. 14. 3. When the house is empty, the unclean spirit takes possession. Those that are idle in the affairs of their souls, are not only idle, but something worse, 1 Tim. 5. 13. When men sleep, the enemy sows tares.

2. Self-contradiction; (v. 26, 27.) Thou knewest that I was hard, and yet I sent thee to be a master, etc. To ought therefore to have put my money to the exchangers. Note, The hard thoughts which sinners have of God, though false and unjust, will be so far from justifying their wickedness and slothfulness, that they will rather aggravate and add to their guilt. These ways this may be taken: (1.) "Suppose I had been so hard a Master, shouldest not thou therefore have brought mine money into my hands, that I might not be speaking to thee, that I was not for love, yet for fear, and for that reason oughtest not thou to have minded thy work?" If our God be a consuming fire, in consideration of that, let us study how to serve him. Or, thus, (2.) "If thou didst think me to be a hard Master, and therefore durst not trade with the money thyself, for fear of losing it by it, and being made to stand to the loss, yet thou mightest have put it into the hands of the exchangers, or goldsmiths, mightest have brought it into the bank, and then at my coming, if I could not have had the greater improvement, by trade and merchandise, (as of the other talents,) yet I might have had the lesser improvement, of bare interest, and should have received my own with usury," which, it seems, was a common practice at that time, and may well be lost, if we could not, or durst not, do what we would, yet that excuse will not serve, when it will be made to appear that we did not do what we could and durst. If we could not find in our hearts to venture upon more difficult and hazardous services, yet will that justifi us in shrinking from those that were more safe and easy? Something is better than nothing; if we fail of shewing our courage in bold enter tainments, God will stand by us. Note, In the day of account, wicked and slothful servants will be left quite without excuse; free-graziers will be overruled, and every mouth will be stopped; and those who now stand so much upon their own justification, will not have one word to say for themselves.

Secondly, His condemnation. The slothful serv ant is sentenced.

1. To be deprived of his talent; (v. 28, 29.) Take therefore the talent from him. The talents were first disposed of by the Master, as an absolute Owner, but this was now disposed of by him as a Judge; he takes it from the unfaithful servant, to punish him, and gives it to him that was eminently faithful, to reward him. And the meaning of this part of the parable we have in the reason of the sentence, (v. 28.) To every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance. (4.) To the treasures of this life worldly wealth and possessions. These we are intrusted with, to be used for the glory of God, and the good of those about us. Now he that hath these things, and useth them for these ends, he shall have abundance; perhaps abundance of the things themselves, at least, abundance of comfort in them, and of better things; but from him that hath not, that is, from those things as if he had them not, had not power to eat of them, or to do good with them, (Avraro deest, quantum habes, quanm quod non habes—The miser may be considered as destitute of what he has, as well as of what he has not,) they shall be taken away. Solomon explains this, (Prov. 11. 24.) There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty. Giving to the poor, n trading with what we have, and the returns will be rich; it will multiply the meal in the barrel, and the oil in the cruse; but those that are sordid, and niggardly, and uncharitable, will find that these riches, which are so got, perish by evil travel, Excl. 16:11.5. Thus, he that knoweth not the day of his visitation, shall have the things that belong to their peace bid from their eyes. For proof of this, see what God did to Shiloh, Jer. 7. 12. (3.) We may apply it to the common gifts of the Spirit. He that hath these, and doeth good with them, shall have abundance; these gifts improve by exercise, and brighten by being used; the more we do, the more we may do, in religion; but those who stir not up the gift that is in them, who do not exert themselves according to their capacity, their gifts rust, and decay, and go out like a neglected fire. From him, that hath not a living principle of grace in his soul, shall be taken away the common gifts which he hath, as the lamps of the foolish virgins went out for want of oil, v. 8. Thus the arm of the Idle shepherd, which he had shaggily folded up in his bosom, comes to be dried up, and his right eye, which he had carelessly or wilfully shut, becomes utterly darkened, as it is threatened, Ezek. 11. 17.

2. He is sentenced to be cast into outer darkness, v. 30. Here, (1.) His character is that of an unprofitable servant. Note, Slothful servants will be reckoned with as unprofitable servants, who do nothing to the purpose of their coming into the world, nothing to answer the end of their birth or baptism, who are no way serviceable to the glory of God, the good of others, or the salvation of their own souls. A slothful servant is a withered member in the body, a barren tree in the vineyard, an idle drone in the hive, he is good for nothing. In one sense, we are all unprofitable servants; (Luke 17. 10.) we cannot profit God, Job 22. 2. But to others, and to ourselves, it is required that we be profitable; if we be not, Christ will not have us as his servants; it is not enough that we do not hurt, but we must do good, must bring forth fruit, and though thereby God is not profited, yet he is glorified, John 15. 8. (2.) His doom is, to be cast into outer darkness. Here, as in what was said to the faithful servants, our Saviour slides insensibly out of the parable into the thing intended by it, and it serves as a key to the whole; for, outer darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth, is, in Christ's discourse, the converse of the blessings of the righteous blessed in heaven. Their state is, [1.] Very dismal; it is outer darkness. Darkness is uncomfortable and frightful, it was one of the plagues of Egypt. In hell there are chains of darkness, 2 Pet. 2. 4. In the dark no man can work, a fit punishment for a slothful servant. It is outer darkness, out from the light of heaven, out from the joy of their Lord, into which the faithful servants were admitted; out from the fairest skies. Compare ch. 19. 12.—31. doleful; there is weeping, which bespeaks great sorrow; and gnashing of teeth, which bespeaks great vexation and indignation. This will be the portion of the slothful servant.

31. When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: 32. And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: 33. And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. 34. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: 35. For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: 36. Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. 37. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? 38. When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? 39. Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? 40. And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me. 41. Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. 42. For I was an hungered, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink: 43. I was a stranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not: sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. 44. Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, in prison, and did not minister unto thee? 45. Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. 46. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal.

We have here a description of the process of the last judgment in the great day. There are some passages in it that are paradoxical; as the separating between the sheep and the goats, and the dialogues between the Judge and the persons judged; but there is no thread of similitude carried through the discourse, and therefore it is rather to be called a draught or delineation of the final judgment, than a parable; it is, as it were, the explanation of the former parables. And here we have,

1. The placing of the Judge upon the judgment-seat: (v. 30.) When the Son of man shall come. Observe here,

1. There is a judgment to come, in which every man shall be sentenced to a state of everlasting happiness, or misery, in the world of recompence or retribution, according to what he did in this world of trial and probation, which is to be judged of by the rule of the everlasting gospel.

2. The administration of the judgment of the great day is committed to the Son of man; for by him
God will judge the world, (Acts 17. 31.) and to him all judgment is committed, and therefore the judgment of that day, which is the centre of all. Here, as elsewhere, the last judgment is spoken of, Christ is called the Son of man, because he is to judge the sons of men; (and, being himself of the same nature, he is the more unexceptionable; and because his wonderful condescension to take upon him our nature, and to become the Son of man, will be recompensed by his exaltation in that day, and an honour put upon the human nature.

Rome, the church at Rome, a church opened by St. Paul, to the which the gospel was communicated by his own mission, is here celebrated; that is, the church of Rome, with temporal power in temporal things, namely, a magazine for the world, will be splendid and glorious. Agrippa and Bernice came to the judgment-seat with great pomp; (Acts 25. 23.) but that was (as the original word is) great fancy. Christ will come to the judgment-seat in real glory; the Sun of righteousness shall then shine in his meridian lustre, and the Prince of the kings of the earth shall shew the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honours of his excellent majesty; and all the world shall see what the saints only do now believe—that he is the brightness of his Father's glory. He shall come not only in the glory of his Father, but in his own glory, as Mediator: his first coming was under a black cloud of obscurity; his second will be in a bright cloud of glory. The assurance Christ gave his disciples of his future glory, might help to take off the offence of the cross, and his passion, which was the beginning of our redemption. Concerning this, see, (Rom. 8. 31.)

4. When Christ comes in his glory to judge the world, he will bring all his holy angels with him. This glorious person will have a glorious retinue, his holy myriads, who will be not only his attendants, but ministers of his justice; they shall come with him both for state and service. They must come to call the court, (1 Thess. 4. 16.) to gather the elect, (2 Thess. 2. 1.) and be witnesses of the saint's glory, (Luke 12. 8.) and of sinners' misery, Rev. 14. 10.

5. He will then sit upon the throne of his glory. He is now sat down with the Father upon his throne; and it is a throne of grace, to which we may come boldly; it is a throne of government, the throne of his father David; he is a priest upon that throne: but there he will sit on the throne of glory, the throne of judgment. See Dan. 7. 9. 10. This was his throne, though there was not its like in any kingdom, but was a dunghill to it. Christ, in the days of his flesh, was arraigned as a Prisoner at the bar; but, at his second coming, he will sit as a Judge upon the bench.

II. The appearing of all the children of men before him; (v. 32.) Before him shall be gathered all nations. Note, The judgment of the great day will be a general judgment. All must be summoned before Christ's tribunal; all of every age of the world, from the beginning to the end of time; all of every place on earth, even from the remotest corners of the world, most obscure, and distant from each other; all nations, all those nations of men that are made of one blood, to dwell on all the face of the earth. Concerning the glory that will be then made between the precious and the vile: If shall separate them one from another, as the tares and wheat are separated at the harvest, the good fish and bad at the shore, the corn and chaff in the flour. Wicked and godly here dwell together in the same kingdoms, cities, churches, families, and are not certainly distinguishable one from another; such are the infirmities of saints, such the frailty of sinners, and one event to both: but in that day they will be separated, and parted for ever; Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, Mal. 3. 18. They cannot separate themselves one from another in this world, (1 Cor. 5. 10.) nor can any one else separate them; (ch. 13. 28.) but the Lord knows them that are his, and he can separate them. This separation will be so exact, that the most inconsiderable saints shall not be lost in the crowd of sinners, nor the most prominent sinner hid in the crowd of saints; (Ps. 1. 5.) but every one shall go to his own place. This is compared to a shepherd's dividing between the sheep and the goats; it is taken from Ezek. 34. 17. Behold, I judge between cattle and cattle. Note, 1. Jesus Christ is the great Shepherd; he now feeds his flock like a shepherd, and will shortly distinguish between his sheep and his goats; for, as God calls his sheep by name, so he will call his sheep and name his goats, (Ps. 139. 15.) and will separate them: not as Laban divided his sheep from Jacob's; but before the three days' journey between them, Gen. 30. 35. 36. 2. The godly are like sheep—innocent, mild, patient, useful: the wicked are like goats, a baser kind of animal, unsavoury and unprofitable. These sheep and goats are here feeding all day in the same pasture, but will be cotted at night in different folds; being thus divided, he will set the sheep on his right hand, and the goats on his left, v. 33. Christ puts honour upon the godly, as we shew respect to those we set on our right hand; but the wicked shall rise to everlasting shame, Dan. 12. 2. It is not said that he shall put the rich on his right hand, and the poor on his left: the learned and noble on his right hand, and the unlearned and despised on his left; but he will judge by their works, and the wicked on his left. All the riches, goods and excellencies of men shall be abolished; but the great distinction of men into saints and sinners, sanctified and unsanctified, will remain for ever, and men's eternal state will be determined by it. The wicked took up with left-hand blessings, riches and honour, and so shall their doom be.

IV. The process of the judgment concerning each of these.

1. Concerning the godly, on the right hand. Their cause must be first dispatched, that they may be assessors with Christ in the judgment of the wicked, whose misery will be aggravated by their seeing Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, admitted into the kingdom of heaven, Luke 13. 28. Observe here,

(1.) The glory conferred upon them; the sentence by which they shall be not only acquitted, but preferred and rewarded, (v. 34.) The King shall sit upon his throne, and the Angels shall be called to bring in his strong and true worshippers, (see Hos. 3. 5.) and happily it is added, He shall speak of the cases of the Kingdom, (Mat. 6.) and he shall speak the care and tenderness wherewith he will make this disquisition,) is here the King, which speaks the authority wherewith he will then pronounce the sentence: where the word of this King is, there is power. Here are two things in this sentence:

[1.] The acknowledging of the saints to be the blessed of the Lord; Come, ye blessed of my Father. First, He pronounces them blessed; and his saying they are blessed, makes them so. The law curses them for their many discontinuances; but Christ having redeemed them from the curse of the law, and purchased a blessing for them, commands a blessing on them. Secondly, Blessed of his Father; reproached and cursed by the world, but blessed of God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Blessed of the Son is a more extensive blessing, so the Son glorifies the Father, by referring the salvation of the saints to him as the First Cause; all our blessings in heavenly things flow to us from God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Eph. 1. 3. Thirdly, He calls them to come; this come is, in effect, "Welcome, ten thousand welcomes, to the blessed of my Father; come to me, come to be for ever with me; you that followed me, bearing the cross, now come along with me wearing the crown; The blessed of my Father are the beloved of my soul, that have been too long at a distance from me; come now, come into my bosom, come into my arms, come into my dearest embraces!" Oh with what joy will this fill the hearts of the saints in that day! We now come boldly to the throne of grace, but we hungrier, and ye gave me meat. We cannot hence infer that the good works of ours merit the happiness of heaven, by any intrinsic worth or excellency in them, our goodness extends not unto God; but it is plain that Jesus Christ will judge the world by the same rule by which he governs it, and therefore will reward those that have been obedient to that law: and mention will be made of their obedience, not as their title, but as their evidence of an interest in Christ, and his purchase. This happiness will be adjudged to be a quantum meruit—an estimate of merit, which supposes a proportion between the work and the reward, but upon the promise of God purchased by Jesus Christ, and the benefit of it secured under certain provisos and limitations; and it is the purchase and promise that give the title, the obedience is only the qualification of the person designed. An estate made by deed or will upon condition, when the condition is performed according to the true intent of the donor or testator, becomes absolute; and then, though the title be but purely upon the deed or will, yet the performing of the condition must be given in evidence; and so it comes in here; for Christ is the Author of eternal salvation to those only that obey him, and who patiently continue in well-doing.

Now the good works here mentioned are such as we commonly call works of charity to the poor: but that mention will be found on the right hand, who never were in a capacity to feed the hungry or clothe the naked, but were themselves fed and clothed by the charity of others; but one instance of sincere obedience is put for all the rest, and it teaches us this in general, that faith working by love is all in all in Christianity; Show me thy faith by thy works: and nothing will abound to a good account hereafter, but that which is done in a good consideration now. The good works here described imply three things, which must be found in all that are saved.

[1.] Self-denial, and contempt of the world; reckoning the things of the world no further good things, than as we are enabled to do good with them: and those who have not wherewithal to do good, must shew the same disposition, by being contentedly and cheerfully poor. The united goodness of these is sufficient to be testified to the earth.

[2.] Love to our brethren; which is the second great commandment, the fulfilling of the law, and an excellent preparative for the world of everlasting love. We must give proof of this love by our readiness to do good, and to communicate; good wishes are but mockeries without good works, Jam. 2. 15, 16. 1 John 3. 17. Those that have not to give, must shew the same disposition in some other way.

[3.] A believing regard to Jesus Christ. That which is here rewarded, is the relieving the poor for Christ's sake, out of love to him, and with an eye to him. This puts an excellency upon the good work, when in it we serve the Lord Christ, which those may do, that work for their own living, as well as those that help to keep others alive. See Eph. 5. 6—7. Those good works shall then be accepted which are done in the name of the Lord Jesus, Col. 3. 17.

I was hungry, that is, my disciples and followers were so, either by the persecutions of enemies for well doing, or by the common dispensations of Providence; for in these things there is one even to the righteous and wicked: and you gave them meat. Note, First, Providence so variously orders and disposes of the circumstances of time, and the fruits of rich this world, that while some are in a condition to give relief, others need it. It is no new thing for those that are feasted with the dainties of heaven to be hungry and thirsty, and to want daily food; for those that are at home in God, to be strangers in a strange land;
ST. MATTHEW, XXV.

for those that have put on Christ, to want clothes to keep them warm; for those that have healthful souls, to have sickly bodies; and for those to be in prison, to Christ; and if they do, worthily, of charity and beneficence, according as our ability is, are necessary to salvation; and there will be more stress laid upon them in the judgment of the great day, than is commonly imagined; these must be the proofs of our love, and of our professed subscription to the gospel of Christ, 2 Cor. 9. 13. But try not to shew no mercy shall have judgment without mercy.

Now this reason is modestly excepted against by the righteous, but is explained by the Judge himself.

1. It is questioned by the righteous, v. 37—39. Not as if they were leath to inherit the kingdom, or were ashamed of their good deeds, or had not the testimony of their own consciences concerning them; but, (1.) The expressions are paradoxical, designed to introduce and impress these great truths, that Christ has a mighty regard to works of charity, and is especially pleased with kindnesses done to his people for his sake. Or, (2.) They speak the humble admiration which glorified saints will be filled with, to find such poor and worthless services, as their's are, so highly celebrated, and richly rewarded: Lord, which shall these men be blessed in? Note, Gracious souls are not so blind to think anything of so good deeds; especially as unworthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed. Far from this is the temper of those who said, Wherefore have we fasted, and thou seest not? Isa. 58. 3. Saints in heaven will wonder what brought them thither, and that God should so regard them and their services.

It even put Nathanael to the blush, to hear Christ's encomium of him: Whence knowest thou me? John 1. 47, 48. See Eph. 3. 20. "When saw we thee an hungered? We have seen the poor in distress many a time; but when saw we thee?" Note, Christ is more among us than we think he is; surely the Lord is in this place, by his word, his ordinances, his ministers, his Spirit, yea, and his poor, and we know it not; When thou wast under the fig tree, I saw thee, John 1. 48.

2. It is explained by the Judge himself; (v. 40.) Inasmuch as you have done it to these my brethren, to the least, to one of the least of them, ye have done it unto me. The good works of the saints, when they are produced in the great day, (1.) Shall all be remembered; and not the least, not one of the least, overlooked, no not a cup of cold water. (2.) They shall be accounted the cheapest advantage, and the best construction that can be put upon them. As Christ makes the best of their infirmities, so he makes the most of their services.

We see what recompenes Christ has for those that feed the hungry, and clothe the naked; but what will become of the godly poor, that had not wherewithal to do so? Must they be shut out? No, [1.] Christ claims them as his own, even the least of them, as his brethren; he will not in any disparagement to him, to call them brethren, Heb. 2. 11. In the height of his glory, he will not disown his poor relations; Lazarus is there laid in his bosom, as a friend, as a brother. Thus he will confess them, ch. 10. 32. [2.] He will take the kindnesses done to them, as done to himself; If have done it to one of the least of these, the least of them, he will not refer his respect to the poor that were relieved, as well as to the rich. Note, Our love is bound to all sorts of our fellow-creatures; it is a kindness to show any respect to the poor that were relieved, as well as to the rich. Note, Christ espouses his people's cause, and interests himself in their interests, and reckons himself received, and loved, and owned in them. If Christ himself were among us in poverty, how readily would we relieve him? In prison, how frequently would we visit him? We are ready to envy the honour they had, who ministered to him of his substance, Luke 8. 4. Wherever poor saints and poor ministers are, there Christ is ready to receive our kindness in them, and they shall be put to his account.

Here is the process concerning the wicked, those on the left hand. And in that we have,

(1.) The sentence passed upon them, v. 41. It was a disgrace to be set on the left hand; but that is not the worst of it, he shall say to them, Depart from me, ye cursed. Every word has terror in it, like that of the trumpet at mount Sinai, waxing louder and louder, every accent more and more doleful, and especially this (I.) Depart from me; for, (1.) In this world they were often called to come to Christ, to come for life and rest; but they turned a deaf ear to his calls; justly therefore are they bid to depart from Christ, that would not come to him. "Depart from me the Fountain of all good, from me the Saviour, and therefore from all hope of salvation: I will never have any thing more to say to you, or do with you." Here, they said to the Almighty, Depart from us; then, he will choose their delusions, and say to them, Depart from me. Note, It is the hell of hell to depart from Christ.

(2.) If they must depart, and depart from Christ, may not they be dismissed with a blessing, with one kind and compassionate word at least; No, Depart, ye cursed. They that would not come to Christ, to inherit a blessing, must depart from him under the burden of a curse, that curse of the law on every one that breaks it, Gal. 3. 10. As they loved cursing, so it shall come unto them. But observe, The righteous are called the blessed of my Father; for their blessedness is owing purely to the grace of God and his blessing, but the wicked are called only ye cursed, for their damnation is of themselves. Hath God sold them? No, they have sold themselves, have laid themselves under the curse, Isa. 50. 1.

(3.) If they must depart, and depart with a curse, may they not go into some place of ease and rest? Will it not be misery enough for them to bewail their loss? No, there is a punishment of sense as well as loss; they must depart into fire, into torment as grievous as that of fire is to the body, and much more. This fire is the wrath of the eternal God fastening upon the guilty souls and consciences of sinners that have made themselves fuel for it. Our God is a consuming fire, and sinners fall immediately into that hands, Heb. 10. 27. Rom. 1. 18.

(4.) If into fire, may it not be some light or gentle fire? No, it is prepared fire; it is a torment ordained of old, Isa. 30. 33. The damnation of sinners is often spoken of as an act of the divine power; he is able to cast into hell. In the vessels of wrath he makes his power known; it is a destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. In it shall be seen what a provoked God can do to his enemies, nor a provoking picture more miserable.

(5.) If into fire, prepared fire, Oh let it be but of short continuance, let them but pass through fire! No, the fire of God's wrath will be an everlasting fire; a fire, that, fastening and preying upon immortal souls, can never go out for want of fuel; and, being kindled and kept burning by the wrath of an immortal God, can never go out for want of being fed with fresh victims; and, therefore, the grace being for ever excluded, there is nothing to extinguish it. If a drop of water be denied to cool the tongue, buckets of water will never be granted to quench this flame.

(6.) If they must be doomed to such a state of endless misery, yet may they not have some good company there? No, none but the devil and his angels, their sworn enemies, that helped to bring them to this misery, and will triumph over them in it. They served the devil while they lived, and therefore are justly sentenced to be where he is, as those that served Christ are taken to be with him where he is. It is terrible to lie in a house haunted with devils; what will it be then to be companions with them forever? Observe here, First, Christ intimates that there is one that is the prince of the devils, the ringleader of the rebellion, and that the rest are his angels, his messengers, by whose agency he supports his kingdom. Christ and his angels will in that day triumph over them. Secondly, The fire is said to be prepared, not primarily for the wicked, as the kingdom is prepared for the righteous; but it was originally intended for the devil and his angels. If sinners make themselves associates with Satan by indulging their lusts, they may thank themselves if they become sharers in that misery which was prepared for him and his associates. Calvin notes upon this, that therefore the threatening of the damned is said to be prepared for the devil and his angels, to cut off all hope of escaping it; the devil and his angels are already made prisoners in that pit, and can worms of the earth think to escape?

(2.) The reason of this sentence assigned. God's judgments are all just, and he will be justified in them. He is Judge himself, and therefore the heavens and earth are full of his glory. Now, [1.] All that is charged upon them, on which the sentence is grounded, is, omission; as, before, the servant was condemned, not for wasting his talent, but for burying it; so here, he doth not say, "I was hungry and thirsty, for you took my meat and drink from me; I was a stranger, for you banished me; naked, for you stripped me; in prison, for you laid me there;" but, "When I was in these distresses, you did not minister to me." A man, when he is in peace, is sure to enjoy his own ease and pleasure, made so much of your labour, and were so loath to part with your money, that you did not minister, as you might have done, to my relief and succour. You were like those epicures that were at ease in Zion, and were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph," Amos 6. 4-6. Note, Omissions are the ruin of thousands.

[2.] It is the omission of works of charity to the poor that is here condemned, and for omitting their sacrifices and burnt offerings, (they abounded in these, Ps. 50. 8.) but for omitting the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. The Ammonites and Moabites were excluded the sanctuary, because they met not Israel with bread and water, Deut. 23. 3, 4. Note, Uncharitableness to the poor is a damming sin. If we will not be brought to works of charity by the hope of reward, let us be influenced by fear of punishment: for they shall have judgment without mercy, that have shewed no mercy. Observe, He doth not say, "I was sick, and you did not cure me; in prison, and you did not release me;" (perhaps that was more than they could do;) but, "You visited me not, which you might have done." Note, Sinners will be condemned, at the great day, for the omission of that good which was in the power of the hand to do. But if the doom of the uncharitable be so dreadful, how much more intolerable will the doom of the cruel be, the doom of persecutors! Now this reason of the sentence is, First, Objected against by the prisoners, (v. 44.) Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, or thirsty? Condemned sinners, though they have no plea that will bear them out, will yet in vain offer at excuses. Note, 1. The mouths of their pleading bespeaks their present precipitation. They cut it short, as men in haste: When saw we thee an hungered, or thirsty, or naked? They care not to repeat the charge, as conscious to themselves of their own guilt, and imable to bear the terrors of the judgment. Nor will they have time allowed them to open a plea for such friends as (as we say) but "trifling with the court." 2. The matter of their plea bespeaks their former inconsideration of that which they might have known, but would not tell, now that it was too late. They, that had slighted and persecuted poor Christians, would not own that they had slighted and persecuted Christ: no, they never intended any affront to him, nor expected that so great a matter should be made of it. They imagined he was only a company of poor, weak, silly, and contemptible people, who made more ado than needed about religion, that they put those slight upon: but they who do so will be made to know, either in the day of their conversion, as Paul, or of their condemnation, as these here, that it was Jesus whom they persecuted. And if they say, Behold, we know it not; doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? Secondly, Justified by the Judge, who will convince all the ungodly of the hard speeches spoken against him in those that are his, Jude 15. He goes by this rule; (v. 45.) Inasmuch as ye did not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. Note, What is done against the faithful disciples and followers of Christ, even the least of them, he takes as done against himself. He is concerned in what they are reproached and persecuted for his sake, and in all their afflictions he is afflicted: He that toucheth them toucheth him in a part no less tender than the apple of his eye.

Lastly, Here is the execution of both these sentences, v. 46. Execution is the life of the law, and Christ will take care that that be done according to the sentence.

1. The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment. Sentence will then be executed speedily, and no reprove granted, nor any time allowed to move in arrest of judgment. The execution of the wicked is first mentioned; for first the tares are gathered and burned. Note, (1.) The punishment of the wicked in the future state will be an everlasting punishment, for that state is an unalterable state. It can neither be thought that sinners should change their own natures, and that God should suddenly change his mind. When in this world the day of grace was mispent, the Spirit of grace resisted, and the means of grace abused and baffled. (2.) The wicked shall be made to go away into that punishment; not that they will go voluntarily, no, they are driven from light into darkness; but it bespeaks an irresistible conviction of guilt, and a final despair of mercy.
